EMERSON et al. v. YOSEMITE GOLD MIN. & MILL. CO. et al. (Sac. No. 1,142.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 27, 1906. Rehearing Denied May 21, 1906.)

JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, subd. 2, provides that the effect of a judgment is conclusive as to matters directly adjudged, and by section 1911, that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former action which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged. Held, that where, in an action to quiet title to a mining claim, plaintiffs claimed a certain interest by forfeiture from co-owners, and defendants claimed under a conveyance from such co-owners, a former judgment in a suit brought by plaintiffs against defendants to obtain a judgment permitting plaintiffs to redeem the property from mortgage sale did not show forfeiture; the complaint in that action having merely alleged that plaintiffs were "the successors in interest" of the co-owners and it not appearing that the question of succession by forfeiture was directly involved and adjudicated.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by E. L. Emerson and others against the Yosemite Gold Mining & Milling Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, the Milling Company appeals. Modified.

F. W. Street, W. C. Kennedy, and Will M. Beggs, for appellant. Crittenden Hampton and J. P. O'Brien, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to quiet title to a mining claim in Tuolumne county, called the Slap Jack mine. Judgment went for the plaintiffs, and defendant Yosemite Gold Mining & Milling Company appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. This is the second appeal in this cause. See Emerson et al. v. McWhirter et al., 133 Cal. 510, 65 Pac. 1036. Upon the first trial, judgment was given in favor of defendant McWhirter, and on the appeal therefrom, this judgment and an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial were reversed. Upon the going down of the remittitur, the Yosemite Gold Mining & Milling Company, claiming to be the successor in interest of defendant Mc-

Whirter and defendants Argall, was substituted for "R. S. McWhirter et al," as a defendant. Plaintiffs base their claim upon a location made by one Coyle in January, 1896. The claim of defendants Argall, which embraced an undivided nine-twentieths of the property, was based on the same location, and by deed dated May 31, 1899, said Argalls purported to grant to appellant's immediate predecessor all their interest in said property. The claim of defendant McWhirter, succeeded to by appellant corporation, was based upon an attempted location by McWhirter on January 1, 1899, a few minutes after midnight, made by him upon the theory that plaintiffs had failed to perform the assessment work for the year 1898.

It is first contended by appellant that Coyle never made a valid location, because he posted but one notice of location on the claim, while the local regulation of the miners of Tuolumne county required two such notices to be posted. The same contention was made upon the former appeal, was there fully discussed and decided adversely to appellant's claim. What was there said in this matter is now the law of this case.

The second and third points made by appellant relate to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the court as to the doing by the plaintiffs of the assessment work for the year 1898. The court found "that during the year 1898, the plaintiffs performed $84.80 worth of labor upon said mine and mining claim; that on the 31st day of December, 1898, the plaintiffs resumed work upon said mine and mining claim, and prosecuted said work diligently thereafter until more than $100 worth of labor and improvements were performed and made thereon, in addition to the labor performed during the year 1898, as aforesaid." Upon the former trial, the court found that the assessment work for 1898 had not been performed, and that the land was, therefore, on January 1, 1899, public mineral land, open to location, and McWhirter's attempted location on that day consequently valid. The judgment then given was reversed upon the ground that, conceding that the requisite $100 worth of labor had not been done during the year 1898, the evidence showed that some work had been done in good faith during that year, and that on December 31, 1898, prior to McWhirter's attempted location, work was resumed thereon in good faith by plaintiffs, and continuously carried on thereafter, to some time late in January, 1899, until more than $100 worth of work, in addition to that done during 1898, had been done. Section 2324, Rev. St. U. S. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], providing that on a failure to comply with the conditions as to doing the requisite work, the mine "shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, provided, the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location," it was held by this court thereunder that the resumption of work on December 31, 1898, and the continuance thereof to the requisite amount, prevented a forfeiture, and that McWhirter's attempted location at a time during which plaintiffs were in possession, engaged in the continuance of such work, was unavailing. It cannot be seriously contended that the evidence given upon the second trial was substantially different from that given on the first trial as to the character of the work done, and the amount thereof. Under the views expressed on the former appeal, which must here be accepted as the law of the case, the only point upon which there may be a question at all, so far as the finding of the court is concerned, is as to whether plaintiffs resumed work on December 31, 1898, or not until January 2, 1899. Upon this point, however, there can be no real question here, for there was a clear conflict in the evidence. There was added to the testimony given on the former trial, that of two new witnesses, who testified positively that Boynton, who commenced the work, did not arrive at the mine until late in the afternoon of December 31st, and that he did no work at all that day. On the other hand, Boynton testified positively that he arrived at the mine on December 30th, and commenced his work the next day. As to the time of his arrival, he was corroborated by another witness, who accompanied him there, and who was positive as to the date. The evidence of the other witnesses for appellant upon this subject was not materially different from that given by them upon the former trial, where it was held not to be sufficient to even raise a substantial conflict. There was, as shown above, a substantial conflict in the evidence upon this matter on the second trial, but that is the most that can be said for appellant. It was for the trial court to determine this conflict, which it has done by the finding in question, and its determination is conclusive upon this appeal. These are the only points made in relation to the McWhirter interest, and it thus appears that so far as appellant claims under McWhirter, the judgment in favor of plaintiffs was correct.

The remaining points relate to the Argall nine-twentieths interest. This action was commenced February 10, 1899, and it was alleged in the original complaint that the Argalls were, with plaintiffs and one other defendant, the owners of all the property here involved. and that they were made defendants because they would not join as plaintiffs. The Argalls filed their answer on February 27, 1899, admitting all the allegations of the complaint. Judgment was given for McWhirter, and against plaintiffs and the Argalls, May 4, 1899. Upon the reversal of this judgment by this court, and the substitution of appellant as the successor of McWhirter and the Argalls, the plaintiffs, on February 4, 1902, filed a supplemental complaint, alleging that at the time of the commencement of the action the Argalls and the plaintiffs were the owners of this property, and that since the filing thereof one of the then plaintiffs had transferred his interest to another plaintiff, and that the Argalls had forfeited to the plaintiffs, their co-owners, all their interest, for failure to contribute their proportion of the cost ofthe as-ssessment work for the year 1898, after proper notice given them on December 20, 1899, the allegations in this behalf being apparently sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of section 2324, U. S. Rev. St., relative to forfeiture to co-owners. It was also alleged that the alleged subsequent grants to the immediate predecessor of appellant and appellant itself were taken by the grantees with full notice of such forfeiture. It was further alleged that the plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to the possession of all the property, that the appellant claimed some interest therein adverse to plaintiffs, which claim was without any right whatever, and this was followed by the ordinary prayer in complaints to quiet title. The appellant answered, denying the allegations of the supplemental complaint, setting up its claim based on the McWhirter location, and alleging the transfer by the Argalls to have been made on May 31, 1899, prior to the giving of the notice to contribute. The case was tried upon the issues thus made. The court found in accord with the allegations of the supplemental complaint as to the doing of the required work for the year 1898, the failure of the Argalls to do any of the same, and their failure to contribute their proportion after notice personally served on them, but it further found that such notice was not given until "after they had executed and delivered" their conveyance to the Yosemite Company, and had ceased to be co-owners with plaintiffs, and upon this ground, concluded that there had been no forfeiture. It made no finding at all upon the allegation that the Yosemite Company and appellant had notice of the facts upon which the claim of forfeiture is based. It, however, further found facts, not specifically alleged in the complaint or answer, upon which it based the conclusion that as between plaintiffs and appellant, the plaintiffs are the successors in interest of the Argalls in their nine-twentieths of said claim. These findings were based upon the judgment roll in an action brought by said plaintiffs in March, 1901, against certain parties, including this appellant, to obtain a judgment permitting them to redeem the property from a sale of an undivided nineteen-twentieths of the land, made under a decree of foreclosure of mortgage. It was alleged in the complaint therein that these plaintiffs are the owners of an undivided nineteen-twentieths of said property, and "are the successors in interest of the judgment debtors in said action," among whom were the Argalls, who were, with others, personally liable for the debt, and whose interest in the land was subject to the mortgage. The appellant was the assignee of the certificate of purchase issued by the commissioner at such sale, and it and the commissioner refused to receive from plaintiff the money necessary to effect a redemption. The defendants in that action filed their answer, denying specifically that plaintiffs were the successors in interest of the judgment debtors. They then offered to allow judgment permitting plaintiffs to redeem the property upon payment of $2,440, less their costs, and plaintiffs accepted the offer, and judgment was entered accordingly, plaintiffs waiving their further claim for damages. The court did not make findings of fact, findings having been waived, and the judgment entered recited the offer and acceptance, and, the money having been paid, decreed a redemption, and further expressly adjudged "that the plaintiffs herein redeemed the premises and property hereinafter described from said foreclosure sale, as the successors in interest of the judgment debtors in the action aforesaid." This judgment had become final prior to the trial of this cause.

Plaintiffs claim, and the trial court held, that the effect of these proceedings was to estop appellant from here disputing that plaintiffs succeeded to the Argall interest. The judgment roll in that proceeding was offered by plaintiff in rebuttal, appellant's testimony having been to the effect that the notice to contribute was not given to the Argalls, until after they had ceased to be co-owners in the property. It was objected to upon the grounds, among others, that it was not put in issue by the pleadings, and was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. It was received in evidence, subject to a motion to strike out, and such motion was made at the conclusion of the trial, upon substantially similar grounds, and denied. The exceptions to these rulings sufficiently present the points made by appellant in regard to the effect of the proceedings in the redemption suit, so far as this appeal is concerned. We are satisfied that this judgment roll should not have been received in evidence. It is urged that it was proper evidence in rebuttal of appellant's evidence tending to show that there was no forfeiture. There is, however, nothing in the judgment roll to indicate that the precise question of the alleged Argall forfeiture was involved in the redemption suit. Taking the allegation of succession in the complaint therein as material in its full scope, it was simply that the plaintiffs therein "are the successors in interest of the judgment debtors in said action." By what means they succeeded to those interests was not alleged. The allegation was broad enough to include any of the numerous methods by which realty may be acquired. That plaintiffs were the successors in interest of the Argalls by forfeiture, or, indeed, that they were their successors in interest at all, is not essential to the validity of the judgment therein, for admittedly they had succeeded to the other interests, and, as successors in any mode of one or more of the co-tenants, were entitled to redeem the whole property. Code Civ. Proc. § 701, subd. 1. As successors in part, they could not redeem at all, except by redeeming the whole. Eldridge v. Wright, 55 Cal. 531–534. Where it is sought to show that a certain question in issue has been litigated and determined between the same parties in a previous action, it is not enough that the proposed evidence tends to show that the precise question may have been involved in such litigation. It must clearly appear that it was directly involved and adjudicated. Beronio v. Ventura Co. L. Co., 129 Cal. 232–236, 61 Pac. 958, 79 Am. St. Rep. 118. The judgment roll here not showing affirmatively that the question of forfeiture of the Argall interest was involved in that action, it was not admissible in rebuttal of appellant's evidence showing that there was, in fact, no forfeiture.

We are also of the opinion that the judgment in the redemption suit cannot be held to raise an estoppel upon the question as to the succession to the Argall interest. In Beronio v. Ventura County Lumber Co., supra, it was said: "In order that a judgment in one action may constitute an estoppel against the parties thereto in a subsequent action, it must be made to appear, either upon the face of the record or by intrinsic evidence, that the identical questions involved in the issues to be tried were determined in the former action. Citing authorities. 'Every estoppel must be certain to every intent, and not to be taken by argument or inference.' Coke on Littleton, 352b. 'If upon the face of a record anything is left to conjecture as to what was necessarily involved and decided, there is no estoppel in it when pleaded, and nothing conclusive in it when offered in evidence.' * * * By section 1908, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, 'the effect of a judgment is conclusive in respect to the matters directly adjudged,' and by section 1911, 'that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former action which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto.' " See also Freeman on Judgments, § 256. This is simply a statement of elementary principles relative to estoppel by judgment. The thing adjudged in the redemption action was simply that the plaintiffs, as successors in interest, had the right to redeem the whole of this property from the foreclosure sale. That they should have this right, it was essential that they should be successors in interest of one or more of the judgment debtors in some portion of the property, but it was not essential to this right, and, therefore, not essential to the judgment, that they should be the successors in interest of all the judgment debtors. Code Civ. Proc. § 701, subd. 1. Their allegation that they were the successors of all the judgment debtors was material in the sense that it was necessary for them to prove that they had succeeded to the interest of some judgment debtor in some part of the property, and the judgment is necessarily conclusive upon that point. Does it appear that anything further was determined by the judgment? We certainly cannot say that the offer to allow judgment permitting plaintiffs to redeem admitted anything more than was essential to such right of redemption. The judgment upon its face shows that there was no trial of any of the issues, and that the judgment was purely a consent judgment, based entirely on the offer and acceptance. It cannot be said, with any degree of certainty whatever, from the face of this record that the question of the succession as to the Argall interest was litigated and determined in that proceeding. Indeed, the contrary affirmatively appears, and we are satisfied that the judgment is conclusive only of that which is essential to support it, viz.: that plaintiffs had succeeded to such an interest in the property as entitled them to redeem. We think the somewhat peculiar adjudication of the decree as to the character in which the plaintiffs redeemed the premises, adds nothing to the effect of the record. Some point is made as to the acceptance on redemption of all the redemption money, including that portion due on the Argall interest, but we do not see how this can affect the question here discussed.

It is contended by appellant that, as the plaintiffs have chosen to set forth in their supplemental complaint the particular facts upon which their alleged title to the Argall interest rests, the allegation of ownership, in connection therewith, was a mere conclusion, that they could, therefore, recover only by showing title by forfeiture from the Argalls, and that the judgment roll in the redemption suit was inadmissible under the issues made to show title in them. See Castro v. Richardson, 18 Cal. 478; Lick v. Diaz, 30 Cal. 65, 75; Haven v. Seeley, 59 Cal. 494; Turner v. White, 73 Cal. 299, 14 Pac. 794; Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 275, 12 Pac. 161; Hesser v. Miller, 77 Cal. 192, 19 Pac. 375; Gruwell v. Seybolt, 82 Cal. 9, 22 Pac. 938; Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 538, 39 Pac. 922. There is much force in this contention, but as we here uphold objections made by appellant to this judgment roll, which go to the merits, it will be unnecessary to discuss an objection of this nature, which could be obviated by amendment of the pleadings. No point is made on this appeal as to the findings of fact relating to the question of forfeiture. It may be material to that question to determine whether at the time of the service of the notice to contribute, the plaintiffs had been notified, actually or constructively, of the transfer by the Argalls. As this question has not been discussed, we do not decide the same. It appears unnecessary to require the parties to again litigate the question of title as to the remaining eleven-twentieths of the property. As to that portion the judgment was clearly correct.

To the extent that the judgment decrees that plaintiff F. F. Britton is the owner of an undivided one-fourth of the property, that plaintiff Annie L. Emerson is the owner of an undivided one-fourth thereof, and that plaintiff Jacob Miller is the owner of an undivided one-twentieth thereof, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

As to the remaining undivided nine-twentieths, constituting what is known as the Argall interest, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with the right to the parties to amend their pleadings as they may be advised.

3 Cal. App. 274

WAGNER v. WEDELL.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. March 19, 1906.)

1. Chattel Mortgages — Assignment — Rights of Parties—Foreclosure.

Where, after plaintiff assigned a second chattel mortgage on property to defendant, a prior mortgagee, with the understanding that both mortgages were to be foreclosed at the same time, the amount due plaintiff to be paid out of the proceeds of sale, and the assignment appointing defendant plaintiff's attorney to take all lawful means for the recovery of the amount due, defendant, who had acquired title to the property, satisfied both mortgages of record, he was liable to plaintiff for the amount due on the latter's mortgage; plaintiff having the right to rely on a judicial sale before he could be deprived of his security without payment of the amount due him.

2. Same—Estoppel.

Where defendant, a prior mortgagee, took an assignment from plaintiff of the latter's second mortgage, under an assignment appointing him plaintiff's agent to collect the indebtedness, and thereafter acquired title to the property, satisfied the mortgages of record, sold the property, and took notes and mortgages for part of the purchase price, he was responsible to plaintiff for money had and received, was thereafter estopped as to plaintiff from saying that such notes and mortgages were not money.

3. Money Recieved—Grounds of Action.

Where, after taking an assignment of plaintiff's second chattel mortgage for the purposes of foreclosure only, defendant, a prior mortgagee, who had acquired title to the property, satisfied the mortgages of record and sold the property, he was responsible to plaintiff for money had and received under the common counts, and plaintiff's remedy was not limited to pursuit of the mortgages taken by defendant for the purchase price.

4. Same—Complaint—Sufficiency.

A complaint charging defendant, as agent of plaintiff, with having sold plaintiff's note and mortgage for a certain sum for and on account of plaintiff, and that, although demand had been made, defendant had not paid plaintiff the said sum, nor any part thereof, stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

5. Trial—Motion for Nonsuit—Evidence.

A plaintiff's evidence must be regarded as true for the purposes of a defendant's motion for nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by David Wagner against Theodore Wedell. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Reed & Hankins, for appellant. Edgar D. Peixotto, for respondent.

COOPER, J. Upon the close of plaintiff's testimony the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and judgment was accordingly entered. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence shows substantially the following facts: On July 22, 1903, Lucien Blum and Peter Verdon executed to defendant a chattel mortgage on the furniture, household goods, and kitchen and dining-room wares, contained in a building known as 41 and 45 Stockton street, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $1,500 and interest to accrue thereon. On the same day the same mortgagors executed and delivered to plaintiff a second chattel mortgage on the same property to secure a promissory note for $1,000, besides interest. Both mortgages were properly recorded. Afterwards, the mortgagors being in default in the payment of interest, the defendant went to the plaintiff and asked him to assign his mortgage to defendant for convenience, so that defendant could foreclose both mortgages in the one action. It was finally agreed that the plaintiff should assign his mortgage to the defendant, and that the defendant should immediately commence foreclosure proceedings, and pay plaintiff out of the proceeds of the sale under foreclosure. The plaintiff told defendant at the time of the assignment that he would bid in the property for enough to cover both mortgages. The assignment was in writing, and contained the following clause: "And hereby appoint the said Theodore Wedell my true and lawful attorney irrevocable, in my name or otherwise, to have, use, and take all lawful means for the recovery of said note, money and interest." It was duly acknowledged, and was afterwards placed upon record at the request of the defendant. At the time of making the assignment the defendant gave to plaintiff the following writing: "San Francisco, Oct. 8th, 1903. One day after date I, Theodore Wedell, promise to pay to David Wagner, the sum up to one thousand dollars in gold coin, out of the sale of the rooming house known as 41 and 45 Stockton street, San Francisco, Cal., after gaining possession of the same. Theodore Wedell. Witness: George Pattison." Plaintiff asked the defendant about the words of the writing "up to one thousand dollars." Defendant replied: "Well, that is only a matter of form. That is all right. You will get your money as soon as the foreclosure is made." Plaintiff replied that he would bid in the property to the amount of both mortgages. On the 12th day of October, 1903, the defendant, being the owner of the first mortgage, and the owner of record of the second mortgage, had both said mortgages satisfied of record. Although the evidence does not show it, the defendant evidently had procured the title from the mortgagors at the time he had the mortgages satisfied, for he afterwards sold the property and dealt with it as his own. Defendant sold the property afterwards, the date not being shown, to George P. Beck and wife, and received therefor $1,000 in money, and a note for $1,500, in his own favor, secured by a mortgage upon the same property, and also a note for $1,350, executed in favor of A. C. Blum, secured by a second mortgage upon the same property. The defendant, in satisfying the former mortgages of record, in selling the property to Beck and wife, and in taking the second set of mortgages from Beck and wife, acted without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiff. In fact, after plaintiff had heard of the sale from other sources and asked defendant about it, defendant did not state the facts, but said to plaintiff, "There is a sale on, but it had not been consummated." Afterwards in a conversation with plaintiff as to the mortgage to Blum, defendant said: "There has been a good deal of crooked business done up in the real estate office, and that second mortgage I know nothing about, anything more than it is put there. It is a fictitious name that was put there as a bluff." When plaintiff asked the defendant as to the money coming to him defendant said: "Everybody in this country has got to look out for himself and do the best he can." Plaintiff has not been paid.

We are of the opinion that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for the $1,000, and the interest that was due thereon at the time the property was sold by defendant, less the $10 paid plaintiff when he assigned his mortgage to defendant, and legal interest on such sum since the said sale. The defendant was the agent of plaintiff "to take all lawful means for the recovery of said note, money, and interest." As such agent it was his duty to act in the utmost good faith for the interests of his principal. He had taken the assignment for the purpose of foreclosing both mortgages, and under an express statement by plaintiff that at foreclosure sale he would bid in the property for an amount sufficient to cover both mortgages. He had been made the plaintiff's agent to foreclose the plaintiff's mortgage, and to recover the money and interest due thereon. Plaintiff had the right to rely upon defendant, and it was the duty of the defendant to act within the scope of his agency for the interest of his principal, and not adversely to him. If defendant had proceeded to foreclose the mortgages, he would have had the right to a decree that his own mortgage and costs be first paid, and then the balance to be applied to plaintiff's second mortgage. If defendant had so foreclosed, and the property had only sold for enough at judicial sale to pay the amount due to defendant, he would not have been responsible to plaintiff; but plaintiff had the right to rely upon a judicial sale before he could be deprived of his security without payment of the amount due him. Defendant satisfied and canceled the mortgage held by plaintiff without plaintiff's consent. He did this to clear his own title to the property. He then sold the property, without consulting the plaintiff, and apparently for a sum more than sufficient to pay both himself and the plaintiff; and, even if he did not, he had no right to satisfy and cancel the mortgage of the plaintiff without becoming liable to plaintiff for the amount due him. When defendant sold the property, and took notes and mortgages for part of the purchase price, he was thereafter estopped as to plaintiff from saying that such notes and mortgages were not money. He sold the property and was paid for it. Whether it was all in money or that which, as to plaintiff, ought to have been money, makes no difference. He is responsible to plaintiff for money had and received, for the reason that he is estopped from saying that he did not sell for money. Defendant's main argument is to the effect that plaintiff has mistaken his remedy, and that defendant is not responsible for money had and received under the common counts, but that plaintiff's only remedy is by pursuit of the mortgages taken by defendant. We are not inclined to look with favor upon such contention. It certainly would not be in furtherance of honesty and fair dealing between man and man. In Moses v. McFarlan, 2 Burr. 1005, Lord Mansfield said, in speaking of the action for money had and received: "One great benefit which arises to suitors from the nature of this action is that plaintiff need not state the special circumstances from which he concludes that, ex æquo et bono, the money received by the defendant ought to be deemed to belong to him. He may declare generally that the money was received to his use, and make out his case at the trial. This kind of action to recover back money which ought not, in justice, to be kept is very beneficial, and therefore, much encouraged. It lies for money paid by mistake, or upon a consideration which happens to fail, or extortion, or oppression, or an undue advantage of the plaintiff's situation, contrary to the laws made for the protection of persons under these circumstances." The above quotation was referred to with approval by our own court in Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 190, 55 Pac. 783, where it was said that it is well established in this state that the common counts in assumpsit may be used, and that at common law such counts could be used to recover money obtained by false and fraudulent representations.

In Floyd v. Day, 3 Mass. 403, 3 Am. Dec. 171, it was held that where an agent compromises a demand of his principal, by receiving from the debtor a negotiable note, indorsed specially to the agent, an action for money had and received will lie. In the opinion it is said: "In fact, when the defendant, instead of money, received this note of Pilsbury, and discharged him, the property of the note was in the defendant, and he became immediately answerable to the plaintiff for the amount of the liquidated damages, which made a part of the consideration of the note, as so much money received by him to her use, and an action of assumpsit is her proper remedy. For, although the defendant received no money, yet by this transaction he discharged Pilsbury from the plaintiff's demand on him for money, and he must be considered as having made himself answerable to her for the money he ought to have received from Pilsbury." Floyd v. Day has everywhere been regarded as authority on the proposition that, in such case, an action for money had and received will lie. Under the rule in that case, when the defendant in the present case, instead of foreclosing the mortgages, or instead of receiving the money on the sale, released plaintiff's mortgage and received the $1,000 and the mortgages of Beck and wife, he became immediately chargeable to plaintiff as for so much money received to the use of plaintiff. The same rule was laid down in Beardsley v. Root, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 464, 6 Am. Dec. 386, where it was held that such action would lie, even though the defendant had received no money, but had wrongfully discharged a debt due his principal in payment of his own debt. It is there said: "The general rule indisputably is, that the action for money had and received cannot be supported unless the defendant has actually received money. It has, however, been held in the English courts that taking negotiable paper is equivalent to the receipt of money. * * * Here the attorney or agent has discharged a debt due to his principal, and applied that debt to the payment and satisfaction of his own debt, for the amount of which he is liable to the plaintiff in this form of action."

In Bullard v. Hascall, 25 Mich. 132, it was held that such action would lie even though defendant did not receive any money. It is there said: "But it is objected, by the counsel for plaintiff in error, that assumpsit for money had and received could not be maintained by the plaintiff, because there was no evidence that the defendant actually received the money for the draft. To this objection there are two sufficient answers: First, as the evidence clearly shows that the draft, which belonged to the plaintiff, came to the defendant's possession, who gave a receipt for it in the name of the firm, and thus discharged the government from liability for the claim, and thereby cut off the plaintiff's remedy against the government, and then, instead of handing it over to the plaintiff, or procuring the money upon it and paying it over to him, that he wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the opportunity of obtaining the money upon it, and wrongfully enabled another party to obtain it, it does not now lie with him to deny that he had himself received the money, whether he did in fact receive it or not. It was his duty, as between himself and the plaintiff, if he disposed of it at all, to have obtained the money for it, and to have paid it over to the plaintiff; and if he chose to dispose of it without obtaining the money, the disposition being wrongful as against the plaintiff, he is estopped to deny that he received the money." In Thompson v. Babcock, Brayton (Vt.) 24, the plaintiff, having mortgaged a lot of land, executed a deed of the same land to Burbank, and delivered the deed to Babcock to enable him to dispose of the same and pass the title to a purchaser. Babcock, on disposing of the land as plaintiff's agent, took notes of hand against a third person and a quantity of paper instead of money. The court held that defendant was not authorized to sell for anything but money, and having done so he was liable on the common counts for money had and received. In Andrew v. Robinson and Others, 3 Campbell, 199, it was held that where an insurance broker had received credit in account with an underwriter for a loss upon a policy, and had thus deprived his principal of all remedy against the underwriter, the action for money had and received would lie, and Lord Ellensborough held that defendants "were estopped from saying that they had not this sum in their hands for the plaintiff's use."

The complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It charges the defendant, as agent of the plaintiff, with having sold the plaintiff's note and mortgage for $1,000 for and on account of plaintiff; that, although demand has been made, the defendant has not paid the plaintiff the said sum of $1,000 nor any part thereof. If the defendant sold the plaintiff's note and mortgage for $1,000, and did not receive the $1,000, he should have received it. What has been said relates to the ruling on the motion for a nonsuit, and in such case we must regard all the plaintiff's evidence as being true for the purposes of the motion.

The judgment and order are reversed.

ORACK v. POWLESON et al.

1. Quieting Title—Statutory Provisions—Defenses.

Where, in a suit against the city and county of San Francisco to quiet title, it appeared that plaintiff had had such adverse possession as to confer title under Civ. Code, § 1007, the fact that the land involved was within the lands included in Act March 14, 1870 (St. 1869–70, p. 353, c. 249), authorizing the city and county to convey certain lands to persons claiming under those in possession prior to a certain date, was no defense, in the absence of any showing that some person existed for whom, by reason of such possession, the property was held in trust.

2. Same.

The fact that plaintiff himself might have secured a deed from the city and county under the act of 1870 did not defeat the title acquired by him by virtue of his adverse possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by E. Orack against Grace M. Powleson, as administratrix, and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, except as against defendant city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Tobin & Tobin, for appellant. Percy V. Long, City and County Atty., for respondent.

HARRISON, C. J. Action to quiet title. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, quieting his title to the land described in the complaint as against the defendant Powleson, but refusing to quiet it as against the defendant the city and county of San Francisco. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment, presenting his appeal upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions.

The land involved in the action is situate in the city and county of San Francisco on the southerly line of Golden Gate avenue 100 feet easterly from Scott street, and having a frontage of 25 feet with a depth of 100 feet. The court found that the plaintiff deraigns his title by mesne conveyances under a so-called pre-emption claim of one Henry Merritt, made in 1850, which embraces the land described in the complaint; and it also found that "the plaintiff, by himself and his predecessors in interest, has been in open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession of said premises and every part thereof, and has paid all taxes levied and assessed thereon for city, county and state purposes for a period of more than 10 years next before the beginning of this action." By virtue of the provisions of section 1007, Civ. Code, the finding that the plaintiff has had an adverse possession of the land in question for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of the action shows that he has acquired a title thereto by prescription sufficient against all. The provisions of the section include the respondent, and in the absence of any further evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to the judgment asked for by him. If there were any ground upon which the respondent would not be subject to the provisions of the section it was an affirmative defense, to be presented upon the record and established by evidence. In its answer to the complaint the respondent alleges that it holds the legal title to the property in trust, to be disposed of and conveyed to the parties entitled thereto and designated in an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled "An act to expedite the settlement of land titles in the city and county of San Francisco, and to ratify and confirm the acts and proceedings of certain authorities thereof," approved March 14, 1870; and that the legal title thus held by it in trust is the only interest or claim which it has therein; that by the aforesaid act of March 14, 1870, the Legislature has prescribed the terms and conditions and designated the manner in which the legal title of said premises shall be disposed of and conveyed by it to the party or parties designated in said act as entitled to said conveyance; that said title has never been disposed of or conveyed at all; and that said act provides a plain, speedy, and adequate method by which its title can be conveyed to plaintiff if he has title to it; and that he has never availed himself of said method for the purpose of procuring said legal title. The court made a finding in accordance with these averments, and as a conclusion of law therefrom held that the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree quieting his title as against the city and county.

The lands within the city and county of San Francisco which were formerly held by the pueblo of San Francisco are those which were embraced within the limits of the Van Ness ordinance and those commonly known as "Outside Lands." The former includes those within the charter limits of the city of San Francisco as defined in the act for its incorporation, passed April 15, 1851, and were released to the city by the act of Congress of July 1, 1864; and the latter includes that portion of the pueblo lands confirmed to the city by the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States May 18, 1865, which lie outside of the charter limits of 1851 and were conveyed to the city by the act of Congress of March 8, 1866. The act of March 14, 1870 (St. 1869–70, p. 353, c. 249), covers the land included in both of these descriptions, and authorizes a conveyance to be made by the city and county of land included in each; but in defining the class of persons to whom such conveyances may be made the Legislature has precluded it from making a conveyance to any one who is not within the class so defined. Of the outside lands it is authorized to make a conveyance only to those who, either in person or through persons from whom they claim or derive possession, were in possession on the 8th of March, 1866. Of the lands covered by the Van Ness ordinance the conveyance can be made only to those who, by themselves, their tenants or the persons through whom they claim or derive possession, were in possession on or before January 1, 1855, and remained in such possession until and including June 20, 1855. It is only for such persons that the city and county holds any of said land in trust for conveyance, or to whom it is authorized by said act to make a conveyance; and in the absence of any showing of such possession the provisions of the act of March 14, 1870, are not available as a defense to the plaintiff's complaint. It was therefore incumbent upon the respondent, not only to allege as an affirmative defense to the plaintiff's right of action, but also to show at the trial the existence of some person for whom, by reason of such possession the property is held by it in trust to be conveyed to him. The land involved in the present action is within the limits of the Van Ness ordinance; and the finding of the court that it was not reserved under that ordinance for any public use, or set apart for any municipal purpose, showed that it is not incapable of alienation or of being acquired by adverse possession.

Neither did the fact that it was held under a trust to convey it to persons who might be entitled thereto prevent the plaintiff from acquiring a title by adverse possession. Ames v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 Pac. 1005. As the respondent did not allege in its answer any previous possession of the property, and as the court states in its findings that there was no evidence introduced at the trial to show that the plaintiff or his predecessors were or were not in possession of any portion of the property on the 1st day of January, 1855, or on the 20th day of June, 1855, or at any time between those dates, the act of March 14, 1870, was irrelevant to the controversy between the parties. "There is no presumption that any portion of the land covered by the ordinance was or was not in the actual possession of any one during this period; but in any legal proceeding, in which the fact whether a particular parcel of land was or was not then held in actual possession, becomes material it must be established by that party who relies upon the fact as an affirmative issue in support of his claim or defense." Goodwin v. Scheerer, 106 Cal. 690, 40 Pac. 18. The finding that the plaintiff might have secured a city deed under the Act of 1870 if he had proved possession of said property by himself or his predecessors in interest on the 1st day of January, 1855, and continuously thereafter until the 20th day of June, 1855, has no legal significance in the absence of a finding that he had such possession or was able to make such proof. Even if such possession could have been established it would not have defeated the title acquired by him by virtue of his 10 years' adverse possession, or justified the court in refusing to give him judgment.

The judgment in favor of the respondent is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter judgment upon its findings in favor of the plaintiff and against the respondent as prayed for in his complaint.

CANNON v. McKENZIE.

1. Motions—Surprise—Leave to Renew.

Where, on motion by defendant for a change of the place of trial, he made no claim that he was taken by surprise by plaintiff's affidavit in opposition to his own affidavit and asked no time to offer further proof, a subsequent motion for leave to renew his former motion on the ground of surprise and for the purpose of introducing new evidence to rebut the affidavit of plaintiff was properly denied.

2. Judgment—Conformity to Pleading.

A complaint for board furnished, labor done, and the value of broom brush will not support a judgment for hire of a team, nor for gasoline furnished.

3. Work and Labor—Wages of Son.

Under Civ. Code, § 197, providing that a father is entitled to the services and earnings of his minor son, there may be a recovery for labor of the plaintiff's son under a complaint for labor done.

4. Sales—Action for Price—Time to Sue.

Under a contract whereby defendant purchased broom brush while the broom corn was standing in the field and agreed to cut, harvest, and bale the crop at his own expense, and the plaintiff delivered possession of the crop to him but defendant failed to perform the contract, an action for the price of the broom brush might properly be commenced before the crop was harvested and baled, where the failure to harvest and bale it was due to the fault of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

E. De Los McGee, for appellant. Donohoe & Freeman, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover the value of certain 18 tons of broom brush and for board furnished defendant and labor done. The court gave judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $612.33, with interest, and costs and disbursements, amounting to $273.45. The action was commenced in Glenn county, and summons was served in said county on October 3, 1904. Defendant appeared by demurrer, and, at the same time, served his demand in writing and notice of motion that the place of trial be changed to the city and county of San Francisco. The motion was made on the affidavit of defendant, the demand in writing and the papers and records on file in the action. The motion was heard on October 31, 1904, and at the hearing plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit of plaintiff in reply to defendant's said affidavit. The court denied the motion of defendant, to which exception was duly taken. Thereafter, on November 10, 1904, defendant served and filed his motion to vacate and set aside the order of the court made October 31st, and to grant defendant leave to renew his said motion. This latter motion was made on the alleged grounds: (1) That said order was given and made through inadvertence and mistake. (2) That the court was not fully advised as to defendant's residence. (3) That the affidavit of plaintiff is false and untrue so far as it relates to defendant's residence. (4) That defendant was taken by surprise at the hearing of said motion to change the same and was given no opportunity to reply to plaintiff's said affidavit. (5) That there is no evidence before the court sufficient to justify said order.

With defendant's said motion for leave to renew his former motion, defendant served and filed the affidavit of defendant and also the affidavit of Frank Moody, Esq., his attorney, appearing at the hearing of the first motion. It was stated in the motion that it would be heard upon the affidavits of defendant and said Moody "and upon all the papers on file in this cause, and upon such other evidence as may be introduced at the hearing of this motion." It was admitted that at the hearing of the first motion no objection was made by defendant to the introduction of plaintiff's affidavit, "nor was any time asked by counsel for defendant to reply to said affidavit." The court denied defendant's motion to vacate said order of October 31, 1904, and denied the motion for leave to renew said motion to change the place of trial. "The court, in denying defendant's motion, said that the additional showing of defendant for a change of venue should have been made in the original affidavit of defendant." No exception appears to have been taken to the order or decision of the court denying defendant's motion to set aside the first order, and to permit defendant to serve his motion for a change of the place of trial. Respondent makes the point that the second order is not appealable under section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore, not having been excepted to, cannot be reviewed. Citing section 647, Code Civ. Proc.; Grazidal v. Bastanchure, 47 Cal. 167. It is not necessary to determine the point. At the hearing of the first motion defendant stated in his affidavit that at "the commencement of the action, and long prior thereto, he was, and ever since has been, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco" and "is not now, and never has been, a resident of Glenn county." The counter affidavit of plaintiff stated that at the time of the commencement of the action, and at the time summons was served, defendant was a resident of Glenn county and that for several months prior to the commencement of this action the said George F. McKenzie has resided in the county of Glenn and many times stated to plaintiff "that he intended to reside and make his home in the county of Glenn, and would vote in said county at the election this fall, and intended to register as a voter as such." The first motion was heard on these two affidavits without objection by defendant, and without asking time to file further affidavits or submit further evidence, and at that hearing defendant made no suggestion of surprise and made no complaint, as he now makes, that plaintiff's affidavit had not been served upon him prior to the hearing. If he was taken by surprise and desired further time to meet plaintiff's affidavit he should have made known his desire then and there. His attorney deposed, in support of the second motion, that if he had been given the opportunity to reply to plaintiff's affidavit he "believes that the utter and entire falsity of plaintiff's affidavit could and would have been shown." We cannot see that he was deprived of this opportunity, for he did not ask that it be accorded to him.

As to the fact of defendant's residence, Attorney Moody made no statement. Defendant in his second affidavit merely reiterates what he stated in his first affidavit, with the additional statements that he had registered as a voter in the city and county of San Francisco, in July, 1904, which is shown by a copy of his certificate of registration; that he had been a resident of San Francisco for over 20 years and that his business had led him to visit Colusa and Sutter counties in August, 1904, for the purpose of buying broom corn, and, being unable to secure all he required, he went to Glenn county for the same purpose and was there for that purpose alone. He denied making the statements deposed to by plaintiff in his affidavit. There is nothing in the record in support of defendant's claim of surprise or excusable neglect. No new facts were before the court except as above stated, which were facts tending to corroborate the facts stated in his first affidavit. Defendant may have registered as a voter in San Francisco in July, 1904, and later have changed his residence to Glenn county. His registration in San Francisco was not conclusive as to his residence when the action was brought. The second motion was made on the papers on file, including plaintiff's affidavit. The question was within the discretion of the court, and we cannot say that there was such abuse of discretion as should compel a reversal of its orders.

The appeal from the judgment is on the judgment roll, and it is claimed that certain findings are not within the issues—namely, the finding that there is due the sum of $37.50 for hire of a team, that there is due the sum of $22.50 for the labor of plaintiff's son, and that there is due the sum of $2.25 for gasoline. The complaint was for "board furnished, labor done, and the value of 18 tons of broom brush." A demurrer to the complaint on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty was overruled, but defendant does not claim error in this regard. We do not think that plaintiff can have greater relief than he prayed for, or on issues not before the court, and hence there is no basis in the complaint for the items mentioned except the item for services of plaintiff's son. All intendments must be indulged in support of the judgment. The father is entitled to the services and earnings of his minor son. Civ. Code, § 197. The evidence under the claim for labor performed may have shown that the son was a minor, and there is no claim that defendant paid the minor. Civ. Code, § 212; Commissioners v. Barnard, 98 Cal. 199, 32 Pac. 982; Rudel v. Los Angeles County, 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400. We see no reason why the judgment for the other items mentioned in the complaint should not stand.

The court found that defendant purchased the broom brush while the broom corn was standing in the field and "agreed to cut, harvest, and bale the said crop at his own cost and expense," and that the crop was to be harvested and baled and paid for at the agreed price on September 15, 1904, and that plaintiff delivered possession of the crop to defendant on or about August 1, 1904; and the court also found that defendant failed to perform the contract on his part in all these particulars. It is claimed that because the court also found that all the broom corn was not harvested and baled at the commencement of the suit the cause of action had not accrued. But the court found that the failure of defendant to harvest and bale the crop "was due to the fault of the said defendant and not to any act or fault of the said plaintiff"; and "that the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of this action had performed in every respect the terms of his agreement of sale of said crop." There is no merit in the claim that the action was prematurely commenced.

The judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $39.75, and otherwise it is affirmed.

HUTCHASON et al. v. SPINKS.

FRAUD—ELEMENTS—RELIANCE ON REPRESENTATIONS.

In an action for fraud, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show not only fraudulent representations by the defendant, but also that they relied on the representations, and were thereby induced to enter into the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by W. E. Hutchason and others against M. E. Spinks. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Byron Waters and J. W. McKinley, for appellant. Edward L. Hutchison, E. C. Bower, and Bower & Hutchison, for respondents.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial. It is somewhat difficult to determine from the complaint the nature of the action. It appears, however, that the cause of action originated in the lease or contract of date April 13, 1901, set out in the complaint, and in the subsequent conduct of the defendant. This contract purports to be a lease of the "dental office and business" of the defendant in the city of Los Angeles, and there is contained in it, among other provisions, an agreement by the defendant that he "will not, during the term thereof, open or conduct any dental office in the city of Los Angeles, or engage directly or indirectly in the practice of dentistry in said city"; and we construe the contract, also, as being in effect a transfer of the good will of the business. Civ. Code, § 992. It is further alleged that the defendant, as an inducement for plaintiff to enter into the contract, represented to them that he was receiving from the business the sum of $1,800 per month, and that this representation was untrue; the business being worth not to exceed $250 per month; and that the plaintiffs, relying upon these representations, were induced thereby to enter into the contract. Other false representations by the defendant to the plaintiffs are also alleged; but these are, in effect, simply allegations of the promises contained in the contract, and of other promises and of failure upon the part of the defendant to perform them. The suit may, therefore, be regarded as a suit to recover damages for the misrepresentation of fact above specified, and for breach of contract; and as no objection to the joinder of these causes of action was interposed, it must be so regarded. The complaint concludes with the allegation that by reason of said misrepresentations, which will include both causes of action, the plaintiffs were damaged in the sum of $10,000, for which amount they pray judgment. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiffs in the sum of $2,994; but in the special findings the sources of the several damages suffered by the plaintiffs are distinguished, and it is found that by reason of the misrepresentations of the defendant the plaintiffs suffered damage in the sum of $2,394, and "by reason of the defendant not performing his agreements" they suffered damage in the sum of $600. The points made by the appellant are very numerous, but it will be sufficient to consider the following:

1. The jury were, in effect, instructed that if they believed from the evidence "that as an inducement for plaintiffs to purchase said business * * * the defendant represented that said business was paying from $1,800 to $2,000 per month, whereas * * * as a matter of fact, said business was not then paying more than $250 a month," they should "find for the plaintiffs." But this omits an element essential to plaintiffs' cause of action, namely, that they relied upon these representations and were thereby induced to enter into the contract. It is clear, therefore, that as to the amount $2,394 the verdict cannot be sustained.

2. As to the $600 damages for breach of contract, the matter is not so clear. According to the theory of appellant the plaintiffs, at some time subsequent to the commencement of the suit, ceased to perform the contract, and he claimed that such being the case the plaintiffs could not recover; but the jury were instructed, in effect, that if the plaintiffs had complied with the terms of the contract up to the time of the commencement of the suit, their subsequent failure of compliance would not prevent them from recovering the amount, if any, to which they were entitled when the suit commenced or while performing the terms of their contract. But the applicability of this instruction to the case depends upon a very intricate question, which we do not deem it necessary to discuss; though on this point some explanation will be necessary. By the terms of the lease set out in the complaint the consideration is stated to be $7,570; but it appears that upon the execution of the lease the plaintiffs paid the defendant in cash the sum of $4,050, making with the amount specified in the lease an aggregate of $11,620, and continued to pay the installments mentioned in the lease until the 15th day of February, 1902, thus paying in the aggregate $8,207.50, or $637.50 in excess of the amount stated in the lease. Accordingly, in the original complaint, filed September 16, 1901, it is alleged, in effect, and in the third amended complaint, filed January 18, 1902, expressly, that the consideration of the contract was the aggregate of the amount paid and the amount specified in the contract—that is to say, the sum of $11,620—which is also the theory of the defendant. But in the present complaint it is claimed by the plaintiffs that the sum mentioned in the contract, $7,570, was the whole consideration agreed upon, and that the cash payment of $4,050 was a payment upon the amount specified in the written contract. On this point the jury found specially in accordance with the theory of the plaintiffs, and one of the points urged by the defendant is that this finding is not supported by the evidence. On the other hand, it is claimed by counsel for the appellant that the matter was not in issue; and in this we agree. But the question was material to the instruction under consideration; for upon the defendant's theory of the case it would have been applicable. Upon the case as presented to us on this appeal, however, it has no application; nor can we assume that on another appeal it will become so. We, therefore, deem it unnecessary to pass upon the correctness of the instruction.

3. There are some other instructions bearing upon the credibility of the testimony of a witness, the correctness of which is at least doubtful. But upon this point and the numerous, or rather innumerable, other points presented in the case, we deem it unnecessary to enter.

For the error first above specified, the order appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

ADMINISTRATORS—SPECIAL ADMINISTRATORS—ACCOUNTING AND SETTLEMENT.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1622–1627, relating to accounting and settlements of executors and administrators, applies to special administrators appointed under the provisions of section 1411 et seq., so that it is the duty of the judge to hear and determine issues made by an account of a special administrator and objections thereto, before the appointment of a regular administrator.

Application by Louise A. French and others for a writ of mandamus to the superior court of San Diego county and N. H. Conklin, judge thereof. Writ granted.

C. H. Rippey, E. W. Britt, and Hunsaker & Britt, for plaintiffs. W. J. Mossholder and Stearns & Sweet, for defendants.

SMITH, J. In this case, one C. W. Buker was, on the 27th day of July, 1903, duly appointed special administrator of the estate of Harriet M. Arnold, deceased, pending the contests of two wills of the decedent of different dates, which still remain undetermined, and has duly qualified as such. May 10, 1904, he rendered and filed in the superior court a report and account or exhibit of the property of the estate received by him and of payments made by him as such administrator. The account or exhibit prayed that a day be appointed for the hearing thereof, and upon the hearing the same be allowed, approved, and settled; and accordingly notice of such hearing was given by the clerk in the usual manner. The matter, however, was not taken up by the court at the time appointed or afterward; but on the 28th day of March, 1905, the plaintiffs, who are heirs of the deceased and beneficiaries under either will, filed in the superior court their objections to the account and contested the allowance and settlement of the same, and thereafter, upon due notice to the court, moved the court to hear and determine the issues thus presented. But the court refused, and has ever since refused, to hear or determine the issues made by said account and objections, or to appoint a time for the hearing thereof; and this proceeding is an application for a writ of mandamus compelling the court to act in the premises.

From the answer of the defendant Conklin it appears that the motion to hear the case was denied by the court on the grounds following: "(5) That there is no law or provision of law in said state of California requiring or authorizing or permitting said special administrator of said estate to make, render or present any account of his administration of said estate prior to the time of the appointment of a regular administrator of said estate, or the appointment of an executor under the last will and testament of said decedent. (6) That there is no law or provision of law in said state authorizing or empowering or directing said superior court, or said respondent N. H. Conklin as the Judge thereof, to settle or refuse to settle, allow or refuse to allow, or approve or disapprove said account and report of said special administrator prior to the appointment of a regular administrator or an executor as aforesaid. (7) That said superior court has not, nor has said respondent N. H. Conklin, any jurisdiction to allow or disallow, approve or disapprove, or settle or refuse to settle said account of said special administrator prior to the appointment of a regular administrator or executor as aforesaid. * * * (12) That should said court settle, allow, and approve said account, the order settling, allowing, and approving the same would not bind any heir of said decedent or any legatee or devisee named in the last will and testament of said decedent, nor any executor or administrator of said estate who might hereafter be appointed. * * * (17) That there is no law or provision of law in said state requiring or authorizing or empowering said special administrator to make any report of his acts as such special administrator prior to the close of his administration as such special administrator."

Upon this showing, we are of the opinion that the court in refusing to hear the case declined to perform functions devolving upon it by the law. A special administrator is, according to the ordinary use of language, merely a kind of administrator; and accordingly the provisions specially referring to him in section 1411 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, form but part of the general chapter entitled "Of Executors and Administrators," etc. We think it clear, therefore, that it was the intention of the Legislature that the provisions of this chapter, so far as applicable, should apply to the case of a special administrator, and hence that sections 1622 to 1627, inclusive, are applicable, and the court should have heard the case. As to the kind of order or judgment that should be entered by the court, or its effect as an estoppel, these are questions that it would not be proper to consider in this proceeding; but we are clearly of the opinion that it is the duty of the court to hear the case and at least to take such action with regard thereto as may be necessary for the preservation of the estate.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandamus be issued to the defendants, requiring the court and the judge thereof to hear and determine the issues raised by the exhibit of the special administrator, and the objection thereto of the plaintiffs heretofore filed, and to render such judgment or order thereon as it may be advised.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

DANIELS v. DANIELS et al.

1. Pleading—Judgment on Pleadings—Motion—Effect.

Where in an action on a note, the answer merely stated that the cause of action was barred by limitations, a motion for judgment on the pleadings did not admit the truth of the allegation that the cause of action was barred.

2. Limitation of Actions—Action on Note—Accrual.

Civ. Code, § 1642, provides that several contracts relating to the same matter and parts of substantially the same transaction are to be taken together, and by section 1636 effect must be given to every part of the contract. At the time of making a demand note, without interest, and as a part of the same transaction, the parties executed an instrument reciting the execution of the note in payment for shares of stock and providing that the note should be given to a third person and retained by him until the death of one of the makers, provided it occurred within a specified time, and that upon such death or the expiration of such time the third party should deliver the notes to the payees. Held, that limitations did not commence to run against the note until the death of the maker mentioned.

3. Contracts—Consideration.

There was a sufficient consideration for the agreement as the consideration for the notes would support the agreement, and the forbearance evidenced by the suspension of the right to sue was a part of the consideration for which the notes were given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; A. G. Burnett, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Daniels against Sarah L. Daniels, as executrix, and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. H. Pond and J. H. & R. L. Thompson, for appellants. W. B. Kollmyer, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. It appears from the complaint herein that on the 5th day of June, 1897, at Chicago, Ill., Newell Daniels and Sarah L. Daniels made and executed their promissory note for $1,000 without interest, payable to Walter A. Daniels at his office in Chicago upon demand, and at the same time and place made and executed a similar note for a like amount to Adelaide M. and Cora Jean Daniels. That at the time the said notes were so made and executed, and as a part of the same transaction, the payors, who were described as residents of the state of California, as parties of the first part, the payees, as sole heirs at law of Leo H. Daniels, deceased, as parties of the second part, and one James A. Stoddard of Chicago, as party of the third part, entered into an agreement in writing, reciting the execution of the two notes, in renewal of two notes given to secure the payment of 61 shares of stock in the Milwaukee Cranberry Company, representing an interest in 680 acres of land in Wisconsin, and recording their mutual agreement with regard thereto. which was, in substance, as follows: It was mutually covenanted that the two notes be placed in the keeping of the third party to be by him or his legal representatives retained until the death of Newell Daniels provided such death occurred within 9½ years from date thereof; that the payors might pay or renew either or both of the notes at any time within the period mentioned; and that upon the death of Newell Daniels, or at the expiration of 9½ years, if he should live so long, the third party, upon notification, would immediately deliver the notes to the parties of the second part, their heirs, executors, or administrators, to be used by them as they might deem proper "by negotiating them or otherwise." It was further alleged in the complaint that Newell Daniels died on April 16, 1904, that Sarah L. Daniels was the duly appointed, qualified and acting executrix of his will, that claims upon said notes in due form had been presented within the time allowed by law, and rejected, and that plaintiff was the assignee of the payees and claimants Adelaide M. and Cora Jean Daniels. The defendant demurred to the complaint on general grounds, and on the special ground that the causes of action therein stated were barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was overruled, and an answer was filed which contained only an affirmative allegation that Newell and Sarah L. Daniels had resided in this state continuously for more than four years prior to the death of the former, and a reiteration of the plea that the causes of action were barred by the statute of limitations. The court granted plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, and this appeal is from the judgment thereupon entered.

As preliminary to the main inquiry touching the plea of the statute of limitations, it is contended that the motion for judgment on the pleadings admits the truth of the averments that the causes of action are barred by the provisions of section 337 and subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention cannot be sustained. While the ordinary rule is that such a motion must be treated as an admission that every substantive fact stated in the answer is true, that rule cannot have the conclusive effect claimed for it here. The absence of denials in the answer was an express admission that every fact alleged in the complaint was true. The answer must, therefore, be construed as confessing such facts, and the special plea in bar of the causes of action thereby admitted must be treated as an averment that, though the facts so admitted and affirmatively alleged are true, the bar of the sections of the Code enumerated had intervened when the complaint was filed. In other words, such special plea is a conclusion of law which the law for mere convenience tolerates in a pleading, but the sufficiency of such plea rests on facts admitted or proven. If the facts show that the causes of action are barred, the plea attaches and the plaintiff must be denied relief. If the facts demonstrate the contrary, it would be giving the plea undue force to say that it not only contradicts the other admissions, but conclusively establishes something which is admittedly untrue. We are of the opinion that the causes of action stated in the complaint were not barred by the provisions of law relied upon, when that pleading was filed. It stands admitted that the agreement was executed contemporaneously with the notes, as part of the same transaction, and that the notes were thereupon delivered to and deposited with Stoddard under the terms of the contract. "Several contracts relating to the same matters between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially the same transaction, are to be taken together." Civ. Code, § 1642. Therefore, the notes and auxiliary agreement must be viewed as one contract, and construed as a whole, effect must be given to every part, to the end that the intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting may be effectuated. Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1642. So viewed, it must receive an interpretation that will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect if this can be done without violating the evident intention of the parties, and if uncertainty exists the language must be interpreted most strongly against the promisors, who are, presumably, the parties who caused the uncertainty to exist. Civ. Code, §§ 1643, 1654, 3541, 3543. The purpose and intention of the parties to the transaction as evidenced by the auxiliary agreement, seems quite evident. The execution and unconditional delivery of the notes would create the relation of debtors and creditors, with the correlative rights pertaining to such relation. If it was not intended that the legal rights which would otherwise result from the delivery of the notes and the relation thereby created, would be changed, modified, or suspended by the agreement, then it could have no possible purpose or object. But that such was the intention is apparent from the context. By the general terms of the agreement the notes were placed in the keeping of Stoddard until death or lapse of time should entitle the payees to the full possession and control thereof. Unless it was intended by such general terms to suspend the legal rights incident to complete delivery and control of the notes, there could be no necessity for the insertion of a clause reserving the right of the debtors to pay or renew either or both of the notes. They would have this right as debtors under ordinary circumstances, and the only purpose the reservation could have would be to guard against a postponement or suspension of the particular rights reserved, which would otherwise result from the general terms and conditions upon which the notes were delivered to and held by Stoddard. If it was not intended that the right of the payees to collect, control, indorse, negotiate, and use the notes would be postponed or suspended, then there could be no object in stipulating that the right to possess, control, use, and negotiate them should only accrue after death or flight of time had rendered their delivery by Stoddard a duty. Indeed there could be no necessity for placing the notes in the hands of a stranger for a stated period unless the design was to deprive the payee of the rights which ordinarily attend the complete delivery, control and possession of negotiable instruments. A fair, unstrained and reasonable construction of the agreement leads to the conclusion that the notes were delivered to Stoddard as escrows to be delivered upon the death of Daniels or the expiration of the prescribed period of time. It was perfectly competent for the parties to enter into such an agreement. Daniels on Negotiable Instruments (5th Ed.) § 68; Witmer Bros. v. Weid, 108 Cal. 574, 41 Pac. 491; Bradbury v. Davenport, 120 Cal. 152, 52 Pac. 301; Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 496, 45 Pac. 867. And the statute of limitations did not commence to run until the death of Newell Daniels when a cause of action accrued on each of the notes. Smith v. Lawrence, 38 Cal. 29, 99 Am. Dec. 344; State Loan, etc., Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 252, 62 Pac. 466, 600; W. F. Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 674, 60 Pac. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647; McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 283, 19 Pac. 499.

If this is not the proper construction of the agreement then but one other is possible, and that is that the payees thereby agreed to suspend their legal rights and forego the pursuit of legal remedies which would otherwise be open to them, during the time the notes were held by Stoddard under the agreement. Under the former construction the time necessary to complete the bar of the statute would not commence to run until the death of Daniels, and under the latter the running of such time was suspended while the impediment created by the agreement of the parties endured. Harrington v. Home L. Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 540, 58 Pac. 180, 61 Pac. 99, and cases cited supra. In either event the causes of action were not barred by the provisions of law relied upon. There was a sufficient consideration for the agreement. Aside from the fact that the notes and agreement were part of the same transaction, and that the consideration for the notes would support the agreement, it was perfectly competent for the parties to agree that the notes should be delivered at a specified time and in a particular manner. In any event, the forbearance evidenced by the suspension of legal right to sue on notes bearing no interest must be considered as being an essential part of the consideration for which the notes were given.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. VANDEPEER et al.

JUDGMENT — RES JUDICATA—DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE.

Where a residuary legatee was properly brought before the court on the hearing on an application for distribution, and she did not appeal from the judgment, which among other things distributed a certain sum to the executors, she could not thereafter attack the judgment in equity on the ground that the distribution to the executors was violative of the constitutional provision against perpetuities, though the executors held the legacy merely in trust, and though it did not appear upon the record whether the objection was considered on the application for distribution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Suit by Catherine Smith against J. G. Vandepeer and another. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. Kinsell, for appellant. J. B. Richardson, for respondents.

HARRISON, P. J. The last will and testament of Fannie Simpson appointed the defendants herein as its executors, and contained among other provisions the following: "Fourth. I desire to be buried beside my husband in the cemetery of San Lorenzo; and I give, devise and bequeath to my executors hereinafter named the sum of two thousand dollars, in trust, however, that they shall invest the same in such way as their good judgment shall dictate so as to produce an annual income, which income shall be applied perpetually to keep in repair, embellish and make attractive our burial lot in said cemetery."

"Tenth. All the remainder of my estate

I give and bequeath to my sister the said Catherine Smith."

The testatrix died December 26, 1891, and on January 11, 1892, her will was admitted to probate by the superior court of Alameda county, and on the same day letters testamentary thereon were issued to the defendants. Thereafter such proceedings were had that on January 16, 1893, the superior court settled the final account of the executors, and made its decree of distribution of said estate, in and by which it distributed to the defendants herein the sum of $2,000 in trust (setting forth the provisions of the trust as stated in the will), and distributed to the plaintiff herein all the remainder of the estate of said decedent, which was described in said decree as "and all the rest of said estate, whether herein described or not." The $2,000 thus distributed to the defendants was received by them February 20, 1893, and, with the exception of so much thereof as has been expended in the care of said burial plot, they still have the same in their possession, together with its accumulations. March 2, 1904, the plaintiff brought the present action against the defendants, alleging that under the Constitution of the state no perpetuity is allowed except for eleemosynary purposes, and that by the above clause in her will the testatrix attempted to create a perpetuity which is not for eleemosynary purposes, that the judgment of the court distributing the legacy to be held by the defendants for the purposes of said trust is void, and that as the residuary legatee of the decedent she is entitled to the same, together with its accumulations, and praying that the defendants be declared to hold the same for her benefit, and that they render an account thereof, and be directed to pay the same to her. A demurrer to this complaint on the part of the defendants was sustained, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

In the cases of William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323, Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 Pac. 44, Goldtree v. Allison, 119 Cal. 344, 51 Pac. 561, Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, 51 Pac. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 145, Trust of Trescony, 119 Cal. 568, 51 Pac. 951, Jewell v. Pierce, 120 Cal. 79, 52 Pac. 132, and Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 148, 61 Pac. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100, the nature and effect of a decree of distribution of the estate of a decedent, and its conclusiveness upon the rights of heirs, legatees, and devisees, have been so fully discussed and distinctly stated that a mere reference to those cases is sufficient to show that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained.

The plaintiff seeks herein, by a suit in equity, to make a collateral attack upon the validity of a judgment of a court that had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of all the parties interested therein and which, by reason of lapse of time since its rendition and entry, has become final. The same principles attach to a judgment of a superior court in a matter of probate, as to its judgment in actions at law or suits in equity (Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 Pac. 458), and for any error committed by the court in its decree of distribution, whether in matter of fact or in the application of the law to the facts before it, the party aggrieved must seek his remedy by appeal. Mere error is not a ground for relief in equity. Daley v. Pennie, 86 Cal. 552, 25 Pac. 67, 21 Am. St. Rep. 61; Lynch v. Rooney, 112 Cal. 279, 44 Pac. 565.

The plaintiff herein was a party interested in the distribution of the estate of the decedent, and was properly brought before the court at the hearing upon the application therefor. Whether she then made the objection to the validity of the provision in the will which she now makes does not appear; but, whether she made it or not, she had the opportunity to do so, and, whether she did or neglected to do so, she is equally bound by the decree. William Hill Co. v. Lawler, supra. Nor does it appear from the record whether this objection was considered by the court; but the omission of the court to place upon the record its ruling upon the objection cannot impair the effect of the judgment which it rendered. It was its duty to consider all of the provisions of the will, and to determine the validity of the above provision before making the decree of distribution (Goldtree v. Allison, supra); and, as it distributed the legacy to the defendants, it must be assumed that it determined that the provision was valid and created a valid trust. Its action in this respect must receive the same consideration as if, upon an objection made by the plaintiff at the hearing, the court had overruled the same, and incorporated into its decree a specific finding that the trust was not created for eleemosynary purposes and did not purport to create a perpetuity. If it should be conceded that the court erred in making such finding, it was competent for the plaintiff to waive the error so far as it affected her rights, and by failing to appeal therefrom, she has waived it.

The conclusiveness of the judgment is not affected by the fact that it involved the construction of a provision of the Constitution instead of a statute. A statute passed by the Legislature within its constitutional power is as authoritative and of as high a sanction as is a provision of the Constitution. Each is an expression of the sovereign will of the people—the one by its direct vote; the other by its duly constituted representatives—and the failure of a court to give a proper construction to either is but an error of law. Neither is the conclusiveness of the judgment impaired by the fact that the defendants hold the legacy distributed to them merely in trust, and have no personal interest therein. The exigencies of this appeal do not require us to determine whether this trust is valid or not; but, conceding the claim of the plaintiff to be correct, the jurisdiction of the court to determine that question was not affected thereby, and not having been reversed remains binding upon all parties to the proceeding. An erroneous judgment that is unreversed is binding upon the parties thereto as an adjudication of their rights, and, when invoked before any other tribunal, is conclusive thereof. Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 221; People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re YOUNG'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1906.)

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF—SERVICE—"ADVERSE PARTIES."

On application for partial distribution of the estate of a decedent, persons claiming as devisees under the will left by decedent and appearing in that capacity to contest the petition for partial distribution were "adverse parties," within Code Civ. Proc. § 650, declaring that a draft of the bill of exceptions or a copy thereof must, within 10 days after notice of entry of judgment, be served upon the adverse party.

2. APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE—FAILURE TO SERVE BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where, on petition for partial distribution of the estate of a decedent, devisees in a will left by decedent appeared and moved to strike the petition from the files which was done, the judgment could not be overthrown on appeal without affecting the interests of those devisees, and hence failure to serve upon them a draft of the bill of exceptions, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, necessitated an affirmance of the judgment, so far as points contained only in the bill of exceptions were concerned.

3. SAME—FAILURE TO SHOW ERROR.

Where the record on appeal merely showed the filing by appellants of a petition for the partial distribution of a decedent's estate, and the making and granting of a motion to strike the petition from the files on the ground that a previous similar proceeding had terminated in the final judgment denying the relief sought, no error was shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Separate petitions by Pauline Young Hyde and Sarah Young against A. St. Clair and others, as executors, for partial distribution of the estate of M. Young, deceased. From orders striking the petitions from the files, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Scrivner and William M. Aydelotte (Alfred H. Cohen, of counsel), for appellants. Jeter & Makinney, W. P. Netherton, and Hugh R. Osborn, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. M. Young died, leaving a last will, which was admitted to probate in the superior court of Santa Cruz county, and letters testamentary thereon were issued to A. St. Clair and William Armstrong on the 27th of April, 1903. On December 12, 1904, Pauline Young Hyde, one of the appellants, filed a petition for partial distribution, in which she alleged that the decedent had left as his sole heirs four children, of whom she was one, and that said decedent had, by an omission not appearing to be intentional, failed to provide in his will for any of his said children. The executors met this petition by a motion to strike the same from the files, and a similar motion was made, upon notice to the petitioner, by K. A. Osborn and three others named as residuary devisees in the will. Subsequently, a similar petition for partial distribution was filed by Sarah Young, claiming to be one of the children and heirs of M. Young, and motions to strike this petition from the files were made by the executors and the four devisees above mentioned. The petitions and motions having been submitted, the court made an order, in which it "adjudged and decreed that the said petitions of Pauline Young Hyde and Sarah Young, and each of them, be, and the same hereby are, denied and dismissed." From this order the petitioners prosecute this appeal.

The points made by the appellants for reversal appear in a bill of exceptions. This bill contains a recital by the judge of the trial court to the effect that the draft of the proposed bill of exceptions had not been served on the respondent devisees within the time allowed by law. Said devisees objecting to the settlement of the bill, the judge sustained their objections and refused settlement of the bill "so far as it relates to or purports to in any way bind said devisees," and settled it "so far as it relates to the executors." It is now contended by the respondents that the order must be affirmed for want of a bill of exceptions binding all the necessary parties to the appeal. Under section 650, Code of Civil Procedure, the draft of a bill of exceptions, or a copy thereof, must, within 10 days after notice of entry of judgment, be served upon the adverse party. The phrase "adverse party" is also found in section 940, relating to service of notice of appeal, and as used in that section has been construed many times by this court. Such "adverse party" is defined in Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637, to be "every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to or will be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken." O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 319; Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, 66 Cal. 195, 5 Pac. 85; In re Castle Dome, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 249, 21 Pac. 746; Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 267, 33 Pac. 1103; Vincent v. Collins, 122 Cal. 390, 55 Pac. 129; Estate of Scott, 124 Cal. 671, 57 Pac. 654; Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 501, 77 Pac. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102. And, except as hereinafter stated, service of a notice of appeal on every adverse party is essential to give the appellate court jurisdiction of the appeal. (See cases cited above.) It is true that notice need not be served on all parties to the action if a modification sought can be effected without affecting the rights of those not served. Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, supra; Miller v. Thomas, 71 Cal. 406, 12 Pac. 432. And not every person who may be affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment or order is an "adverse party," who must be served. The "adverse party" upon whom a notice of appeal is to be served is the party who appears by the record to be adverse. Harper v. Hildreth, supra; In re Ryer's Estate, 110 Cal. 556, 42 Pac. 1082; In re Bullard's Estate, 114 Cal. 462, 46 Pac. 297. That is, a party who has appeared and taken part in the proceeding in the lower court. Estate of McDougald, 143 Cal. 476, 77 Pac. 443. No doubt the phrase "adverse party" is to be given a similar interpretation as applied to service of bills of exception. In the present case, the devisees respondent were "adverse parties," who were entitled to service of a draft of the bill. They, as claimants under the will, would be directly and most injuriously affected if the appellants should succeed in reversing the order here appealed from, since, if the facts alleged in the petition for partial distribution should be established, the petitioners (together with their brother and sister) would succeed to the entire estate. The rights of the devisees could not be protected if any modification or reversal of the order should be made. And such devisees, having appeared in the lower court to resist the application for partial distribution, are parties who appear by the record to be adverse. Indeed, the devisees are the only parties to the record having a substantial interest in opposing the distribution sought. The executors, while authorized to resist an application for partial distribution (Code Civ. Proc. § 1660; Estate of Kelley, 63 Cal. 106), have no interest in having the property go to one rather than another of the contending claimants of the estate. If, then, the devisees who appeared and resisted the petitions in the superior court were adverse parties who were entitled to service of a draft of the bill of exceptions, what is the effect of failure to so serve them? A failure to serve some of the necessary parties does not require or authorize the trial court to refuse to settle the bill at all (Gutierrez v. Hebberd, 106 Cal. 167, 39 Pac. 529), nor does it affect the jurisdiction of the appellate court to entertain the appeal. Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 92 Cal. 155, 28 Pac. 221; In re Ryer's Estate, 110 Cal. 556, 42 Pac. 1082; In re Bullard's Estate, 114 Cal. 462, 46 Pac. 297; Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 25, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81; Scott's Estate, 124 Cal. 671, 57 Pac. 654; Sutter County v. Tisdale, 128 Cal. 180, 60 Pac. 757. But, while an appeal duly perfected will not be dismissed for such failure, a want of service on an adverse party of a notice of intention to move for a new trial is a good ground for affirming an order denying the motion (In re Ryer's Estate, supra; McMahon v. Thomas, 114 Cal. 588, 46 Pac. 732; In re Bullard's Estate, supra; Johnson v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 146 Cal. 571, 80 Pac. 719), and the same effect must follow a failure to serve a draft of a bill of exceptions on an adverse party, if the points made for reversal appear only in the bill. See Gutierrez v. Hebberd, supra; Howell v. Howell, 101 Cal. 115, 35 Pac. 443; Randall v. Duff, 105 Cal. 271, 38 Pac. 739. The devisees who appeared in the lower court were entitled to be heard in opposition to the petitions; they are equally entitled to be heard on the appeal; they cannot be bound by a record in the making of which they have not had the opportunity to participate which the statute gives them; a reversal or modification cannot be ordered as to any party without affecting their rights. It follows that the bill of exceptions cannot be considered for any purpose on this appeal.

But it is contended by the appellants that no bill of exceptions was necessary, and that without it the record contains all that is necessary for a review of the order complained of. In fact, the entire transcript is made up of the bill of exceptions, followed by a notice of appeal, and a stipulation (subject, as to the devisees, to all objections and exceptions) that the "foregoing is a full, true and correct transcript on appeal," and that an undertaking has been filed. If this be regarded as a sufficient authentication of such papers contained in the bill as would constitute what may be called the judgment roll, we find as to each petitioner a petition for partial distribution, based on the theory that such petitioner was a child of the decedent, who had unintentionally omitted in his will to provide for her; two demurrers to the petition; two motions to strike the petition from the files on the ground, among others, that theretofore, a similar proceeding on behalf of the petitioner had terminated in a final judgment denying the relief sought, and adjudging that the omission by the testator to provide for the petitioner was intentional, and that she was not entitled to any share of the estate; and an order, which, after finding in support of such allegation as to a prior judgment, denies and dismisses the petition for partial distribution. This shows no error. Assuming the finding of the lower court to have been sustained by the evidence (as, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, we must) the prior adjudication against the rights of the petitioners concluded them on this hearing. In this discussion we treat the motion to strike from the files as substantially an answer. It raised issues of fact, on which evidence was taken, and findings made. If, however, such motion is not to be treated as an answer, the petitioners are not helped. In that view, there is nothing in the record to be considered except the petitions, the demurrers and the order dismissing and denying the petitions, and on the face of these papers no error appears. The facts recited and found in the order fully justify the conclusion reached.

The foregoing views necessitate the affirmance of the order appealed from without a determination of the points made by the appellant. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that the appeal cannot be decided on the merits of the questions litigated in the lower court, but this result cannot be avoided without depriving the respondent devisees of clear and substantial rights.

The order is affirmed.

In re LUX'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1906.)

1. PERPETUITIES — SUSPENDING POWER OF ALIENATION—TRUSTS.

A will, devising property in trust for the life of testator's son and the lives of the children of such son as were living at testator's death, with a provision whereby it might terminate sooner, the property to be then divided between the children of such son then living whether born before or after testator's death, does not contravene Civ. Code, § 715, prohibiting the suspension of the absolute power of alienation by any limitation or condition for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition; as the will speaks only from the death of testator.

2. WILLS—PROPERTY DEVISED — COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

All and not merely one-half of community property, of which testator became the absolute owner by the death of his wife after the making of his will, passed under it, it in terms purporting to cover all his property "real, personal, and mixed, and wheresoever the same may be," notwithstanding a provision whereby he declared that all of the estate of which he was possessed was his separate estate, except a certain lot, and that, in his disposition of his estate by the will, he had undertaken to dispose of all his separate property and one-half of the community property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Henry Lux, deceased. From the decree of distribution, V. M. Turney appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Kennedy, for appellant. Wm. A. Bowden, Wm. P. Veuve, and Leo Archer, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from the decree of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Henry Lux, deceased. The sole appellant is one V. W. Turney, who claimed, as the successor of Charles H. Lux, a son of deceased, that an undivided one-sixth of a lot in the city of San José should be distributed to her. His claim is based on the fact that prior to the death of deceased, one Clayton had recovered a judgment against said Charles H. Lux for $493.75, that after such death an execution was issued on said judgment, whereunder the interest of Charles H. Lux in said lot was sold to her, and a certificate of sale therefor issued to her. For this reason, she claims to be entitled to distribution of whatever interest in said lot said Charles H. Lux would have been entitled to from his father's estate, if such execution sale had not been made, section 1678, Code Civ. Proc. providing that distribution may be made, although some of the original heirs, legatees, or devisees may have conveyed their share to other persons, and such shares must be assigned to the person holding the same, in the same manner as they otherwise would have been to such heirs, legatees or devisees.

Disregarding the objections of respondents as to the right of appellant, under these circumstances, to be heard on distribution, the real question presented is as to whether or not Charles H. Lux was entitled to any portion of his father's estate, or rather, to any portion of said lot of land. If he was not so entitled, it is plain that one claiming as his successor in interest in said lot would not be entitled to any relief in this proceeding. For the purposes of this proceeding, appellant, at best, simply stood in the place of Charles H. Lux, and was entitled to relief only as to such portion of said lot as said Lux was entitled to receive on distribution of his father's estate. In re Angle's Estate (Cal. Sup.) 82 Pac. 668. The lower court distributed the estate upon the theory that Charles H. Lux was entitled to no portion of the estate. The deceased left a will which was duly admitted to probate, and on which the distribution was based. Charles H. Lux was not a devisee or legatee. It is claimed that a trust attempted to be created as to a portion of the estate was void, and that as to this portion, the deceased died intestate. It is further claimed that if the trust was valid, nevertheless the deceased died intestate as to an undivided one-half of the lot in question. These claims will be separately considered.

By his will, the deceased, after providing for a few legacies, gave "all the rest, residue and remainder" of the estate to his wife, for her life, and upon her death one-third thereof to each of two daughters, and the remaining one-third to his said daughters in trust. The provisions of the will as to the trust, so far as material to appellant's contention, were as follows, viz.:

"Eighth. The uses and purposes upon which I give, devise and bequeath the remaining one-third (1–3rd) of the aforesaid estate to said Lizzie M. Pott, and said Lena B. MacBride are as follows: During the continuance of the trust term herein provided, the trustees are to have, hold, manage, and control the said trust property, and to pay over the net income derived therefrom to my son, Charles H. Lux, and in the event of his death, then to his children in equal shares, the issue of any deceased child taking by right of representation. Upon the termination of the trust term herein created, then the trust property shall be divided between all the children of Charles H. Lux, then living, in equal shares, the issue of any deceased child taking by right of representation; and to them and in that event I hereby devise the property so directed to be divided amongst them. In the event there be no issue of said Charles H. Lux living at the termination of the trust term herein provided, then I direct that the said trust property shall be divided between my two daughters, Lizzie M. Pott and Lena B. MacBride, share and share alike, and to them and in that event I hereby devise said property. The trust term herein created is to continue during the life of my son, Charles H. Lux, and of all of his children who are living at the time of my death. With the death of the survivor of them the said trust is to terminate. It is furthermore to terminate before that time in the event of the occurrence before that time of the death of said Charles H. Lux, and of the attainment of the age of twenty-one (21) years by all his surviving children. * * *

"Tenth. I hereby authorize and empower my said trustees, or either of them who shall act, and their successors in office, to sell any part of my estate, real or personal, herein devised to them, at public or private sale, and with or without notice, as they may determine, and without the order of any court, and to execute good and valid conveyances and transfers thereof; also to invest and reinvest the proceeds of sales of property, and to purchase or acquire other property, or apply the proceeds of sales of property to the improvement of other property; also to lease property, and to borrow or lend such sums of money as they may deem best, and to secure the repayment of loans by mortgage or other lien or transfer of real or personal property; also to make compromises and settlements."

It is urged that the attempted trust is void in that it is repugnant to the provisions of section 715 of the Civil Code, which prohibits the suspension of the absolute power of alienation by any limitation or condition whatever, "for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition, except in the single case mentioned in section 772," which is not applicable to this case. It is manifest, however, that there is in the provisions of the will in question no suspension of the power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of lives in being at the creation of the limitation or condition, and the will was apparently very carefully drawn with a view to comply literally with the statute invoked. The will explicitly provides as follows: "The trust term herein created is to continue during the life of my son, Charles H. Lux, and of all of his children who are living at the time of my (the testator's) death. With the death of the survivor of them the said trust is to terminate." In no event can the trust, according to its terms, continue after the death of Charles H. Lux, and such of his children as were living at the time of the death of deceased, in other words, it cannot continue for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at that time. According to other provisions, it may end sooner, but it cannot exist longer. The will speaks and is enforceable only from the death of deceased, and the limitation or condition was created, within the meaning of section 715, Civ. Code, only upon the death of deceased, and not at the time of the execution of the will. While it is true, as stated by appellant, that by reason of the provisions requiring that upon the termination of the trust, the trust property shall be divided between all of the children of Charles H. Lux then living, children born after the death of deceased and before the termination of the trust would receive a share of the property, this in no degree affects the term of the trust, or prolongs the period of suspension of alienation. The devise to the trustee became effectual only at the death of deceased. The limitation or condition which had the effect of suspending the absolute power of alienation was created when the devise became effectual. Under the provisions of the will, the trust cannot continue beyond the continuance of lives of persons in being at that time.

Other objections made to the trust provision require very little notice here. There was no forbidden "trust to convey," as in the Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70, and kindred cases. Provisions similar to those contained in the tenth paragraph of the will, quoted above, were not held invalid in the Estate of Fair, 136 Cal. 79, 68 Pac. 306, as claimed by appellant. We see no reason to doubt that the trust created by this will was fully within the provisions of section 857, Civ. Code, enumerating the purposes for which express trusts may be created. We are unable to perceive the applicability of section 774, Civ. Code, prohibiting the limitation of successive estates for life, except to certain persons.

The claim that deceased died intestate as to an undivided one-half of the particular lot in controversy, is based upon the following provision of the will, viz.:

"Fourteenth. I hereby declare that all of the estate of which I am possessed is my separate estate, except a lot on the east line of First street, between San Antonio and San Carlos streets, in the City of San José, which lot has a frontage of seventy feet and a depth of about one hundred and thirty-seven feet; and in my disposition of my estate hereinbefore contained I have undertaken to dispose of all of my separate estate and one-half of the community property."

The lot of land described in this provision is apparently the land in controversy. It appears that the wife of deceased died after the execution of this will and prior to the death of deceased, whereupon the deceased became, of course, the absolute owner of all the community property, without administration. Civ. Code, § 1401. It is claimed that the provision quoted shows that the testator intended that the will should not be operative as to the undivided one-half of the lot described and that he consequently died intestate in regard thereto. We are of the opinion that construing all the parts of the will in relation to each other (Civ. Code, § 1321), it is clearly apparent that the testator intended that the will should be operative as to all property which he was entitled to devise at the time of his decease. The disposing parts of the will are broad and sweeping, and in terms purport to cover all his property, "real, personal and mixed, and wheresoever the same may be." In the absence of a contrary intention, manifestly appearing in the will, they would be operative as to all property owned by him at the time of his death, which he was then entitled to devise. Such a contrary intention is not shown by the provision relied on. That provision indicates simply the claim of the testator that all of the property then possessed by him except this lot was his separate property, and, further, that it was his intention to dispose by his will of all property over which he had the power of testamentary disposition, viz., all his separate property, and one half of the community property, the other half being, as long as it remained community property, not subject to his testamentary disposition (Civ. Code, § 1402). The provision doubtless shows that the testator contemplated that if he died before his wife, she, under the law, would succeed to an undivided one-half of the lot in question, and that his will would not, in that event, be operative in regard thereto, but it shows no intention to exclude from the operation of the will any property which he might be entitled to devise at the time of his death. Instead of being a limitation on the previous portions of the will, disposing of all the property subject to the testamentary disposition of deceased, it is rather a reaffirmance thereof. It thus appears that Charles H. Lux was entitled to no part of his father's estate, either under the will or as an heir, and appellant as his successor was, therefore, properly denied any relief by the lower court.

Some doubt may exist as to whether the practice adopted in the lower court in this proceeding was entirely regular. To the petition for final distribution, presented with the final account, appellant filed her written objections, setting up her claims as hereinbefore stated, and asking that distribution be made of the undivided one-half of the lot in question, regardless of the will. Demurrers were interposed to the writing so presented by appellant, and these demurrers were sustained. If it be assumed that the allegations made by appellant in her objections were on their face sufficient to entitle her to relief on distribution, and that technical error was committed in sustaining the demurrers thereto, it is nevertheless manifest that so far as the alleged right of Charles H. Lux to take some portion of his father's estate is concerned, and without which appellant could take nothing, appellant's claim was based entirely on the language of the will of deceased. If the trust thereby attempted to be created was valid under the laws of this state, and if a proper construction of the provisions of the will made it operative as to all property owned by deceased at the time of his death, concededly Charles H. Lux was entitled to nothing. Appellant's only contention is that the attempted trust is invalid on its face, and that the will on its face shows an intention on the part of testator that it should not be operative as to an undivided one-half of the lot in controversy. In support of this contention, she has incorporated the will in the bill of exceptions on this appeal, and it is apparent therefrom, as is already shown, that her claim in this behalf is not well founded. Regardless, therefore, of the question as to whether the demurrers were properly sustained, appellant could not have been prejudicially affected by the action of the lower court in that regard. The conclusion of that court to the effect that, upon the proper construction of the will, Charles H. Lux was entitled to no part of his father's estate was correct, and effectually disposes of appellant's claim.

In view of our conclusions upon the questions discussed, we have deemed it unnecessary to consider the question as to the right of the appellant to be heard on distribution.

The order or decree of distribution appealed from is affirmed.

In re PEASE'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1906.)

1. Executors and Administrators—Credits—Payment before Appointment.

Credits in an executor's account for payments made by him before his appointment, claim for which he never presented to the court, and with which at the time he made them he did not intend to charge deceased, are properly disallowed.

2. Same—Necessity of Expenses.

An item of credit in an executor's account for rent of a safe deposit box is properly rejected on his testimony that he kept in the box only some papers which he could have kept safely at home.

3. Same—Expenses of Suit.

An executor is properly disallowed credit for expenditures in a suit which he commenced to recover property of the estate, he having abandoned the suit, though he thought the property belonged to the estate; no good reason for the abandonment being shown.

4. Same—Notice of Sale—Publication in Wrong County.

An executor is properly disallowed credit for money paid for publishing, in a county other than that provided by statute, notice of sale of real estate.

5. Same—Property Lost to Estate.

An executor is rightly charged with the value of property as lost to the estate, on his testimony that he thought it belonged to the estate, but nevertheless abandoned a suit for its recovery, which he had begun, and allowed the defendant therein to keep it on payment to him of money which he retained for himself.

6. SAME—INTEREST.

An executor having used the funds of the estate for his private purposes is chargeable with interest thereon.

7. SAME—COMMISSIONS ON SALES.

An executor is entitled to commissions on the whole amount for which property sells, though it is subject to a mortgage, and though part of the purchase money equal to the amount of the mortgage is paid directly to the mortgagee; the sale not being subject to the mortgage, but the mortgage having been presented as a claim against the estate.

8. SAME—OBJECTIONS TO ACCOUNT.

An executor may not complain because one filing objections to his account is not a person interested, as the court has the right of its own motion to inquire into all of the items of the account, and to settle it properly.

9. COSTS—APPEAL—PRINTING OF TRANSCRIPT.

Appellant, though successful having filed a transcript containing much unnecessary matter, will be limited in his recovery of costs of appeal, so far as the printing of the transcript is concerned, to a proper porportion of the cost thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Emma S. Pease, deceased. From the order settling the account of the executor, Albert Simon, he appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Walter A. Coffee, for appellant. A. B. Weiler and Fred W. Frey, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Albert Simon, as executor of the will of Emma S. Pease, deceased, filed his first and final account of his administration of the estate. Objections were filed on behalf of certain legatees, and the executor was directed to file an amended final account. This he did, and after hearing witnesses produced by the executor and the legatees who had again filed objections to the amended account, the court made its order settling the account by disallowing certain items with which the executor had credited himself, adding certain sums to the debit side of the account, and charging him with interest on the difference between the debit and credit sides of the account. The executor appeals from this order, and contends that the evidence was insufficient to justify the court in disallowing any of his credits or in charging him with any further debits or with interest. The various items involved will therefore be briefly considered.

(a) As to credits disallowed. Three alleged payments to St. Luke's Hospital, aggregating $38.50, were found by the court to have been paid by the deceased in her lifetime, and not by the executor. The testimony of Belle Hopkins supports this finding. The executor credits himself with five payments to Western National Bank, G. W. Townsend, River Dale Creamery, and for rent and gas, amounting to $51.30. The appellant's own testimony shows that he made these payments before his appointment as executor, that he never presented any claim for these amounts to the court, and that, at the time he made them, he did not intend to charge his mother (the decedent) with them. On this showing, the items were properly disallowed. An item of $10 for expenses of the executor in going to and from Alameda county on business of the estate was found to be neither necessary nor proper, and the finding is supported by testimony that the estate had an agent, who performed all services in taking care of the property of the estate in Alameda county, and that the compensation of this agent was charged to the estate. The court was justified in rejecting an item of $4 for rent of a safe deposit box, in view of the testimony of the executor himself that he kept in the box only some papers of the estate which he could have kept safely at home. The executor expended $7.50 in a suit which he commenced to recover certain personal property of the estate from one Isabel Hopps. In view of the fact, appearing for his own testimony, that he abandoned the suit, although he thought the property sued for belonged to the estate, no good reason being shown for such abandonment, there is no ground for his contention that this should have been allowed as a charge against the estate. An item of $20, claimed to have been paid to Isabel Hopps for services rendered the estate was reduced to $10, a witness having testified that $10 of the amount paid Mrs. Hopps was for a personal debt of the executor. The court was, of course, justified in accepting the statement of this witness as against that of the executor. Forty-three dollars was paid to the Recorder Publishing Company, a newspaper printed and published in San Francisco, for publishing a notice of sale of real estate. The real estate was situated in Alameda county. Since a notice of sale of real estate should be published in a newspaper printed in the county in which the land is situated (Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1547, 1549), this item was not chargeable against the estate.

(b) As to additional debits. Mrs. Souriau testified that she saw the deceased, just before her death, give the appellant $35, but not as a present. This was sufficient to authorize the court to debit him with the amount. The executor was also debited with $175.60, the value of personal property belonging to the estate. This is the same property above referred to as being in the possession of Isabel Hopps. The executor's testimony that he thought it belonged to the estate, but had abandoned a suit for its recovery, and permitted Mrs. Hopps to keep it on paying him $62, which he retained for himself, is ample to show that the property was lost to the estate through his neglect, and he was rightly charged with its value.

(c) As to charges of interest. The court, after finding the difference between the credit and debit sides of the account, reached the conclusion that the executor should be charged with simple interest on this difference from July 6, 1903, the date when the proceeds of sale of real estate came into his hands, except as to the items of $35 and $175.60, added to the debit side of the account, on which he was to be charged interest from the date of his appointment. This conclusion was based upon a finding that he had used the funds of the estate "for his own private use and purposes." The finding is sustained by the testimony of the executor taken in connection with that of Mrs. Heilbron, and fully justifies the charging of the executor with interest. Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639.

The appellant contends, further, that the court erred in fixing the amount upon which his commissions were to be figured. It appears that there was a sale by the executor of land in Alameda county. The land was subject to a mortgage of $882, which had been presented as a claim against the estate and allowed. The sale was $1,500 to one Thena Heilbron. The court allowed commissions only on the net amount realized after deducting the amount of the mortgage from the amount for which the property was sold. We think commissions should have been allowed on the entire $1,500. An executor or administrator is to be allowed commissions based on the value of the estate which has been taken into his possession and accounted for. Estate of Simmons, 43 Cal. 543, 549; In re Ricaud, 70 Cal. 69, 11 Pac. 471. Here the executor testified: "I never got the $1,500. I only got what was left after paying off the mortgage." The ruling of the trial court was based, apparently, on the view that the $1,500 had not come into the executor's possession. The general rule appears to be that where property subject to an incumbrance is sold, the executor is entitled only to commissions on the net purchase price in excess of the incumbrance. 2 Woerner's Am. Law of Adm. (2d Ed.) 1166; Buerhaus v. De Saussure, 41 S. C. 457, 19 S. E. 926, 20 S. E. 64; Baucus v. Stover, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 109; cf. Hitchcock v. Mosher, 106 Mo. 578, 17 S. W. 638. An examination of these cases indicates that what was sold was merely the equity of redemption, and it may well be held that where property is sold subject to an incumbrance which still remains, the commissions should be calculated only on the value of the interest sold. Here, however, the mortgage had been presented as a valid claim against the estate. The sale was not made to the mortgagee, but to a third party. Under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1569, where there is a sale of lands subject to a mortgage or other lien, the purchase money must be applied first to the satisfaction of the mortgage or lien. The property offered for sale and sold is not the equity of redemption (as it may, for this purpose, be termed), but the entire interest of the estate, regardless of the mortgage. It is the executor's duty to apply the purchase price to satisfying and removing the lien for the benefit of the purchaser, and this was done here. The statement of the appellant that he did not get the $1,500, but only the surplus over the mortgage, can mean at most that the purchaser or a broker paid the mortgagee directly, instead of paying the full price to the executor and having him pay off the mortgage. But this does not alter the real nature of the transaction. Whoever paid the mortgagee did it as agent of the executor. In effect, the executor sold the land for $1,500, and with the proceeds paid off the mortgage debt. "The executor is bound to account to the court for the entire proceeds of sales made under its order." Estate of Turner, 128 Cal. 388, 392, 60 Pac. 967. In this account the executor charged himself with the sum for which the sale was made, and he should be allowed commissions on it. "It would be a narrow construction of the statute to hold, that because he did not demand its delivery that therefore in law he did not receive nor pay out that for which he was responsible as received and paid out." Huddleston v. Kempner, 87 Tex. 372, 28 S. W. 936. There is no force in the point that one of the persons filing objections to the account was not shown to be a "person interested." Code Civ. Proc. § 1626. The evidence was sufficient to show that she was a legatee under the will, and even if she had not been, the court had the right, of its own motion, to inquire into all the items of the account, and to settle it properly.

The appellant claims, and the respondents concede, that, in fixing the interest to be charged against the executor on the balance which should have been in his hands, there was some error in computation. This need not be considered, since, when the account again comes before the court for settlement, any such error can be corrected. For the error in the matter of commissions the order will have to be reversed. To properly present the points raised, a much briefer record would have been sufficient. The appellant has, however, filed a transcript of 306 pages, of which the first 179 are made up largely of papers not constituting any part of the judgment roll nor authenticated by a bill of exceptions. Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639. And the bill of exceptions itself, occupying some 120 pages of the transcript, contains a great deal of unnecessary matter and repetition. Under these circumstances, it would be unjust to throw the entire burden of the costs of this appeal on the respondent. Bullard v. His Creditors, 56 Cal. 600.

The order is reversed, with directions to the lower court to settle the account by allowing the appellant commissions as above indicated, and charging him with interest on the balance due from him, recomputed in accordance with the principles applied on the former hearing; in other respects the order of settlement to stand unchanged. The appellant shall be limited in his recovery of costs to this appeal, so far as the printing of the transcript is concerned, to one-third of the cost thereof.

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1906. Rehearing Denied May 4, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—SCOPE OF REVIEW.

That the trial court limited the ground on which a new trial was granted does not deprive the Supreme Court of the right to review on appeal any of the grounds on which the new trial was asked, except that of the sufficiency of conflicting evidence to support the verdict.

2. NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the negligence of a person on a particular occasion is in issue it is usually permissible to prove every fact known to such person at the time which would have a reasonable tendency to increase or decrease the danger of a particular course of action.

3. SAME—IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE—NEGLIGENCE OF DRIVER OF VEHICLE IMPUTABLE TO OCCUPANT THEREOF.

Though a person who is injured while riding in a vehicle driven by another is not chargeable with the contributory negligence of the driver in which he did not participate, yet he is not absolved from all personal care, but must exercise ordinary care to avoid all injury.

4. STREET RAILROADS—INJURIES TO TRAVELERS ON STREET—COLLISIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a street railway company for injuries received by plaintiff while riding in a vehicle driven by another in consequence of a collision with a car, evidence of the habits of the driver of the vehicle with respect to the dangers arising from collisions with cars, coupled with proof of knowledge thereof on the part of plaintiff, is admissible on the issue of his contributory negligence.

5. SAME.

Where, in an action against a street railway company for injuries received by plaintiff while riding in a vehicle by another in consequence of a collision with a car, it was not claimed that the accident was attributable to the driver's lack of control over the horse due to his manner of holding the reins, evidence of the driver's habits of driving with a loose rein was inadmissible on the issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence.

6. APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT.

The granting of new trial in an action for an injury received by plaintiff while riding in a vehicle driven by another, in consequence of a collision with a street car, on the ground of error in admitting evidence of the driver's habits of driving with a loose rein, will not be disturbed on appeal, though the evidence was of slight importance, since the trial court has a large discretion in the matter of granting new trials.

7. STREET RAILROADS—INJURIES TO TRAVELER—COLLISIONS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against a street railway company for injuries received by a traveler in a collision with a street car, the evidence showed that the car at the time of the accident was running at a high rate of speed and greatly in excess of the speed limited by a municipal ordinance, it was error to charge that it was not negligence on the part of the motorman to assume that a person would not attempt to cross the track in front of the approaching car so near as to render a collision probable, it being for the jury to determine whether the speed of the car was so great that he should have assumed that persons might ignorantly attempt to cross so near as to make a collision probable.

8. SAME—NEGLIGENCE.

Running a street car at a speed in excess of the rate fixed by a municipal ordinance is negligence as a matter of law, and renders the street railway company liable for any injury caused by the excessive speed.

9. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against a street railway company for injuries received by a traveler in a collision with a car, the evidence showed that the car was running at a rate of from 25 to 30 miles an hour, while the maximum speed was limited to eight miles an hour and the injury complained of was directly caused by the impact of the traveler's body against the ground, an instruction that if injuries to the traveler would have resulted though the car had been operated at a speed not in excess of eight miles per hour, then any rate of speed in excess of eight miles per hour was not the proximate cause of the collision and the company was not liable, was erroneous, for whatever additional injury to the traveler was due to the excess of speed was an injury caused by the company's negligence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Paul Bresee and another against the Los Angeles Traction Company and another. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for defendants, they appeal. Affirmed.

E. E. Millikin, for appellants. J. L. Murphy, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff Ada Bresee, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. Paul Bresee is the husband of Ada Bresee, and is made a party solely for that reason. The wife will hereafter be referred to as the plaintiff. The plaintiff was riding in a two-seated canopy top carriage, driven by P. F. Bresee, along Hill street in the city of Los Angeles, at about 10 o'clock at night, and in crossing the track of the defendant company a car, under the management of the defendant Majonnier as motorman, ran against the carriage and threw the plaintiff with great force and violence to the ground, and thereby severely bruised and injured her. The particular negligence charged against the defendants in the complaint is that the car was being propelled along the street at an unlawful, excessive, and reckless speed. The answer pleads contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The jury having returned a verdict for the defendants, the plaintiffs moved for a new trial on the minutes of the court, and in the notice of intention so to do set forth a number of grounds, embracing errors in rulings upon evidence and in giving and refusing of instructions, and that the evidence in several particulars was insufficient to sustain the verdict. The motion was granted, and from the order the defendants appeal.

The order granting the new trial is in the following words: "The motion of plaintiffs for new trial is granted on the ground that evidence relating to Dr. P. F. Bresee's habits of driving on occasions other than that of the accident was improperly admitted, opinion filed." It is contended by the defendants that the limitation expressed in the order excludes from our consideration the sufficiency of the evidence upon any and every point upon which it is conflicting. The order, it will be seen, does not expressly declare that the motion was denied, so far as it was based on other grounds than those mentioned therein, and, therefore, it does not affirmatively exclude the other grounds from our consideration. In Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 277, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124, it was said upon this subject: "If the trial court in its order granting a new trial, excludes this as a ground of its action by direct language, and the record shows that there was a conflict of evidence," this court will not reexamine the evidence. (The italics are ours.) In that case the lower court did, by direct language, exclude the ground that the evidence was insufficient and declared that, so far as that ground was concerned, the motion was denied, and hence the decision is not a precedent for the present case, where this ground, if excluded at all, is excluded by implication only, and by force of the rule "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." We do not find it necessary to decide whether or not the order in question should be construed to prevent a review of the evidence by this court. It is the established rule of practice that such an order, even if it is expressly limited to a single ground, does not exclude from review on appeal any of the grounds upon which the new trial was asked, except that of the sufficiency of conflicting evidence to support the verdict or decision. Kauffman v. Maier, supra; Thompson v. California Con. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 82 Pac. 367; Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, 141 Cal. 175, 74 Pac. 761; Swett v. Gray, 141 Cal. 69, 74 Pac. 439; Siemsen v. Oakland, etc., Ry., 134 Cal. 496, 66 Pac. 672; People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 12, 65 Pac. 13; Newman v. Overland, etc., Co., 132 Cal. 74, 64 Pac. 110; Churchill v. Flournoy, 127 Cal. 362, 59 Pac. 791.

It is conceded on both sides that the plaintiff was a mere guest of P. F. Bresee at the time of the accident, and had neither the control of, nor the right to control, the driving of the carriage, and that under such circumstances the carelessness of the driver, P. F. Bresee, contributing to the injury, cannot be imputed to her so as to constitute contributory negligence on her part; that to sustain the defense of contributory negligence, the defendant must prove personal failure of plaintiff to exercise ordinary care. In the discussion of the evidence to show such contributory negligence of plaintiff, it will be assumed that P. F. Bresee did drive upon the track imprudently near the approaching car, and that his negligence contributed to the plaintiff's injury. The contention of the defendant on this point is that P. F. Bresee, was a careless driver with respect to the act of passing in front of cars while driving about the streets, that he had a disposition to cross tracks in front of and dangerously near to approaching cars, that she knew his character in that respect, and that, so knowing, she did not look to see if a car was approaching when she saw that he was about to cross the track, or, if she saw it, did not warn him, nor make an effort to have him desist from the attempt, or, that she did not make the extra effort in these particulars that ordinary care demanded of her, in view of her knowledge of his careless character, that if she had made such effort he would have been deterred from crossing and she would have been unhurt, and hence, that her own lack of care contributed to her injury.

The evidence on this question, referred to in the order granting a new trial, consisted of testimony to the effect that P. F. Bresee had been for many years almost constantly driving about the city with the same horse and carriage, that on five occasions prior to the accident he had been seen to drive in front of cars so near thereto that the witnesses testifying considered it carelessly and dangerously near, that he usually drove with a loose rein and held the reins loosely in one hand, frequently driving with his head down, or turned to the rear conversing with others riding with him, and that he did not seem to be observant of other cars or vehicles approaching him. This evidence was not introduced for the purpose of proving that P. F. Bresee negligently drove in front of the car on the occasion of the accident. The defendants relied on other evidence to prove that fact, and so stated to the court. The question of its admissibility for that purpose is, therefore, not involved, and this must be kept carefully in mind. It was offered and admitted expressly for the purpose of showing the character of P. F. Bresee as a careless driver. In that connection, and in order to make it relevant, it was further proposed by the defendants to show that plaintiff, at the time, knew, or should have known, his character in that respect. It is first to be noted that the cases on the subject of the introduction of such evidence of character or previous habits to prove the fact of negligent driving on the occasion of the accident are not applicable to the question now under consideration. Upon that question there is much confusion and considerable conflict in the authorities. We think the admissibility of the evidence, for the purposes for which it was here offered, depends upon different conditions and upon a difference in the issue to which it is directed.

The purpose of the evidence was to lay a foundation for the application of the familiar rule that the degree of care necessary to constitute the ordinary care required of a person upon any particular occasion, is measured by reference to the circumstances of danger and risk known to such person at the time. When the negligence of a person upon a particular occasion is in issue, it is usually, if not always, permissible to prove every fact, known to such person at the time, which would have a reasonable tendency to increase or decrease the risk and danger of a particular course of action. There are numerous instances of the application of this rule which are somewhat analogous to the case at bar, though we have not found any case precisely to the same point. Thus, vicious habits of an animal may be proven to show that it was negligence to allow it to go at large or unmuzzled, and particular exhibitions of such viciousness, of which the owner has knowledge, may be shown as evidence of the vicious disposition and of the neglect in issue. Judd v. Claremont, 66 N. H. 419, 23 Atl. 427; Lynch v. Richardson, 163 Mass. 160, 39 N. E. 801, 47 Am. St. Rep. 444; Muller v. McKesson, 73 N. Y. 199, 29 Am. Rep. 123; 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 251. And lack of skill of an employé, and particular instances thereof, may be shown, coupled with knowledge thereof by the employer, to prove negligence of the employer in hiring or retaining him. Pittsburgh, etc., Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 312, 10 Am. Rep. 111; Mich. Cent. R. R. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 179, 9 N. W. 243; Davis v. R. R. Co., 20 Mich. 120, 4 Am. Rep. 364; 1 Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 208, 250. Although the rule is, as conceded here, that a person who is injured while riding in a vehicle driven by another is not chargeable with the contributory negligence of the driver, in which he did not participate, yet such person is not absolved from all personal care, but is required to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury. Dean v. Penn. R. R. Co., 129 Pa. 514, 18 Atl. 718, 6 L. R. A. 143, 15 Am. St. Rep. 733; Michigan City v. Boeckling, 122 Ind. 39, 23 N. E. 518; Brickell v. N. Y. Cent. R. R., 120 N. Y. 290, 24 N. E. 449, 17 Am. St. Rep. 648; Nesbit v. Garner, 75 Iowa, 314, 39 N. W. 516, 1 L. R. A. 152, 9 Am. St. Rep. 486; 1 Shearman & R. on Neg. § 66a. The character and habits of the driver of the carriage with respect to similar dangers, if known to the plaintiff, would naturally have some effect on her own conduct, on the particular occasion in keeping a lookout for the danger herself, in giving him warning, and in enjoining on him a prudent course, and in order to enable the jury to determine whether or not she exercised ordinary care in that respect, it was proper to give evidence of such character and habits, coupled with proof of knowledge thereof on her part. These observations and conclusions, however, are not applicable to the evidence of the driver's previous habits of driving with a loose rein, or of holding the reins loosely in one hand. These habits would not tend to prove either a careless habit of driving in front of cars too close for safety, or a disposition to do so. It was not claimed that the accident was attributable to his lack of control over the horse due to his manner of holding the reins. This evidence was not pertinent to any issue in the case and was improperly admitted. Although it was probably of slight importance, yet, in view of the large discretion committed to the judge of the trial court in the matter of granting a new trial, we cannot say it was not properly granted on that ground. We do not consider it necessary to consider the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to show plaintiff's knowledge of the driver's habits and character and of the particular instances of his negligence. Upon another trial the court can, if deemed best, direct the order of proof so that the evidence of such knowledge on her part shall be first introduced, and if no sufficient evidence to go to the jury is offered on that point, or in respect to some of the instances, the corresponding evidence thereof can be excluded.

At the request of the defendant the court instructed the jury with respect to the conduct of the motorman that: "It is not negligence on the part of such motorman to assume that a person will not attempt to cross the track in front of an approaching car, which is so near as to render a collision probable." The probability of a collision between a moving car and a vehicle crossing in front of it, depends largely upon the speed of the car, and the action of a careful person attempting to cross, in choosing the distance at which to cross in front of such car, will depend upon his knowledge, and means of knowledge, of the speed with which the car is approaching him. There was evidence strongly indicating, if not absolutely demonstrating, that the car in question at the time of the accident was running at a speed of at least 25 or 30 miles an hour. This was in the nighttime and upon a street in the thickly settled portion of the city. With the car going at such tremendous speed, it is not unlikely that persons about to cross the track might choose a place so near as to make collision probable, and yet, from their point of view, it might seem entirely reasonable and safe for them to cross at the place selected. Their failure to perceive the danger might be entirely due to the excessive speed of the car, and to their inability in the darkness to detect it and comprehend the shortness of the time required for the car to pass over the distance between it and the place selected for the crossing. The motorman must be assumed to know approximately the speed of his car. Under such circumstances, and while running at such excessive speed, it cannot be said as a matter of law, that the motorman ought not reasonably to have expected that persons might attempt to cross the track at a point which would in fact be dangerously near, but which to them would not appear so. The circumstances might be such as to charge him with knowledge of this likelihood. Due care would require him in that case to anticipate such probability reasonably arising from the consequences of his own gross carelessness. The court, therefore, should not have stated as a matter of law that the motorman, under the circumstances had a right to assume that persons would not cross dangerously near in front of him. It should have been left to the jury to say whether or not his speed was so great that he should have assumed that persons might ignorantly attempt to cross so near as to make a collision probable.

The court also, at the request of the defendants, instructed the jury with respect to the proximate cause of the injury, as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that said collision, and the injuries so sustained by said Ada Bresee, would have resulted, even had said car been operated at a rate of speed not in excess of eight miles per hour at the time the vehicle in question was turned to cross the railway tracks, then any rate of speed in excess of eight miles per hour that said car may have been running at said time, was not a proximate cause of said collision, and cannot render the defendants liable in this action." This instruction implies a fact not physically possible, namely, that an injury caused by being thrown with great force and violence from the carriage to the ground would have been as great if the force and violence had been less than it actually was, the other circumstances being precisely the same. The action of force and violence, other things being the same, is mechanical and absolute, and it is impossible that different degrees of force should produce the same results, where all other circumstances are precisely the same. So far as the mere fact of the collision was concerned, it may be that, although the speed of the car was more than eight miles an hour, it would have occurred had the speed been less. The injury complained of, however, was alleged to have been directly caused by the impact of the plaintiff's body against the ground, and its extent would necessarily depend upon the force of the impact, and that force would depend on the speed of the car. Any increase in the speed would, necessarily, add to the force and, consequently, to the extent of the injury. At the time this accident happened it was unlawful to propel a street car along the streets of the city at a rate exceeding eight miles an hour, and a speed in excess of that rate constituted negligence, as a matter of law, and rendered the party operating the car liable for any injury caused by such excessive rate. Whatever additional injury, therefore, was due to the excess of speed over eight miles an hour, was an injury caused by the defendants' negligence. The excess in the speed over that rate, an excess which is assumed by the instruction in question, must have been the direct cause of such additional injury. This additional injury from such negligence would render the defendants liable in the action, in the absence of plaintiff's contributory negligence. If the instruction had been limited to the happening of the collision alone, it might not have been objectionable in this respect, although even in that case it is metaphysical in form and would have tended to confuse the jury. But in the assertion that, under the circumstances stated, the excess of speed could not render the defendants liable in the action, it was erroneous. In either event it should not have been given. The order is affirmed.

In re REED'S ESTATE.

1. EXECUTORS — SALES—POWER OF COURT—WHO MAY QUESTION.

The question of the power of the court to direct a new sale on setting aside a former executor's sale cannot be raised by the original purchaser; the executor making no objection.

2. SAME—SETTING ASIDE SALE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1552, authorizing the court to set aside an executor's sale if an offer of 10 per cent. more in amount than that named in the return be made in writing by some responsible person, the court may set aside the sale on such an offer being made by the original purchaser.

Proceedings for the sale of real estate by Martin Winch, executor of Amanda W. Reed. From an order refusing to confirm the sale, the purchaser, Francis E. Crawford, appeals. Affirmed.

Wright, Bell & Ward, for appellant. Works, Lee & Works, Oscar A. Trippet, and John A. Goodrich, for respondent.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to confirm a sale of real estate at which the appellant was purchaser. The sale was made under a power in the will of respondent's testatrix, authorizing the executor to sell and convey the property, real and personal, of the estate "upon such terms and conditions and for such prices as to him shall seem good."

The objections to the order urged by the appellant are: (1) That the sale was fair; (2) that the price was not disproportionate to the value of the property sold at the time of the sale; (3) that to justify the order proof of two conditions were essential, namely, that the price was insufficient at the time of the sale, and that a sum exceeding such bid at least 10 per cent. exclusive, etc., could be obtained; and (4) that the court had no power to direct a new sale. Of these points, the first is sustained by the recitals of the order, and may be admitted. As to the second, the preponderating evidence was no doubt in favor of appellant's contention; but there was some evidence to the contract, which it appears from the statements of the court was regarded by it as sufficient to reject the sale. As to the fourth, it is a matter with which we think the appellant was not concerned; and as the order was made upon the application of the executor, who is respondent, no objection can be urged to it.

The remaining objection is based upon an incorrect construction of the statute, which authorizes the court in its discretion to set aside the sale, "if an offer of 10 per cent. more in amount than that named in the return be made to the court, in writing, by a responsible person." Estate of Robinson, 142 Cal. 157, 75 Pac. 777. There is nothing in the decision in Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 Pac. 171, inconsistent with this view; that case dealt with a different provision of the statute. In the present case, a written offer of 10 per cent. more than the amount named in the return was made by the appellant himself; and it was then in the discretion of the court, under the provision in question, either to accept such offer and confirm the sale, or to order a new sale. It is, indeed, claimed by the appellant that his bid was the result of a mistake. But this, we think, is immaterial; nor do we think that the court was bound to accept the offer. It may be added, however, that the appellant's bid was increased by 10 per cent. by another written offer by responsible bidder to purchase for the sum of $36,300; and we are of opinion, notwithstanding the objections of appellant—which seem to have had some weight with the court below—that the court might have accepted this bid. The objections referred to are, that under the terms of the sale to Crawford the deed was to contain certain "conditions, covenants and restrictions" as to modes of building, etc., to operate for 10 years, and that the bid of $36,300 was upon the condition that the purchaser should be so far relieved from the conditions imposed on the appellant as to permit them to erect an opera house as described in the bid. The executor expressed his acquiescence in the proposed change, which, it appears, would have been equally beneficial to the estate; and we are of the opinion that the provisions of section 1552, Code Civ. Proc., were substantially complied with.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

ALCATRAZ MASONIC HALL ASS'N v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO.

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—CHANGE IN OBLIGATION.

Under Civ. Code, § 2819, exonerating a guarantor if by any act of the creditor the original obligation is altered in any material respect, a surety in a bond conditioned on performance by a contractor of a building contract for $16,300, is released from liability on the owner and contractor changing the plans and increasing the cost $315.

2. SAME—EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

Since a contractor, under contract for the construction of a building and the delivery thereof free from all liens, is liable only for enforceable liens, a surety in a bond conditioned on the performance of the contract is liable only for enforceable liens.

3. SAME.

A contract for the construction of a building required the owner to pay 75 per cent. of the contract price in installments, and the balance ($4,075) 35 days after the acceptance of the work. A surety executed a bond in the sum of $4,075, conditioned on the contractor delivering the building free from liens. Held that, unless the owner was compelled to pay a greater sum than $4,075 to free the building from valid liens, the surety was not liable; it having the right to have this amount applied toward the satisfaction of valid claims.

4. SAME.

A surety in a bond conditioned on a contractor, under contract for the construction of a building, performing his contract and delivering the building free from liens, is not liable for the expenses incurred by the owner in suits for the enforcement of liens, where under the contract he was not required to pay 25 per cent. of the contract price until 35 days after the completion of the building, during which time he could ascertain the lien claimants and pay them from the sum unpaid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by the Alcatraz Masonic Hall Association against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Snook & Church, for appellant. Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J., The plaintiff entered into a contract with one L. U. Grant, October 19, 1899, for the construction by the latter of a building upon its land at the agreed price of $16,300, and at the same time the said Grant as principal and the defendant as surety executed to the plaintiff a bond of indemnity in the sum of $4,075, conditioned that Grant should faithfully perform the said contract and deliver the building to the plaintiff within the contract time for its completion, free from all liens, demands, and claims, and should pay to the persons performing labor or furnishing materials for the construction of the building the value thereof.

The contract provided that the building should be completed within 150 working days from the date thereof, and that the payment of the contract price should be made in installments as the work progressed, in sums equal to 75 per cent. of the value of the work done and materials furnished, as estimated on the 1st and 15th days of each month, and the balance, to wit, 25 per cent. of the contract price of $16,300 ($4,075) 35 days after the completion and acceptance of the work. After the execution and recording of the contract the plaintiff and Grant made certain alterations and changes therein, by which the cost of the building was increased in the sum of $315, and agreed that the said additional cost should be paid at the same times and in the same manner as payments under the original contract. During the progress of the work payments were made to Grant upon certificates of the architect on account of installments due on the contract, amounting to $12,138.85. Before the building was completed Grant abandoned the contract, and the plaintiff completed the construction of the building and expended therefor $641.23. After its completion certain parties, who had furnished materials and performed labor for Grant in its construction, filed claims of lien therefor, amounting to about $7,500, and subsequently brought actions in the superior court for their enforcement. These actions were, by an order of court, consolidated, and the plaintiff filed its answer thereto, alleging that the building was not subject to liens exceeding in the aggregate $3,834.92, and offering to deposit that sum in court for their satisfaction. Upon the trial of the cause the court found that that was the amount due from the plaintiff to Grant upon the contract at the commencement of the action; and upon its order the sum was deposited in court for the said claimants, and the court thereupon rendered its judgment that the said liens were thereby fully satisfied. In this litigation the plaintiff employed certain attorneys, for whose services he paid $500, and incurred certain costs, amounting to $27. The present action is brought to recover these amounts from the defendant. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

The bond of the defendant makes no reference to the provisions of section 1203, Code of Civil Procedure, and the objection to its validity based upon the rulings of the Supreme Court in reference to that section are inapplicable. It is unnecessary to consider the effect of the provision in the bond for the payment by Grant to the laborers and materialmen, since the complaint herein is limited to the rights of the plaintiff alone. The condition of the defendant's obligation is the failure of Grant to faithfully perform his contract and deliver the building to the plaintiff free from all liens, claims, and demands. Although it is alleged that Grant did not complete the building, but abandoned his contract when it was uncompleted, and the plaintiff was compelled to complete the same, it does not show that it has sustained any damage thereby, or make any claim against the defendant therefor. The total amount of the contract price for the building and for the extra work is $16,615. Deducting from this $12,138.85 paid to Grant upon the certificates of the architect as the work progressed, and $3,834.92 determined by the court to be in the plaintiff's hands applicable for the discharge of the liens upon the building, there remains $641.23, the amount paid by the plaintiff for the completion of the building, thus showing that the plaintiff sustained no pecuniary damage by reason of Grant's failure to complete his contract. The basis of the defendant's obligation which the plaintiff presents in support of its right of action is the failure of Grant to deliver the building free from liens, and upon this point it alleges that upon the completion of the building the sum of $3,834.92 was chargeable against the building for liens and claims thereon; and it also alleges that upon the trial of the action to enforce the liens the court found that the lien claimants were entitled to this amount of money, and that upon depositing that amount in court for the discharge of said liens the court rendered its judgment that the liens were fully satisfied.

1. The alteration of the contract as set forth in the complaint had the effect to release the surety from its contract of indemnity. There is no allegation in the complaint supporting the suggestion in the brief of the appellant that the original contract contained a provision authorizing changes to be made therein; nor is it alleged that the changes were made with the consent of the defendant. For the purpose of determining the sufficiency of the complaint as against the demurrer we can consider only matters therein set forth. There is no principal of law better settled than that a surety has the right to stand upon the very terms of his contract, and that any alteration in the terms of the principal's contract, made by the parties thereto without his assent, will have the effect to discharge him from all liability. By such alteration the contract ceases to be the one for which he became surety, and the extent of such alteration, or whether his liability will be increased or diminished thereby, is immaterial. Having the right to determine in the first instance whether he will become such surety or not, he has the right to be consulted upon the terms proposed for any variation of his obligation, and if made otherwise his obligation is extinguished. The principle of this rule is discussed in Brandt on Suretyship, § 106. See, also, Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 680, 6 L. Ed. 189; Bethune v. Dozier, 10 Ga. 235. In this state the Legislature has declared in section 2819, Civ. Code, that if by any act of the creditor without his consent the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect he is exonerated. That the alterations in the contract agreed upon between the plaintiff and Grant had the effect to alter the obligation of the surety is apparent. A greater length of time was thereby required within which to finish the building, and a greater amount of labor and of expenditure incident thereto than that for which the defendant had agreed to indemnify the plaintiff. Because of these alterations the defendant ceased to be liable on its contract. Judah v. Zimmerman, 22 Ind. 388; O'Neal v. Kelley, 65 Ark. 550, 47 S. W. 409; Eldridge v. Fuhr, 59 Mo. App. 44; Beers v. Wolff, 116 Mo. 179, 22 S. W. 620. The expression found in the opinions in some cases that the surety is discharged by any "material" alteration of the contract has reference to such an alteration as will merely vary the form of the contract without changing its substance, but does not include such an alteration as will increase the obligation for which the indemnity was given. In O'Neal v. Kelley, 65 Ark. 550, 47 S. W. 409, the increased cost of the alteration was $25, and in Beers v. Wolff, 116 Mo. 179, 22 S. W. 620, where the contract price was $31,000, the cost of the alterations was $231. It cannot be said that an alteration which cost upwards of $300, as in the present case, is not material. Nor can the court say that if this additional cost had been included in the original contract the defendant would have been willing to bind itself as surety for its performance.

2. The contract with the plaintiff on the part of Grant to deliver the building free from all liens, claims, and demands is to be construed as limited to such liens and demands as can be enforced against the building, and not as including claims of lien which are unauthorized or invalid, or for which the claimants have no right of recovery; and the obligation of the defendant as surety for Grant has the same limitation. Unless the plaintiff has been compelled to pay a greater sum of money to free the building from the liens than the unpaid amount of the contract price for its construction it has suffered no damage. By its contract with Grant it agreed to retain from him the sum of $4,075—the exact amount of the defendant's agreement of indemnity—until 35 days after the completion of the building. This was an additional security in its hands for the faithful performance by Grant of his contract, including the delivery of the building free from liens, and the defendant was entitled to have this amount of money applied by the plaintiff toward the satisfaction of the claims of lien for which it had been retained. Under the well-established rule in this state, if the "owner" in a building contract observes the conditions of the contract on his part to be performed, the amount of liens against his property cannot exceed the amount of the unpaid portion of the price agreed upon for constructing the building; and in the present case when the building was completed the plaintiff had in its hands the full amount for which liens were afterward found to be valid charges against the building. The fact that liens for a greater amount were claimed and filed, and for the enforcement of which actions were brought did not in any respect enlarge the liability of the defendant. The record does not disclose the nature of these claims of lien, or the circumstances under which they were filed, or for which the claims were made; but, as the court found that the amount chargeable against the building was no greater than the unpaid amount of the contract price, it must be assumed that for any excess of that price these claims had no valid foundation. It was therefore within the power of the plaintiff to satisfy the amount of all the valid liens against its building by appropriating therefor the amount in its hands; and in view of the rights of the defendant as a surety, and the plaintiff's obligation towards it, it was the duty of the plaintiff to do so before it could call upon the defendant for any relief. Good faith towards the defendant required it to discharge the liens with the money then held by it for that purpose. The contract of the defendant did not extend to or include any trouble or expense which the plaintiff might incur in the performance of its own duty. Before the expiration of the 35 days from the completion of the building the plaintiff knew or could have ascertained the amount of liens claimed thereon; and as it knew that the amount of the unpaid portion of the contract price was the limit for which any liens could be enforced it was in its power to satisfy these liens by appropriating the money in its hands therefor. If, instead of so doing, it chose to await actions for their recovery, and thereby incur additional expense, it was an act of its own choosing for which the defendant is in no wise responsible. Whatever expense was incurred by reason of the attempt of the claimants to enforce liens to which they were not entitled is not embraced in the defendant's contract of indemnity, whether such attempt was to enforce liens for a greater amount than they were entitled to recover, or liens for which they had no claim whatever. The plaintiff therefore is not entitled to recover from the defendant for the services of its attorneys in defending these actions, or the expenses incurred therein, and the court properly sustained the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILLER v. DONOVAN (ENGLE, Intervener).

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 23, 1906.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—CONTESTS—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS—COMPLAINT AND AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Pol. Code, § 3414, providing that when a contest arises concerning the approval of a survey or location of public lands and when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, the surveyor general must make an order referring the contest, and section 3415, providing that after such order is made "either party may bring an action in the superior court of the county wherein the land is situated to determine the conflict, and the production of a certified copy of the entry made by either the surveyor general or the register gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action," a contestant is not required to file a statement of the specific grounds of contest with the surveyor general, a complaint setting forth plaintiff's application and affidavit and averring that he filed with such officer his written protest against the application and certificate of purchase issued to defendant, demanded that the conflicting claims of plaintiff and defendant be referred to the superior court, that said officer declared a contest to exist concerning the right to purchase the land, and that he thereupon made an entry and order referring such contest to said court, was sufficient.

2. SAME—CERTIFICATE OF PURCHASE—EVIDENCE—CONFLICT OF STATUTES.

Contests arising under Pol. Code, § 3414, involving conflicting claims to public lands, are governed by Pol. Code, § 3514, relating to public lands of the state and their disposition, amended in 1874 (Code Amendments 1873–74, p. 52), and making a certificate of purchase prima facie evidence of title, and not by Code Civ. Proc. § 1925, making such certificate primary evidence of title; the former section having been amended since the enactment of the latter section, and being the latest expression of the legislative will.

3. STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

It is a cardinal rule of statutory construction that specific provisions on a particular subject control general provisions for the class to which the subject belongs.

4. PUBLIC LANDS—CONTEST—PAYMENT—TITLE—WHEN VESTED.

Under Pol. Code, § 3414, relating to the disposal of contests involving title to public lands, making no distinction between certificates of purchase on which there has been partial payment and certificates where full payment has been made, and providing that when, in the judgment of the officer before whom the contest is made, a question of law is involved, or when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, he (the officer) must make an order referring the contest to the district court, etc.; section 3519, providing that patent will issue whenever final payment has been made for any tract of land the selection of which has been accepted and approved by the United States authorities, etc.; and section 3521, providing that no patent must issue until after the expiration of one year from the date of approval of the survey or location by the surveyor general, nor until the lands are relinquished to the state by authority of the General Land Office at Washington—the legal title remains in the state until the patent issues, and a contest may arise in the state land office as to the right of the holder of a certificate of purchase, whether the original applicant or his assignee, so long as such certificate is outstanding, or at least until the holder thereof is entitled to call for his patent; there being no difference in the effect of the certificate upon the title whether a part or the whole of the purchase price is first paid.

5. SAME—APPLICATION FOR PURCHASE—AFFIDAVIT—REQUIREMENTS.

The affidavit of an applicant for the purchase of state lands, must set forth all the requirements of the statute, and the facts stated must be true.

6. SAME—COMPLAINT—FRAUD—NECESSITY FOR ALLEGING.

One instituting a contest involving title to public lands need not allege or prove previous knowledge or notice, on the part of an assignee of an applicant for the land intervening in the action, of any fraud in procuring his assignor's certificate, as such assignee has no equities entitling him to greater rights than his assignor.

7. EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—FAILURE TO SUSTAIN.

When a party alleges a material fact, and offers no evidence in support of it, the court is authorized, if denied, to find its nonexistence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by W. J. Miller against Louis Donovan; J. M. Engle, intervener. Judgment for plaintiff, and intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Moncur and J. D. Goodwin, for appellant. W. A. Gett and L. N. Peter, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action commenced under sections 3414 and 3415 of the Political Code to determine the right to purchase certain lieu lands as indemnity for school land upon a contest, between plaintiff and defendant, Donovan, on reference by the Surveyor General as register of the State Land Office, to the superior court of Plumas county. J. M. Engle by leave of court filed a complaint in intervention as the assignee of defendant's certificate of purchase. Plaintiff moved to strike from the files the complaint in intervention, and also filed a general demurrer to the same. The motion was denied, and the demurrer was overruled. The default of defendant for failure to appear was duly entered, and intervener, Engle, made answer. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against the intervener, and the latter appeals from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff has moved the court to dismiss the appeal on the grounds: First, that appellant is not a party aggrieved within the meaning of section 938 of the Code of Civil Procedure; second, that this court has no appellate jurisdiction in actions brought under section 3414 of the Political Code, for the reason that such actions were special. Upon this second point we understand that the jurisdiction of the appellate court is questioned only as to the intervener, and as to him because he was not a party to the contest in the land office. The view we have taken of the case does not require that we should decide the motion to dismiss.

1. Appellant contends that, under section 3414 of the Political Code, the contestant must file a statement of the specific grounds of contest with the Surveyor General. The section makes no such requirement. A contest arises when two persons make separate applications to purchase the same state land, if the land is still open to location; and "when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, he [the surveyor general as ex-officio register of the state land office] must make an order referring the contest"; and section 3415 provides that "after such order is made either party may bring an action in the superior court of the county in which the land is situated, to determine the conflict, and the production of a certified copy of the entry, made by either the Surveyor General or the register, gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action." The complaint sets forth plaintiff's application and affidavit, and avers that he filed with this officer his written protest against the application of and certificate of purchase issued to defendant, and demanded that the conflicting claims of plaintiff and defendant be referred to the superior court of Plumas county, and that said officer declared a contest to exist concerning the right to purchase said land, and that he thereupon duly made and entered an order referring said contest to said court. These averments are supported by the evidence, and are sufficient.

2. It is next contended that the certificate held by intervener, Engle, assignee of defendant, Donovan, is not the subject of a contest in the state land office, chiefly for the reason that Donovan had paid in full for the land and his certificate is equivalent to a patent and must be treated the same as if patent had issued. It appears that the land involved is timber land, not suitable for cultivation. Defendant, Donovan, applied to purchase on October 14, 1902, and in April, 1903, one Perrin and intervener, Engle, filed their affidavit in the office of the Surveyor General stating that the land was unfit for cultivation. On May 15, 1903, Donovan's application was approved, and on May 26, 1903, the county treasurer received a check for payment in full for the land, and on June 1, 1903, a certificate of purchase was issued in the name of Donovan reciting payment in full by him and stating that "on surrendering this certificate to the state of California and after the said lands have been confirmed to the state, the said Louis Donovan, or his assigns, shall be entitled to receive a patent for the same." Intervener introduced a deed dated June 8, 1903, purporting to have been executed and acknowledged on that day by Donovan and indorsed as recorded at Donovan's request on June 12, 1903, conveying the land to intervener. The county treasurer testified that he did not know Donovan and that no man representing himself by that name came to his office or offered to pay for the land, and that payment was made by the check of F. A. Hyde, a land attorney. Plaintiff's application and affidavit were filed in the office of the Surveyor General on July 24, 1903, numbered 4323, but approval was refused, and on August 8, 1903, a contest was declared to exist, and the order of reference to the superior court was duly made, and on September 4, 1903, plaintiff's complaint was filed. The court found, on sufficient evidence, that plaintiff was a qualified entryman; that his application and affidavit conformed in all respects to the requirements of the law, and that the facts therein set forth were true. The only evidence introduced by intervener was the original certificate of purchase issued to Donovan and the deed from Donovan to intervener, with the indorsements showing recordation in Plumas county on June 12, 1903. Appellant cites Somo v. Oliver, 52 Cal. 378 (approved in McFaul v. Pfankuch, 98 Cal. 402, 33 Pac. 397), to the effect that a contest cannot be made before the Surveyor General in respect to the right to purchase land for which a patent has been issued to one of the parties. McCabe v. Goodwin, 106 Cal. 490, 39 Pac. 941, is cited, where it was said: "When a party is authorized to demand a patent for land, his title is vested as much as if he had the patent itself, which is but evidence of title." It is claimed that this is the doctrine relative to government entries of public land, as shown in Simmons v. Wagner, 101 U. S. 260, 25 L. Ed. 910; Barney v. Dolph, 97 U. S. 652, 24 L. Ed. 1063; Stark v. Starr, 73 U. S. 402, 18 L. Ed. 925; McNee v. Donahue, 76 Cal. 506, 18 Pac. 438. Furthermore, that the certificate is made primary evidence of title by section 1925 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is further claimed that contests arising under section 3414 of the Political Code are based on the assumption that title to the contested land still remains in the state, citing Lobree v. Mullan, 70 Cal. 152, 11 Pac. 685; Bode v. Trimmer, 82 Cal. 516, 23 Pac. 187.

As to the application of section 1925, Code Civ. Proc., we have this to say: Section 3514 of the Political Code relates to the public lands of this state and their disposition, and is found in the title so designated. The section, as amended in 1874 (Code Amendments 1873–74, p. 52), makes a certificate of purchase prima facie evidence of title. Section 4480 of the Political Code requires that the "four Codes must be construed (except as in the next two sections provided) as though all such Codes had been passed at the same moment of time, and were parts of the same statute." But section 4481 provides that "if the provisions of any title conflict with or contravene the provisions of another title, the provisions of each title must prevail as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such title." It is a cardinal rule of statutory construction that specific provisions upon a particular subject control general provisions for the class to which the subject belongs. Endlich on Interpretations of Statutes, § 399. It seems to us that under section 4481, the section of the Code of Civil Procedure (1925) relied upon by appellant does not appply; and besides, section 3514 of the Political Code was amended since section 1925 of the Civil Procedure was enacted, and is the latest expression of the legislative will on the particular subject. Section 3414 makes no distinction between certificates of purchase on which there has been partial payment and certificates where full payment has been made. Donovan's certificate shows that patent will not issue until after the "said lands have been confirmed to the state," and also "after having in all other respects (other than paying for the lands) complied with the requirements of the laws providing for the sale of said lands." Section 3519 of the Political Code provides that patent will issue "whenever final payment has been made for any tract of land, the selection of which has been accepted and approved by the United States authorities," etc., but, under section 3521 of the same Code, "no patent must issue until after the expiration of one year from the date of approval of the survey or location by the Surveyor General, nor until the lands are relinquished to the state by authority of the General Land Office at Washington." The section does not require relinquishment of locations of school "land in place" but the location here is for lieu and not for school lands in place. By the terms of the law and by the terms of the Donovan certificate as the facts appear, Donovan was not entitled to a patent when the action was commenced. The government has not, so far as appears, relinquished and may never relinquish these lands.

We do not understand the case of McCabe v. Goodwin, supra, to hold that the state is precluded from entertaining a contest or from ordering a reference under section 3414 because one of the applicants has paid in full at the time he made his application. At page 491 it is stated: "If any other interested person would show that the state is not bound to comply with such contract [the certificate as evidence of a contract to convey (Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 540)], he is authorized by section 3414 of the Political Code to procure a judicial determination of this question by having previously instituted a contest in the Surveyor General's office, and causing a transfer to the superior court." The case seems to proceed upon the assumption that McCabe had a standing in court sufficient to enable him to institute the contest, and what was said as to the effect of the certificate held by Goodwin went to his right to the land, because the original applicant had fully complied with the law and was entitled to patent for that reason, and not solely because the certificate had issued and full payment had been made. We do not think it should be held that an entryman can shield himself from the effects of an entry made in violation of the statute by simply paying for the land. The postponement of the patent for one year may be intended to give opportunity to prevent fraudulent locations from being consummated or to give other locators an opportunity to file applications and present their superior claims to the land. There are certain requirements of the law which have been held many times to be essential to a valid application for location; and the policy of the law is well established to be that these requirements must be shown to have been complied with. It was said in Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 534, 20 Pac. 62, that "this policy would be defeated if persons who falsely pretend to be of the class entitled to purchase could, after deceiving the land department into giving them their preliminary papers, shut off investigation by immediately assigning such preliminary papers to some other party." And we say, further, that investigation cannot be shut off by immediately paying in full for the land. When patent issues the state parts with its title, and not until then. With the rights of parties holding patent we are not now concerned. The cases all hold that the title remains in the state after certificate issues, and the very object of the reference, in case of contest, is to determine to whom the state title should go. This is true of certificates where full payment has been made equally with certificates where only partial payment has been made. Intervener, Engle, stood in the shoes of his assignor, Donovan, and occupied no better or different relation to the lands or to the state than did Donovan. See Taylor v. Weston, supra, for a full discussion of the rights of an assignee of a certificate of purchase and as to the office of such certificate.

We cannot subscribe to the doctrine that the state in effect issues two different and distinct certificates—one, where part payment is made, being only prima facie evidence of title, and the other, where full payment is made, being primary evidence of title and equivalent to patent. We cannot agree with the apparent position of applicant that the certificate of purchase issued by the state is different in cases of full payment and partial payment, or, if the same, have a different effect in passing title. As already said, section 3414 contemplates but one certificate and recognizes no difference in its effect upon the title, whether but 20 per cent. of the purchase price is first paid or the full amount thereof. The certificate is assignable alike in both cases and carries with it like rights to the assignee, but in neither case is it equivalent to a patent. Our view is that the legal title remains in the state until the patent issues, and that a contest may arise as to the right of the holder of a certificate of purchase, whether the original applicant or his assignee, so long as this certificate is outstanding, or at least until the holder is entitled to call for his patent. And such contest may be instituted by a person who connects himself with the paramount source of the title, as in this case. The analogy between such a certificate as we have here and a final receipt issued by the general government, upon final proof and payment, is not complete. Our law furnishes the means for a contestant to connect himself with the paramount source of title and thus clothe himself with the right given by the statute to have his claim adjudicated by the courts, while no such means are given by the United States law in the entry of land. The rule, therefore, laid down in the cases cited by appellant touching the effect of the final receipt upon entry of public land is not apposite.

3. It follows from what has been said that this is the ordinary and familiar case, often before the Supreme Court, of contest between two claimants to state land, one of whom, plaintiff, as in this case, has by pleading and proof brought himself clearly within the law, and the other of whom, intervener, has pleaded what we may concede to be ample to show the right of Donovan, through whom he claims, to purchase the land in question, but has wholly failed to make proof of the facts alleged and denied. Intervener has submitted no proof except the possession of a certificate of purchase and a deed from Donovan, and contends that no such proof was necessary. He plants himself on the proposition that the register of the state land office had no authority or jurisdiction to entertain a contest of Donovan's certificate, and hence the court was without jurisdiction to deal with it. Consistently with this theory intervener abstained from supporting Donovan's application by proof of the facts set forth in his application and affidavit. With equal consistency, holding as we do, it was, in our view of the case, incumbent upon intervener, as it would have been upon Donovan if the sole defendant, to sustain by evidence the averments of his application and affidavit, for, as already said, he stood in Donovan's shoes. The law is well settled, and to the point citations are not called for, that in the purchase of state lands the affidavit must set forth all the requirements of the statute, and the facts stated must be true. In case of a contest in the courts each party is an actor and must stand or fall upon the truth of his own statements, and these statements must embrace all the statutory prerequisites. Neither party gains anything by simply defeating his adversary, but must himself establish a clear right before judgment will pass in his favor. The learned counsel for appellant have had too long experience in cases of this character to controvert these well-established rules, and we do not understand that they now question their correctness; but they stoutly contend, erroneously as we think, that they do not apply to this case. It was not necessary for plaintiff to allege or prove previous knowledge or notice on the part of intervener of any fraud in procuring the certificate by Donovan. Intervener, as assignee, had no equities entitling him to greater rights than his assignor. This is fully shown in the case of Taylor v. Weston, supra, and the principle was applied in Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. 852, 5 L. R. A. 233, 12 Am. St. Rep. 145; People v. Swift, 96 Cal. 165, 31 Pac. 16.

4. It is complained that none of the material findings are supported by the evidence. The specifications are directed mainly to the findings negativing the facts set forth in the complaint in intervention and embraced in Donovan's application and affidavit. As there was an utter failure to establish these facts by evidence, which were denied by plaintiff, it was proper for the court to negative their existence by findings. When a party alleges a material fact, and offers no evidence in support of it, the court is authorized, if denied, to find its nonexistence. The court found that Donovan made his location for the sole use and benefit of Engle, the intervener, and that Engle paid no consideration to Donovan for said land. There was no evidence submitted by Engle of payment to any one except such as might be presumed from the fact that Donovan conveyed the land to Engle by deed which recited a consideration of $2,600, and there was no evidence of nonpayment by Engle offered by plaintiff. We cannot see that the judgment necessarily rests in any degree upon these findings. The real question before the court, first to be determined, was whether either plaintiff or defendant, Donovan, was entitled to the land, and, if either, which one. Had Donovan's claim been fully established, and had the court ordered that patent issue to him, Donovan's patent would have fed his deed to Engle. The real issue was Donovan's right to a patent, not whether Engle paid a consideration.

We have endeavored to cover all the questions presented by the appeal, and have reached the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

SHAFER v. SLOAN.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 27, 1906.)

1. SALES—CONTRACT FOR SALE OF BUSINESS—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract for the sale of "all my right, title, and interest in and to the goods, wares, and merchandise in my storeroom," etc., except certain articles specified, coupled with an agreement that the seller should not enter into or engage in the business or occupation of second-hand dealer in the same town so long as the buyer should continue in business, indicated upon its face the sale of a business.

2. Evidence—Oral Evidence to Explain Written Contract.

Under Civ. Code, § 1647, providing that a contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates, oral proof was properly admitted in explanation of the circumstances under which a contract for the sale of the seller's right, title, and interest in and to goods, wares, and merchandise in his storeroom, coupled with an agreement that the seller would not engage in the business of secondhand dealer in the town so long as the buyer should continue in business was made, to show that the buyer was seeking to purchase an established secondhand store business in the town, and that the contract was for the sale of such business.

3. Good Will—Contract for Sale of Business—Construction.

The obvious intention of a contract for the sale of a business, coupled with an agreement by the seller not to engage in the business in the same town so long as the buyer continues in business, is to sell the good will of the business.

4. Same—Validity—Statutory Provisions.

Under Civ. Code, § 1674, providing that one who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city, or part thereof so long as the buyer thereof, or any person deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a business therein, the fact that a contract for the sale of a business is in excess of the rights conferred by the section, in that it undertakes to restrict the right to engage in business so long as the buyer continues therein, omitting the word "similar," does not render the contract void, but only to the extent to which it attempts to enlarge the rights beyond the statute.

5. Same—Breach—Damages—Pleading and Proof.

In an action for breach of a contract for the sale of the good will of a business providing for the payment by the seller, on breach of the contract, of a certain sum to the purchaser, it is unnecessary to plead or prove the impracticability of fixing the damages.

6. Damages — Penalty — Liquidated Damages.

Where it does not clearly appear that the penalty inserted in a contract for the sale of a business and the good will thereof was intended as security for the payment of actual damages in case of breach of contract, the court will regard the amount as liquidated damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by John Shafer against J. G. Sloan. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, for appellant. Byron Waters, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for damages. Findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $500, from which defendant appeals. The complaint, the allegations of which were by the trial court found to be true, alleges the sale by defendant and purchase by plaintiff in 1886 of a stock of secondhand furniture, together with the good will, under a written agreement that defendant should not engage in the occupation of keeping a secondhand store in the town of San Bernardino so long as plaintiff should continue in such business, upon default of which defendant should pay to plaintiff the sum of $500. It is further alleged that plaintiff is, and ever since such sale has been, engaged in such business. That defendant in 1903 entered into and engaged in the secondhand business in said town, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $500.

The principal contention of appellant is that the good will was not sold under the terms of the written contract, which only specified that the sale was of "all my right, title and interest in and to the goods, wares and merchandise in my storeroom," etc., excepting certain articles specified, coupled with an agreement that the seller should not enter into or engage in the business or occupation of secondhand dealer in the town of San Bernardino so long as the buyer should continue in business. We are of opinion that, by a fair interpretation of this entire agreement, it indicates upon its face the sale of a business. The sale of the contents of a store amounts to a sale of the store. The subsequent provision by which the seller agrees not to engage in the secondhand business accentuates the correctness of this interpretation. Section 1647, Civ. Code, provides: "A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." Under this provision, if any uncertainty exists as to the intent, the oral proof adduced upon the trial—and which, in our opinion, was properly admitted—demonstrated that the defendant was seeking to purchase an established second-hand store business in the town of San Bernardino. If, then, the contract related to the sale of a business, such contract has received a construction in Streeter v. Rush, 25 Cal. 68, in which it is held that the obvious intention of such contract is to sell the good will of such business. It is true the contract is in excess of the rights conferred by section 1674, Civil Code, in that it undertakes to restrict the right to engage in business so long as the party of the first part may continue in business, omitting the words "similar business" found in the section. This, however, would not render the contract thereby void, but only to the extent to which it attempted to enlarge the rights beyond the statute. Brown v. Kling, 101 Cal. 299, 35 Pac. 995. "The damages for breach of contract for the purchase of the good will of an established trade or business are so absolutely uncertain that courts have recognized the fullest liberty of parties to fix beforehand the amount of damages in that class of cases." Potter v. Ahrens, 110 Cal. 681, 43 Pac. 389. The contract, therefore, being of such character, it was unnecessary to plead or prove the impracticability of fixing the damages, which is the rule when contracts are not of such obvious character. Long Beach, etc., v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 405, 67 Pac. 499. It not appearing clearly that the penalty inserted was intended as security for the payment of actual damages, the court will regard the amount as liquidated damages. Streeter v. Rush, supra.

We think there was no error in the admission of the evidence excepted to, which was all received in explanation of the circumstances under which the contract was made and in relation to the subject-matter of the contract, and the tendency of which was not to create a new contract or to enlarge the terms of the original written contract. There is no point made upon this appeal, nor in the court below, of the insufficiency of the complaint by reason of the absence of the allegation of nonpayment of the damages, and the same is therefore not considered.

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment is ordered affirmed.

I concur: GRAY, P. J.

I concur, on the authority of Streeter v. Rush, 25 Cal. 67, cited in the opinion: SMITH, J.

SYVERTSON v. BUTLER et al.

1. PLEADING — CROSS-COMPLAINT — PERMISSION OF COURT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, providing that, whenever defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint at the same time, or by permission of the court subsequently, a cross-complaint to which no objection is raised by the original plaintiff, and as to which a demurrer by the defendants therein is overruled, will be regarded as on file by consent of the court, although no formal permission to file the cross-complaint was granted.

2. APPEAL—FILING CROSS-COMPLAINT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 389, declaring that, when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them to be brought in and may order amended and supplemental pleadings or a cross-complaint to be filed, etc., the action of the court in permitting defendant, in an action concerning real property, to file a cross-complaint against persons not originally parties, but who claimed an interest in the land, was an exercise of discretion which will not be interfered with on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by F. J. Syvertson against Mary A. Butler and others, in which defendant Butler filed a cross-complaint against Amelia Delonee and others. From a judgment in favor of cross-complaint, Pearl Mecartney and another, as executrices of the will of Amos Mecartney, deceased, defendants to the cross-complaint, appeal. Affirmed.

Pringle & Pringle and Lawler, Allen & Van Dyke, for appellants. O. B. Carter, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Appeal by defendants Pearl and Meda Mecartney, executrices of the estate of A. Mecartney, deceased, from a judgment rendered in favor of defendant Butler, upon a cross-complaint, against defendants appellants. The plaintiff commenced his action against defendant Butler and others, alleging his ownership and seisin in fee of certain described real estate. Defendant Butler answered, disclaiming any interest in the premises set out in the complaint, other than as to a single lot described, as to which she averred ownership and denied that plaintiff had any estate or interest therein. At the time of filing answer, defendant Butler filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff, appellants, and one Carter, administrator of the estate of Butler, deceased. A copy of the cross-complaint was served upon the attorney of plaintiff, and the summons, with a copy of the cross-complaint, upon the other defendants to the cross-complaint. All defendants to the cross-complaint, other than Pearl and Meda Mecartney, the executrices, made default. They demurred to the cross-complaint upon various grounds, among which was that the court had no jurisdiction of the person of said defendants, in that they were not parties to the original complaint, and that it does not appear that their presence is necessary to a complete determination of the controversy arising from the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, and appellants and other defendants to the cross-complaint suffered a default to be entered. The plaintiff in writing stipulated that a decree might go as prayed for in the cross-complaint. Thereupon judgment went for cross-complainant, from which the Mecartneys, as executrices, appeal.

Section 442, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party * * * affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time, or by permission of the court subsequently, a cross-complaint." While the court did not formally grant permission to file this cross-complaint, the plaintiff interposed no objection thereto, but, on the contrary, assented to the granting of its prayer; and the action of the court upon the demurrer can only be taken as evidence that the court considered the cross-complaint to be on file with its consent. The only question presented, therefore, is as to the authority of the court in actions of this character to order new parties brought in when in its opinion their presence is necessary to a complete determination of the controversy. The power of the court so to do is given by section 389, Code of Civil Procedure, in which case they may and should be brought in. Winter v. McMillan, 87 Cal. 256, 25 Pac. 407, 22 Am. St. Rep. 243. "This section does not give the court power to bring into the action for determination a controversy between a defendant and strangers to the action which is irrelevant to the action between the parties already before it, except for the purpose of making its determination of the controversy between the parties already before it complete." Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 570, 79 Pac. 171. The controversy between plaintiff and defendant was with reference to the title to certain real property, which was the thing to which the action related. The power to order others brought into the action is a discretionary one. Alpers v. Bliss, supra. The court in this instance having done that which is the equivalent of an order to bring in new parties, and it appearing that the claims between the cross-complainant and defendants thereto were not irrelevant to the subject of the action, and the plaintiff not objecting, we can see no reason why the action of the court below should be disturbed. The effect of the order overruling the demurrer was the same as would have been an order denying the motion of plaintiff to strike out the cross-complaint.

We perceive no error in the trial court retaining jurisdiction and rendering the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

HONEYCUTT, County Auditor, v. COLGAN, State Controller.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 30, 1906.)

TAXATION—PENALTIES — PERCENTAGES — DISTRIBUTION.

Pol. Code, § 3816, provides that on redemption of land from tax sales the original and subsequent taxes and percentages, penalty, and and interest paid on redemption shall be apportioned between the state and county according to a specified rate, and that the additional penalties received on acount of delinquency, together with the costs, shall be paid into the treasury for the use and benefit of the county, or city and county, etc. Section 3817 declares that an owner of land sold to the state for taxes may redeem by paying the county treasurer the amount of taxes, penalties, and costs, with interest, and all costs and expenses of such redemption and penalties, to wit, certain graduated percentages ranging from 10 to 100 per cent., if redeemed within five years or less from the date of the sale. Held that, while moneys received for original and subsequent taxes, penalties, and interest growing out of the delinquency on the part of the taxpayer were distributable wholly to the county, the graduated penalties on redemption of land sold for taxes, etc., was subject to apportionment between the state and the county, according to the rate specified in section 3816.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by A. S. Honeycutt, as auditor of Madera county, Cal., against E. P. Colgan, as State Controller. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. R. Fowler and W. H. Larew, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff is the auditor of Madera county and defendant is Controller of the state. The action is to compel defendant to settle with plaintiff by allowing the latter the several amounts claimed, aggregating $8,547.26. These several amounts making this aggregate are set out in 17 separate counts, in an amended complaint, representing sums accruing at the semiannual settlements from May, 1895, to the December settlement in 1903. It is alleged that these amounts were "part of the punitive penalties collected upon the redemption of real estate in Madera county during the six months immediately preceding their settlement; that no part of said penalties were required by law to be paid into the state treasury, that the whole thereof belongs to the county of Madera" and that said sums were "paid into the state treasury illegally and by error and mistake of the State Controller in requiring" the same to be so paid. It is alleged that the mistake consisted in this: "that the State Controller ever since the month of May, 1895, has required and still does require that all punitive penalties lawfully collected upon the redemption of real estate sold to the state for delinquent taxes shall be distributed between the state and county in the same ratio that the state rate of taxation bears to the county rate of taxation, whereas, in fact, under the provisions of section 3816 of the Political Code the county of Madera, was and is entitled to the whole of the penalties so collected upon redemption of real estate sold to the state for delinquent taxes, and the same should all have been paid" to the county. It is further alleged that said mistake was not discovered by any officer of said county until the month of June, 1903. A general demurrer was filed to the amended complaint, pleading also the statute of limitations. The court overruled the demurrer, and, plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment passed for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

The case will be disposed of without considering the statute of limitations. The sections cited infra are sections of the Political Code, unless otherwise noted. The so-called "punitive penalties" mentioned in the complaint are the penalties imposed by section 3817, which must be paid by the person desiring to redeem land sold to the state for delinquent taxes. It is to section 3816 we must look to ascertain the disposition which the statute makes of these penalties when collected. And the question is: Are these so-called "punitive penalties"—or, more properly speaking, these graduated penalties on redemption—to be divided between the state and county as has been the practice under the controller's construction of section 3816, since its amendment in 1895, or are all these penalties to go to the county?

Before examining these two sections it will be well to notice briefly the legislative provisions leading up to the point of redemption from delinquent tax sales. Taxes are payable by installments, the first in November and the second in April, and become delinquent respectively in these months. A penalty of 15 per cent. is added to the taxes delinquent in November and must be collected for the use of the county, and if these taxes be not paid when the second installment becomes delinquent in the following April, the tax collector "shall collect an addition of 5 per cent. thereon." When the last installment is delinquent in April, if unpaid, the tax collector must collect for the use of the county "an addition of 5 per cent. thereon." Section 3756. (These penalties are, as now claimed by respondent, the "additional penalties on account of delinquency" mentioned in section 3816.) When the delinquent list is completed the tax collector is required to publish the same, giving the amount of the "taxes, penalties and costs due" (section 3764), with notice that unless paid "the real property upon which such taxes are a lien will be sold" (section 3765). It will be observed that the word "penalties" in section 3765 is changed to read "percentage" by amendment in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 18, c. 11). Later along in the provisions relating to sale the word "penalties" is used. Section 3813 provides that where the property is sold to the state "it must be assessed each subsequent year for taxes, until a deed is made to the state therefor, in the same manner as if it had not been so purchased," but no further sale shall be made for nonpayment of taxes (section 3814). (These taxes are the "subsequent taxes" which with the "original taxes" are to be apportioned as provided in section 3816.) Semiannual settlements of the county treasurer and auditor and the state controller are required by sections 3866 and 3868 and the question now here has arisen out of these settlements and relates to the penalties required to be paid on redemption under section 3817, and their distribution between the state and county under section 3816. A better arrangement of these two latter sections would have been to reverse the order of their occurrence, fixing the penalties first and directing their distribution afterwards. But the arrangement cannot affect the construction to be given them. Section 3816 is as follows: "Whenever property sold to the state, pursuant to the provisions of this chapter, shall be redeemed as herein provided, the moneys received on account of such redemption shall be distributed as follows: The original and subsequent taxes, and percentages, penalty, and the interest paid on redemption, shall be apportioned between the state and county, or city and county, in the same proportion that the state rate bears to the county, or city and county rate of taxation" (it is under the foregoing clauses as now, claimed by respondent that the graduated "penalties on redemption" are to be apportioned); "the additional penalties received on account of delinquency together with the costs shall be paid into the treasury for the use and benefit of the county, or city and county; the total amount received for state poll tax shall be paid to the state, without deduction of any percentages; the amounts received for road or hospital poll tax, and the amounts received for school, or road district, or other taxes, together with the penalties thereon, shall be paid into the county treasury and placed to the credit of the proper funds." The section then requires an accurate account of these moneys to be kept by the auditor and treasurer and a settlement to be made with the controller semiannually as provided in sections 3865, 3866, and 3868, "in such form as the Controller may desire." Section 3817 provides that where redemption from sale to the state takes place, the redemptioner may redeem "by paying to the county treasurer the amount of the taxes, penalties and costs due thereon at the time of sale, with interest on the aggregate amount of said taxes, penalties and costs at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; and all taxes that were a lien upon said real estate at the time said taxes became delinquent; and also all unpaid taxes of every description assessed against the property for each year since the sale; or, if not so assessed, then upon the value of the property as assessed in the year nearest the time to such redemption, with interest from the first of July following each of said years, respectively, at the same rate, to the time of redemption." (To this point it is conceded that the county is entitled to the items mentioned as charges on "delinquency.") The section then reads: "And also all costs and expenses of such redemption, and penalties as follows, to wit: ten per cent. if redeemed within six months from the date of sale; twenty per cent. if redeemed within one year therefrom; forty per cent. if redeemed within two years therefrom; sixty per cent. if if redeemed within three years therefrom; eighty per cent. if redeemed within four years therefrom; and one hundred per cent. if redeemed within five or any greater number of years therefrom." (These "penalties" are now claimed by appellant to be included in the terms "additional penalties," as used in section 3816, and should all go to the county, while respondent contends that they should be apportioned between the state and the county as penalties on redemption.) The section continues: "The penalty (or percentage as it is sometimes called) shall be computed upon the amount of each year's taxes in like manner, reckoning from the time when the lands would have been sold for the taxes of that year, if there had been no previous sale thereof." The section then directs the auditor, in case a person desires to redeem, to make certificates in triplicate of the estimate of the amount to be paid, which shall be delivered to the county treasurer with the money, who shall give receipts in triplicate indorsed thereon. The redemptioner then is to deliver one of these to the auditor and one to the state controller, and thus the deed "to the state shall become null and void."

The controversy (as has been indicated parenthetically in quoting the statute) relates to the graduated penalties, or punitive penalties, or percentages (whatever they may be called) of 10, 20, 40, 60, 80, and 100 per cent. imposed on redemption. These graduated penalties were first imposed in 1895 and have been, without question, until this action was commenced, opportioned between the state and county, the same as original and subsequent taxes and interest paid on redemption. They were construed to mean penalties or percentage paid on redemption first mentioned in section 3816, and not as "additional penalties received on account of delinquency," subsequently therein mentioned. The distinction between penalties for delinquency and penalties on redemption would seem to be a natural one to draw, and should be kept in mind. Prior to 1895 the state became the purchaser at delinquent tax sales only where there was no bidder for the land and redemption was limited to one year, after which a deed was given to the purchaser. The state now becomes the purchaser in all cases and deed does not pass to the state for five years, although the land continues to be taxed for subsequent years "until a deed is made to the state therefor." Section 3813. Redemption may be made at any time, but if not redeemed the state may sell at public auction when the state gets its deed. The graduated redemption penalty was imposed in a way to encourage redemption, the penalty increasing with each year of nonredemption.

Prior to 1895 there were, as there still are, two classes of penalties, sometimes called percentages, a penalty for delinquency in paying the tax, and a penalty paid on redemption. The penalties for delinquency have always gone to the county while the penalties on redemption have always been apportioned between the state and county. This distinction seems to have been in the minds of the framers of the law of 1895. We do not see how these graduated penalties on redemption, imposed from year to year by increasing proportions, can be regarded as "additional penalities received on account of delinquency." The property is sold to the state upon the first year's delinquency, and is not again sold for taxes. The subsequent taxes are added from year to year until the state gets its deed, and they form a part of the "subsequent taxes" mentioned in section 3816 which are apportioned. The penalties required to be paid on redemption have nothing to do with the delinquency in the payment of the tax and bear no relation to it for the land has passed to the state. They may well be embraced in one or other or both of the terms "percentages" and "penalty" mentioned in section 3816 to be apportioned as therein provided. The "additional penalties" referred to which are to be paid into the treasury for the use of the county, are expressly mentioned as being "received on account of delinquency," and how can we say that this must mean the graduated penalties which are imposed by section 3817, not on "account of any delinquency" but which are expressly stated to be exacted as "penalties on redemption?" We must, according to admitted canons of construction, give some meaning to all terms of the statute if we can do so without violating its obvious purpose. An interpretation which gives effect is preferred to one which makes void. Civ. Code, § 3541. The natural reading of section 3816 would lead to the meaning that all "percentages, penalties (penalty is the equivalent word used) and the interest paid on redemption," shall be apportioned as therein directed, as well as "the original and subsequent taxes," and this would clearly include the graduated penalties on redemption mentioned in section 3817. The percentages and penalty are "paid on redemption" as are the "original taxes." Upon similar rules of construction we must give some meaning to the terms "additional penalties received on account of delinquency" which go to the county. To do this we derive no aid from section 3817, for no mention is there made of penalties for delinquency except such as clearly refer to penalties before sale. We do, however, find in other sections a source of some light which is shed upon these terms, "additional penalties received on account of delinquency." Section 3817, by act of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 23, c. 16), mentions a penalty of 25 per cent. on redemption, and it was apportioned under section 3816 to the state and county as is now done with the graduated penalties on redemption. Section 3816 then provided, as to what are now referred to as "additional penalties received on account of delinquency," as follows: "the 5 per cent. additional * * * shall be paid to the county." This obviously referred to the 5 per cent. penalty for delinquency under section 3756 as it then read and was so construed and so enforced. See Collier v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 319, at page 322, 70 Pac. 117. But section 3756 was amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 447, c. 230) to correspond with the statute requiring semiannual payment of taxes, and imposed three different penalties for delinquency, namely, 15, 5 and 5 per cent., already explained supra. When section 3816 was amended in 1895, there being several of these penalties, it very properly referred to them as "additional penalties (using the plural number) received on account of delinquency." When there was but a single "additional penalty" of 5 per cent. for delinquency, the statute so referred to it and its meaning was not doubted. No more, do we think, should the present statute be held to be of doubtful meaning. It means the additional penalties on delinquency imposed by section 3756. They are imposed by the county before sale and become in fact part of the taxes and we do not see how the language can reasonably be held to include the graduated penalties on redemption, after sale, mentioned in section 3817.

There is an essential difference in the relation of the owner of the taxable land while it is resting under assessment for taxes, and after it has passed into other ownership by sale for failure to pay the taxes. In the first case he is a delinquent because he has failed to perform a duty. The term "delinquency" is apt and is expressive of the owner's attitude to the state. But when his land is taken by the state in lieu of the taxes which he failed to pay, it is then optional with him whether to take advantage of the privilege given him by law to redeem the land or let the state keep it. He is then a redemptioner, and he cannot divest the state of its interest in the land except he redeem within the period of the redemption which continues until the state has disposed of the land (section 3897). He is not any longer a tax delinquent in any proper sense; he is not even a redemption delinquent for there is no duty on him to redeem. Indeed he is not any kind of a delinquent, for the term delinquency does not apply because of his neglect to redeem. The Supreme Court said in San Francisco, etc., L. Co. v. Banbury, 106 Cal. 129, 39 Pac. 439: "If the state has become the purchaser of land at a delinquent tax sale the tax has been extinguished by the sale, and the state, instead of being a creditor of the taxpayer, or entitled to receive any money due to it for taxes, has acquired an interest in the land, which is to be divested only by some affirmative action on the part of the delinquent taxpayer." This affirmative action is neither more nor less than redemption. As throwing still further light upon the meaning of section 3816, it may be well to call attention to the fact that this section was twice amended at the same session of the Legislature in 1895. The first amendment was on February 25th (St. 1895, p. 21, c. 11). There the language used was "the original and subsequent taxes, and all percentages and penalties paid in redemption," but made no mention of interest. The language used further along to cover the penalties for delinquency was "the 5 per cent. additional * * *" shall "be paid to the county." This latter phrase failed to correctly refer to the amendment that had taken place in section 3756 wherein several additional penalties for delinquency had been imposed, as already pointed out. To make clear the meaning, and to include interest and to amend in some other respects, section 3816 was again amended (or re-enacted with amendments) on March 28, 1895. St. 1895, p. 333, c. 218. It there reads: "Additional penalties received on account of delinquency." In the first amendment the words "on account of delinquency" did not appear, and the single penalty of 5 per cent. failed to include all the penalties referred to in section 3756. The change in phraseology seems to point to the construction we have given. The change in the phraseology from "percentages and penalties paid on redemption" to "percentages, penalty, and interest paid on redemption" was intended to include interest, omitted in the first amendment, and we have no doubt was also intended, and sufficiently expresses that intention, to mean the same thing as the phraseology first used in respect of the percentages or penalties on redemption.

Pursuing the changes in the statute some further, some additional light is thrown upon the question. In 1891, when the change was made in section 3756 to meet the semiannual payments of taxes, already noted (St. 1891, p. 447, c. 230), section 3816 was also amended (St. 1891, p. 449, c. 230), and the latter section directed "the original tax and the 25 per cent. and interest paid in redemption" to be "apportioned between the state and county and city and county in the same proportion that the state tax bears to the county and city and county tax." And the section then provides that: "the moneys received from delinquencies shall be paid to the county, or city and county." Undoubtedly these "moneys received for delinquencies" which were to go to the county, under section 3756 as amended, referred to the penalties or moneys received at the same time. The statute as then understood and enforced, recognized the clear distinction between penalties on redemption and penalties for delinquency. This distinction occurs so frequently in the Code sections as to leave no doubt in our minds that it was intended to be observed in the enforcement of the law. It is still further seen in section 3758 where the auditor is directed to "enter against all the items of taxes due and unpaid the penalty for delinquency," clearly referring to section 3756. Also section 3770, where the tax collector is directed to collect "in addition to the taxes due on the delinquent list, together with the penalties for delinquency." Everywhere in the Code the per cent. referred to in section 3756 is spoken of as "penalties for delinquency," and no reason is perceivable why the words "additional penalties received on account of delinquency" should be given any different construction when used in section 3816. A careful examination of the statutes establishing the system or policy of taxation of lands, their sale for delinquent taxes, the conditions on which redemption may be made and the steps to be taken on redemption shows a consistent and uniform purpose of the law to be and the practice under it has been, for a long period of years, to apportion the moneys collected on percentages or penalties on redemption between the state and county "in the same proportion that the state tax bears to the county and city and county tax," and likewise the moneys received for original and subsequent taxes and the interest on such moneys have been so apportioned. Some question has arisen between the parties as to the effect on the question here by reason of the decisions in Collier v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 319, 70 Pac. 177, and San Diego Investment Co. v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 323, 70 Pac. 179. These cases concerned taxes imposed under the law prior to 1891 and do not, so far as we can see, aid us materially in the solution of the question now here.

We have not singled out for comment the points made in argument by counsel for appellant in the careful and able presentation they have given the case. But we have endeavored to treat the question before us in a way to cover all material points and to leave no doubt as to our construction of the statute. The conclusion we have reached seems to us to result not only from a reasonable construction of the statute, but to be fair and just to the state and counties concerned. After sale the burden has shifted to the state and the redemptioner's relations are then with the state and the penalties in question begin to be imposed when this relation begins. In the apportionment of these charges on redemption the state receives much the smaller part, the counties receiving the balance. In the long run, should the counties get all these moneys, the benefit to them would be but temporary, for this loss of revenue to the state would have to be made up ultimately by taxation. While these considerations should not control in reaching a decision, they coincide with what is the ultimate aim of judicial determinations —to do substantial justice between litigants. The judgment is affirmed.

NIXON v. GOODWIN.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 2, 1906.)

1. Fraudulent Conveyances — Invalidity — Statutes.

Under Civ. Code, § 3439, declaring that every transfer of property made with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person is void against all creditors and against any person on whom the estate of the debtor devolves for the benefit of others than the debtor, a fraudulent conveyance by the debtor is void at the instance of creditors, or of the debtor's assignee in insolvency, without reference to whether the conveyance was made within 30 days prior to the filing of the debtor's petition in insolvency, provided there were creditors at the time of the conveyance and there was not sufficient other property with which to pay them.

2. Same—Consideration—Insolvency.

Where a transfer of property was made voluntarily and without a valuable consideration by a debtor while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, the same is void as to existing creditors, as provided by Civ. Code, § 3442.

3. Corporations — Conveyances — When Insolvent—Fraud—Evidence.

Defendant, while the owner of one-third of all of the stock of a mining corporation, advanced $44,000 to it, and knowing that the company was insolvent resigned from his office as president and director, so that a deed of the company's property could be made to him, which was done on the succeeding day. This transfer was kept secret by the parties for fear of creditors, and was only disclosed by defendant at a meeting of creditors for the purpose of effecting a settlement, when defendant stated that the deed had been made to him to protect all the creditors before himself. A few days thereafter, however, defendant conveyed the property to a bank, which was also a creditor of the corporation, and the bank subsequently reconveyed the property to defendant, taking a mortgage back to secure its indebtedness. The creditors did nothing to ratify these transactions, and in a suit by the corporation's assignee in insolvency to set aside the deed defendant did not testify. Held, that the deed was fraudulent as against the creditors of the corporation.

4. Same—Conveyances to Officers.

Where the president of a corporation, who was its largest creditor, resigned as president and director, for the purpose of qualifying himself to take a conveyance of all of the corporation's property, which he did on the succeeding day, the conveyance should be treated as made to him as an officer of the corporation for the purpose of preferring himself over the other creditors of the corporation, and was therefore void.

5. Same — Assignments for Benefit of Creditors.

Where defendant, the president of a corporation, secretly resigned in order to accept a conveyance of the corporation's property in settlement of a pre-existing debt, which was secretly made on the next day, and though he thereafter stated that the conveyance was made for the benefit of all of the corporation's creditors, he subsequently conveyed the property to a bank, by which it was reconveyed to defendant and a mortgage taken by the bank to secure the corporation's debt, such facts were insufficient to warrant a finding that the deed to defendant was made by the corporation for the benefit of all of the corporation's creditors.

6. Fraudulent Conveyances—Evidence.

In an action by a corporation in insolvency to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance of the corporation's property to its president, a judgment recovered against the grantor after the conveyance was made was inadmissible.

7. Witnesses — Examination — Nonresponsive Answer.

In a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by a corporation to defendant, its president, a witness was asked whether the money procured from a certain bank was given to defendant for his individual account. Witness answered that it was not, but that it was all defendant's because, when the witness went to the bank and filed the security, the bank gave witness a line of credit to allow the corporation to increase the overdraft $15,000. Held, that the answer was properly stricken as not responsive.

8. Fraudulent Conveyances—Action to Vacate—Evidence.

Where, in an action to vacate an alleged fraudulent conveyance, defendant claimed that the conveyance was made to him for the benefit of all of the creditors of the grantor, a deed by which defendant conveyed the property to a bank, a subsequent reconveyance by the bank to defendant, and a mortgage by defendant to the bank securing the latter's claim against the grantor, was admissible to contradict such defense.

9. EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

In an action to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance by a corporation, a question calling for the amount of a creditor's claim against the corporation, which the witness answered by simply stating the amount, was not objectionable as not the best evidence.

10. APPEAL—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by an insolvent, the amount of the insolvent's indebtedness to a creditor was shown by the approved claim of such creditor in insolvency proceedings, the erroneous introduction of a memorandum made by the witness at a meeting of creditors to prove such indebtedness, which was hearsay, was harmless.

11. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE.

Where defendant claimed that an alleged fraudulent conveyance had been made to him for the benefit of creditors of the grantor corporation, a mortgage on the property included in the conveyance in controversy executed to C. to secure a note given by defendant was admissible to rebut such defense.

12. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where defendant could have derived no advantage from a witness' answer to a question which was objected to, an error of the court in sustaining the objection was harmless.

13. WITNESSES—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—PRIVILEGE.

Where, in a suit to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance by an insolvent corporation, an attorney for certain creditors was asked concerning a paper purporting to relate to an agreement concerning the manner of paying the debts of the corporation, and after identifying the paper stated that he received the same, and after reading it returned it to his client, a question as to whether he advised his client in relation thereto was not objectionable as calling for a communication between attorney and client and for the witness' opinion as an attorney.

14. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance by a corporation to its president, certain notes purporting to have been made by the corporation to defendant were inadmissible to show an indebtedness due from the corporation to defendant, in the absence of proof that the execution of the notes was authorized by the corporation's board of directors.

15. EVIDENCE — CORPORATE RECORDS — CERTIFICATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1918, subds. 6, 7, provide that documents may be proved by the original or by a copy certified by the legal keeper thereof, and if from another state it must be accompanied by a certificate of the Secretary of State, judges of the superior or county court, or mayor of a city, that the copy is duly certified by the officer having the local custody of the original. Held, that an affidavit attached to extracts from the minutes of the meetings of a corporation's board of directors, held in another state, reciting that the affiant was president of the corporation and to the best of his knowledge and belief the extracts were true extracts of the minutes of the several meetings, was not properly certified to authorize the admission of such extracts in evidence.

16. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance from a corporation to its president, evidence as to the first money that was borrowed by the corporation from its president was inadmissible, in the absence of a showing first made that the corporation had authorized the borrowing of the money.

17. SAME.

Where, in an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of property from a corporation to its president, there was no legal offer to show what took place at a certain meeting of the corporation's board of directors, a question as to who was present at such meeting was immaterial.

18. WITNESSES—KNOWLEDGE.

In an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by a corporation to its president, evidence that certain money borrowed by the corporation from its president belonged to him was properly stricken, because of the witness' lack of knowledge concerning the source from which the money was produced.

19. EVIDENCE—CORPORATE RECORDS—DIRECTORS' MEETINGS.

Recitals of the minutes of a meeting of a corporate board of directors cannot be proved by parol.

20. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILTY.

Where, in an action to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance by a corporation to its president, a witness testified that on the date of the conveyance the corporation owned 60.000 shares of the capital stock of a mining company, but that witness did not know its value since about a year prior to that time, evidence as to the value of the stock a year prior to such conveyance was immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; M. P. Bennett, Judge.

Action by George S. Nixon, as assignee of the Montauk Consolidated Gold Mining Company, against William Dallas Goodwin. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. L. T. Hatfield and William E. Kleinsorge, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This action was brought to cancel a deed of conveyance executed and delivered to defendant William Dallas Goodwin on April 3, 1901, by Montauk Consolidated Gold Mining Company, a foreign corporation, upon the grounds that it was made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said mining corporation, and to prevent the property of said corporation from coming into the hands of its assignee in insolvency, and to evade the provisions of the insolvent act of 1895. Defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint on all the statutory grounds. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The court found that the Montauk Consolidated Gold Mining Company was insolvent on April 3, 1901, and that defendant knew of said insolvency; that defendant was a stockholder in said corporation and a member of the board of directors thereof until some time between the 1st and 3d of April, 1901, when he resigned as director and president for the purpose of having the said deed made to him; that on April 3, 1901, said mining corporation executed to defendant the deed in controversy for the purpose of placing the property of said corporation beyond the reach of the creditors of said corporation, and to hinder, delay, and defraud said creditors; and that said defendant had full knowledge that said deed was without valuable consideration and was for the purpose and with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud said creditors, and to prevent the property of said corporation from being distributed ratably among its creditors. The demurrer alleged, among other things, that plaintiff had no capacity to sue to set aside said deed, and that only the creditors could do so, because the said deed was executed, delivered, and recorded more than 30 days before the filing of the petition in insolvency against the Montauk Consolidated Gold Mining Company; and the appellant insists on this idea in his brief and cites in support thereof Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. 180, 29 Pac. 495, and Babcock v. Chase, 111 Cal. 351, 43 Pac. 1105. But neither of these cases seems to furnish any authority for appellant's contention. In Francisco v. Aguirre the question was over the delivery of the furniture in a lodging house. In Babcock v. Chase the deed was made five years prior to the adjudication in insolvency, and at a time when the insolvent, Wilson, is not alleged to have had any creditors. The deed was made to Burtch on a consideration of $5, and it is further alleged that Burtch subsequently conveyed to Martenstein and Chase for a like expressed consideration, but that there was no real consideration in either transaction, and that it was all at the request of Wilson, that the land might be held for his benefit. The court held: "Upon the allegations of this complaint these deeds cannot be successfully attacked by the grantor, Wilson, or his assignee in insolvency. No express trust is charged, and there is nothing recited in the pleading that would authorize the introduction of evidence to establish a trust in parol." But in the case at bar the complaint alleges the insolvency of the mining company at the time it made the deed, and in the second count alleges the deed to have been made for the benefit of all the creditors, but was not accepted by the creditors, and that such assignment, transfer, and conveyance to defendant tended to coerce the creditors of the said mining company to compromise or release their demands. In Salisbury v. Burr, 114 Cal. 451, 46 Pac. 270, the court held that under section 3439 of the Civil Code every transfer of property made with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands is void against all creditors, and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor. It is further said: "This broad provision renders it void, at the instance of creditors or of the assignee in insolvency." And we think this must be so, without reference to whether the deed was made within 30 days of the time of filing the petition in insolvency, providing that there were creditors at the time and not sufficient other property with which to pay them, as in the case at bar, and the attempted transfer was made with intent to hinder, delay or defraud the creditors. This settles the right under the pleadings in this case of the assignee in insolvency to bring the action to set aside the deed made as here alleged. The demurrer was properly overruled.

The said deed was made April 3, 1901, and the petition in insolvency was filed June 6, 1901, and appellant contends that, the deed not having been made within 30 days before the insolvency proceedings were instituted, the conveyance was not a prohibited or void one under the insolvent act of 1895, and that there is no evidence to support finding 6 that the said mining company, "acting in concert with said defendant and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding its creditors, and to prevent its property from being distributed ratably among its creditors, executed to defendant the deed, a true copy of which is set out in the complaint," and other matters in said finding. In a case like the one at bar the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law; and while a transfer or change cannot be said to be fraudulent merely on the ground that it was made without valuable consideration, yet if any transfer or incumbrance of property be made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, the same shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors. Section 3442, Civ. Code. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that the said deed was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding the creditors, or to prevent them from receiving an equal pro rata on their claims. At the time this deed was made, April 3, 1901, the defendant knew the insolvent condition of said mining company. He was a stockholder, owning one-third of all the shares of said mining company, and up to the very day before the said deed was made he was a director and the president thereof, and the evidence shows he resigned both positions April 2, 1901, so that this deed might be made to him, and the deed was made the next day. He was the largest creditor, and there was no consideration paid for the deed, other than the debt of $44,000 the said mining company owed him. Both appellant and the mining company sought to keep the transfer a secret, because they feared the creditors whose claims they could not meet, and that if the transfer was made public it would cause trouble with the labor at the mine.

The appellant did not testify. But at a meeting held with some of the creditors a month after the deed was made he then for the first time informed them all the property of the mining company had been deeded to him for the purpose of having him take care of all the creditors, with the understanding that all the creditors should be protected and paid before he would collect his own indebtedness. But on April 17th appellant made a deed of conveyance of all the property to the Placer County Bank, being a creditor of said mining company to the amount of $13,106.84. The said bank subsequently made a reconveyance to appellant, and he then gave it a mortgage on the same property to secure the indebtedness. The other creditors knew nothing of the deed to appellant, nor of the transaction with the Placer County Bank, and in no way ratified the deed from the mining company to appellant. Nothing whatever is said in the said deed to indicate that it was made for any purpose other than for the sole benefit of appellant. The rule is that a director of an insolvent corporation cannot receive to himself any preference or advantage over other creditors in the payment of his debt (Bonney v. Tilley, 109 Cal. 346, 42 Pac. 439); and surely the same rule would apply with equal force to one who is a large creditor of the corporation of which he is a director and the president, and who resigns to-day that he may to-morrow (secretly as to all other creditors) accept a conveyance to himself of the corporation's property.

Nor would such be a transfer coming under the provisions of section 3452 of the Civil Code, where a debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another, because such action, when taken by a director, or one so lately holding that relation, would be taking an unfair as well as unlawful advantage of other creditors, and would be an attempt pure and simple to prevent a ratable distribution of the insolvent's assets among its creditors. The defendant does not stand as an ordinary common creditor; for, notwithstanding his resignation as director and president for the purposes for which tendered, he cannot escape the conclusion inevitably to be reached that he stands still in the same light the law views a director of a corporation when it forbids him making himself a preferred creditor, and any attempt at so doing, in our opinion, would subject him and his acts to the same prohibition as though he were still a director. A man cannot be permitted to so easily throw off his trust relations, and, as here, for the purpose of giving him an advantage over ordinary creditors, that he may take the property which he as a director had been holding in trust for all the creditors and apply it on his own debt to their detriment. Under the circumstances in this case, that all the debts, or nearly so, owing by the corporation were contracted while defendant was a director and presumably contracted at his instance and request, as he was president, it seems to us the deed made to him on April 3d, the day after he had resigned, was just as fraudulent and void as if it had been made April 1st, and while he was yet a director. Could he thus divest himself of his trust relations, so that he might make legal the act which the law declares illegal while a director? I think not, for the same undue advantage which the law prohibits is still exercised. A director of a corporation may advance money to it, may become its creditor, may take from it a mortgage or any other security, and may enforce the same like any other creditor, but always subject to severe scrunity and under the obligations of acting in the utmost good faith. Taylor on Corporations, 634. Goodwin while a director could loan money to his corporation, and when such corporation had the use of his money is bound to repay him, and as long as the matter remained a question between Goodwin and the mining company he could enforce collection even while he remained a director. Schnittger v. Old Home Consolidated Mining Company, 144 Cal. 603, 78 Pac. 9. In this case just cited the rights of the other creditors were not involved. The officers of a corporation hold its property in trust for its stockholders, and incidentally for the creditors, and any transaction on the part of the directors which is tainted with fraud or in violation of the duties of their trust is voidable. Snediker v. Ayers, 146 Cal. 407, 80 Pac. 511.

The claim of the appellant that all the evidence in the case tends to show that the deed was made for the sole purpose of enabling him to protect and pay all the debts of the mining company does not seem to be sustained; but, on the contrary, we think it very clearly appears from all the evidence that appellant took the deed for the sole purpose of protecting and paying his own debt. It is true that after the creditors became aware af the deed and were clamoring for an adjustment of the indebtedness, and not until July 16th, more than three months after he took the deed, appellant did make an effort to settle with the creditors by having the net proceeds arising from the working of the mine and a certain first payment on a contemplated sale of the mine, paid into the Placer County Bank in the name of some one as trustee in trust for the creditors. But under the circumstances above detailed it cannot be said that this is any evidence tending to show that the deed was made for the benefit of all the creditors, and there is no evidence in the case indicating that the said mining company made the deed in question to appellant for any purpose other than to prefer him as a creditor; and if for that purpose the deed cannot stand, under the doctrine that a director cannot use up the property of his corporation to pay his debt to the disadvantage of the other creditors. It is true there is testimony indicating appellant offered to give the creditors a second mortgage on the property described in the deed in question. It is true one or two of the witnesses had heard appellant say the deed was made for the benefit of all the creditors; but when the appellant absents himself from the trial, and does not testify in the case, this evidence, weak as it is in the first place, is entitled to no weight at all. For the purpose of properly determining the question here involved it seems to me that it is immaterial whether the evidence shows that the deed was authorized or ratified by two-thirds of the stockholders, for appellant was a stockholder and president when the determination was reached to convey all the property of the mining company to him. How could he have resigned for the purpose of accepting this attempted conveyance, if not a director at the time the transfer was determined upon? The meetings of the stockholders and board of directors were held in New York on April 2 and April 3, 1901, and it was then the transfer was determined upon.

Assignments of error at the trial:

The petition of involuntary insolvency was filed June 6, 1901. The plaintiff produced and offered in evidence, and they were admitted over defendant's objection, creditors' claims which had been presented and approved in the said insolvency proceedings. The objection to these claims is based upon the affidavits attached thereto which fails to show that the debt represented therein was contracted prior to April 3, 1901. The claim of Mebius, Drescher & Co. for $5,149.81 was the first one offered. The testimony of P. C. Drescher shows that $5,044.81 of this claim was due April 3, 1901. There were 24 of these claims. There is no evidence as to the contents or items of these claims, further than the testimony of Drescher, Curtis, and Shaw, and this shows that at least the larger amount of their claims accrued prior to April 3, 1901. The bill of exceptions admits that all these 24 claims were the same in substance as to when the debt was due and owing, and as to allowance and filing and other matters, except amounts, as that of Mebius, Drescher & Co. This being so, and $5,089.81 of this claim having accrued prior to April 3, 1901, the objection of appellant is not well taken. This disposes of 24 of his exceptions.

The twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh specifications of error were to the admission of the judgment roll in the case of John Dias v. Montauk Consolidated Gold Mining Company, a copy of the execution, and the original execution. The action was for personal damages. The judgment not having been recovered until June 5, 1901, the objection should have been sustained; but appellant could not have been injured by the introduction of this judgment roll. There was, therefore, no reversible error.

The witness Coles on redirect examination was asked whether the money gotten from the Placer County Bank was given to appellant for any of his individual accounts, and answered: "No, sir; not a dollar. Well, I can take a different view. It was all Mr. Goodwin's, because when I went to the bank and filed the security the bank gave me a line of credit, allowed us to increase our overdraft to $15,000." Plaintiff moved to strike out this last answer, and the motion was granted. The answer was not responsive and was properly stricken out.

The introduction of the deed, the mortgage, and the deed of reconveyance, in the transaction appellant had with the Placer County Bank is assigned as error. This whole transaction had a tendency to show that the deed in controversy was not made for the benefit of the creditors as claimed by the grantee. The transfer of the property mentioned in this deed by the corporation to appellant must be judged by the terms of the deed and in the light of the contemporaneous and subsequent acts of the parties. These furnish the data for the determination of the intent and motives with which it was made. Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, § 601. The acts of the appellant in attempting to prefer the Placer County Bank, shown by his transferring the property to a creditor and his subsequent mortgaging it to secure such creditor's debt, all have a tendency to show that he was not acting in good faith when he says this deed was made to enable him to take care of all the creditors of the mining company and pay all their claims, and a tendency to show, further, that the deed was not made for the benefit of all the creditors, but for the purpose to hinder, delay, and defraud such creditors. For this purpose the transaction with the Bank of Placer County was a legitimate inquiry, and therefore the deed, the mortgage, and the deed of reconveyance were properly admitted.

The claim of Baker & Hamilton offered in evidence by plaintiff was objected to on the same grounds as the other claims which had been proven in the insolvency proceedings, and, we think, rightfully admitted. Objection was made to the testimony showing the amount of the debt due Mebius, Drescher & Co. Drescher was asked to state the amount of their claim, and answered, "$5,044.89." The objection was upon the ground that this was not the best evidence. He was simply asked the amount of his firm's claim, nothing more, and the question and answer were not subject to the objection made. Objection was made to the introduction of the amount of indebtedness shown by a memorandum made by the witness Kleinsorge at a meeting of creditors in May. This was error, as being hearsay, but was not reversible error, inasmuch as the amount of the indebtedness was shown by the approved claims in the insolvency proceedings.

Plaintiff offered in evidence a mortgage on the property included in the deed in controversy to L. L. Chamberlain June, 1901, to secure the payment of a promissory note of $3,692 given by defendant. Defendant objected on the ground the said mortgage was immaterial, irrelevant and incompetent. The objection was overruled and the mortgage admitted. The mortgage was material as tending to show that said deed was not made for the benefit of the creditors of the said corporation, but rather to hinder and delay them.

The witness Kleinsorge was asked about written instrument Defendant's Exhibit 2 for identification which had been presented to him at one time purporting to be an agreement whereby appellant agreed to sell to D. H. Coles and Dwight Treadway the property of the mining company upon certain conditions; said he did not remember when he received it. "I received it from Mr. Drescher, and I read it" and returned it to him. He was then asked by appellant: "Q. Did you advise him in relation to it?" The plaintiff objected on the ground that the question called "for the opinion of the witness and also for a communication between attorney and client. It is calling for his opinion as an attorney." The question was not objectionable upon the ground stated. Kleinsorge was the attorney for Drescher and other creditors, and this paper purported to relate to an agreement concerning the manner of paying the debts, and was no doubt presented to him for his advice by his client. To have answered whether or not he advised Mr. Drescher in relation would not have been any advantage to the defendant, for he would probably not have given any information as to what advice he gave, if any. Sustaining the objection was not reversible error.

Defendant offered in evidence ten promissory notes, of different dates and amounts, but aggregating $33,850, purporting to be notes given by the said mining company to appellant, and all, with the exception of the one for $5,000 due May 15, 1899, were shown by indorsements thereon to have been paid. Plaintiff objected to their introduction, on the ground that they were irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and no authority having been shown to authorize the execution of the same, and the court properly sustained the objection. These notes could not have been material to show indebtedness due from the said mining company to appellant unless their issue and execution were authorized by the board of directors, and there was no evidence of such authorization. The defendant did offer in evidence a paper purporting to contain extracts from the minutes of meetings of the board of directors wherein at least some of the said promissory notes appeared to have been authorized by the board and containing authorizations to borrow money. The minute book was not produced. And to this there was attached the affidavit of George C. Wilde under date of March 24, 1904, setting forth that he was the president of the Montauk Consolidated Gold Mining Company, and to the best of his knowledge and belief the said extracts are true extracts from the original minutes of the several meetings. But this instrument was not admissible as evidence, because not properly certified. Subdivisions 6, 7, § 1918, Code Civ. Proc.

Witness D. H. Coles, secretary of the said mining company, was asked by appellant in relation to the money the mining corporation had borrowed of appellant, testified the books he had in his hands were the original cash book and ledger of the corporation, and that prior to April, 1901, the corporation had borrowed money of appellant, and that he could tell from the books when the first loan was made. He kept the books and had made the original entries. He was asked: "What was the first money that was borrowed from William Dallas Goodwin? Does the book show that?" Plaintiff objected, because "premature, no foundation laid to show that anybody had any authority to borrow any money, and immaterial, and so forth." If it be conceded that the question was a material one, because the appellant had a right to show the corporation's indebtedness to him as tending to support his theory of the transfer to him of the corporation assets, still we think it necessary to first show the authorization of the corporation to borrow this money. This had not been shown, and therefore the objection was properly sustained. Coles was further asked if any other sums were borrowed from Goodwin for which no note was given, and the court sustained plaintiff's objection thereto, on the ground that, if there was money borrowed, it must have been a transaction by the board of directors, and a record made of it, such record constituting the best evidence. There was no such record presented and its absence was not accounted for. Coles further testified that he was the Coles mentioned in the paper offered purporting to be extracts from the minutes of the board of directors, and that he was the only Coles connected with this company, and was a director. He was then asked: "Who else was present besides you at the meeting of the board of directors?" (referring to the meeting of September 9, 1898). The question should have been answered; but, as it now appears that defendant did not offer in a legal way to show what took place at that meeting, the question as to who was present becomes immaterial. Further testifying, Coles said that in April, 1899, the said mining company borrowed of said Goodwin $10,000, and on October 17, 1899, the further sum of $5,000. He was then asked: "Was or was not that the money of William Dallas Goodwin?" And answered: "It was." The answer was stricken out on plaintiff's motion on the ground that the witness did not know the source of production of the money. The ruling was correct; but at the same time the witness had just testified, without objection or motion to strike out, that he knew the money the company received from Goodwin belonged to him and his wife. Coles testified he was present at the meeting of the directors and stockholders in New York April 3, 1901, when the deed in question was made by the corporation to the appellant. He was then asked by the defendant: "State, if you please, the consideration of that deed." Plaintiff objected to the question on the ground that it was immaterial as to what the consideration was because the records must show a valid transaction, and, further, that the deed was not assented to by the proper quantity of stock. The minutes of the board of directors of that meeting were not produced, and not even an extract of the minutes of that meeting was offered. That was a very important meeting and lasted two days. The president resigned and a new one was elected. Appellant was present, and the minutes, if properly kept, disclosed the action taken by him. Whatever may have been the reason for omitting the introduction of the minutes of that meeting, its proper recitals could not be proved by an oral statement. If there was any consideration for this deed, defendant could have shown it in the proper way. Coles had testified that on April 3, 1901, the said mining corporation owned 60,000 shares of the capital stock of the Ribbon Gold Mining Company, par value, but did not know its value since about one year before April 3, 1901, when defendant asked him, "What was the value of the stock one year prior to April 3, 1901?" And again, "What was the value of this stock prior to April 3, 1901?" Plaintiff interposed the objection to both of these questions, and the court sustained the same. In the first place, it was not material as to what the stock was worth one year before the deed was made, and in the second question there was but a repetition of the first; for any answer the witness could have given would have been as to the value one year prior to April 3, 1901.

There were 24 assignments of error as to the admission of testimony, and, having carefully considered each one, we do not find any reversible error therein. We think the evidence sufficient to uphold every material finding, and that the judgment is amply supported by the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

STERLING v. GREGORY. (L. A. 1,400.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 2, 1906.)

1. SALES—BREACH BY SELLER—ACTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for breach of a contract to buy from plaintiff all the oranges grown in a certain grove, evidence held to warrant a finding that the agreement was in consideration of defendant having the handling of the oranges grown in another grove.

2. CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — ENTIRE AND SEVERABLE CONTRACTS.

The question whether a contract is entire or whether its various stipulations are to be regarded as severable is a question of construction, from the intent of the parties and all the circumstances.

3. SALES—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

Where defendant agreed to buy all the oranges grown by plaintiff in a certain grove, in consideration of defendant's having the handling of the oranges grown in another grove, the contract was entire, and the agreements not severable.

4. CONTRACTS—RESCISSION—PARTIAL FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

Under the express provisions of Civil Code, § 1689, a partial failure of consideration moving from one party authorizes the other to rescind.

5. TRUSTS—ACTION BY TRUSTEE—COSTS—LIABILITY.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1031, where plaintiff, suing as trustee of an express trust, is unsuccessful and there is no showing of mismanagement or bad faith on his part, the costs are to be made chargeable only on the estate.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by A. E. Sterling, as trustee, against A. Gregory. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Otis, Gregg & Surr, for appellant. Frank C. Prescott and Prescott & Morris, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action for damages for breach of contract. The plaintiff was the owner of certain orange groves in San Bernardino county, known as the "Upper Orchard," and alleges an agreement with defendant, by the terms of which the latter agreed to buy all the oranges grown on this orchard at the price of 1¼ cents per pound. After the contract was partly executed, the defendant refused to accept or pay for any more fruit, and the plaintiff, after selling the remaining fruit for less than the contract price, brings this action to recover the difference. The answer denies that the contract was merely for the purchase and sale of the oranges grown on the groves described in the complaint, and alleges that the agreement between the parties was that defendant should handle, pack, ship and sell for the account of plaintiff all the oranges grown on two other orchards belonging to plaintiff, and known as the "Triangle" and "Klondike" groves; that as part of the same contract and in consideration of having the handling of the crops from said groves the defendant agreed to buy all the oranges on the "Upper Orchard" at 1¼ cents per pound. The answer then goes on to allege that before the deliveries from the "Upper Orchard" were complete, the plaintiff broke his contract as to the "Triangle" and "Klondike" groves by selling the fruit grown on those groves to other parties; that thereby there was a partial failure of consideration as to the defendant, and he promptly rescinded the contract and restored to plaintiff everything of value which he had received from him. The findings on these issues were in favor of defendant, and he had judgment for his costs. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment within 60 days, and brings up the evidence by means of a bill of exceptions.

The appellant contends that the findings as to the contract between the parties are unsustained by the evidence. But this contention cannot prevail. While the plaintiff testified that he made no agreement regarding the fruit on the "Triangle" and "Klondike" groves other than he would give the handling of it to the defendant in case he should decide to ship it, two witnesses, in addition to the defendant himself, testified to an unconditional agreement that the defendant was to have the handling of the fruit from these groves at 50 cents per box, and was to buy the fruit from the "Upper Orchard" at 1¼ cents per pound. And the further finding that the purchase and sale of the oranges from the "Upper Orchard" was a part of the contract for the handling of the fruit from the other groves, and was made in consideration of defendant's having the handling of such fruit, also finds sufficient support in the record. There is testimony to the effect that the agreed price of 50 cents per box for handling would have allowed the defendant a profit of 25 cents per box. And the defendant, in stating the conversation between himself and the plaintiff regarding the transaction, gave this version: "I told him * * * that a cent and a quarter was full market value at that time; but inasmuch as I would have the privilege of shipping the two other orchards below the railroad, the Klondike and the Triangle, that would realize me some profit that we would be sure of, as we were not taking the chances of the market on these two orchards, and that I thought I could handle the other orchards, paying him the cent and a quarter with this understanding, * * * Mr. Sterling accepted my proposition." This testimony, if believed by the trial court, as it evidently was, fully justified the finding.

The appellant's main contention is that the contract, assuming it to have been made as found by the court, was not an entire contract; that the stipulation for the sale of fruit from the "Upper Orchard" and the one regarding the handling of other fruit, were distinct and severable, and that, therefore, a breach of one furnished no ground for rescinding the other. It may readily be conceded that if the evidence went no further than to show that, at one and the same time, the parties agreed that the plaintiff should sell to the defendant, at a given price, the oranges from one grove, and that he should deliver to the defendant for handling, the oranges from other groves, for a compensation of 50 cents per box, the agreement for sale and the agreement for handling, would form separate and independent undertakings, and a breach of one would not authorize a rescission of the other. The several things required to be done by plaintiff were to be done at different times, and the money consideration to be paid for them was not entire, but was apportioned to each of the items to be performed. There is ample authority for the proposition that in such case the stipulations are ordinarily regarded as severable and independent. As examples of cases declaring contracts to be severable under such circumstances as those supposed may be cited. Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 250; More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251, 6 Am. Rep. 621; Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 102, 51 Pac. 27; Potsdamer v. Kruse, 57 Minn. 193, 58 N. W. 983; Keeler v. Clifford, 165 Ill. 544, 46 N. E. 248; Holmes v. Gregg, 66 N. H. 621, 28 Atl. 17. But it must be remembered that the question whether a contract is entire or whether its various stipulations are to be regarded as severable is a question of construction. The court seeks to determine the intent of the parties from a consideration of all the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract. The rule is well stated in Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, 14 S. E. 734, 736, as follows: "A contract is entire, and not severable, when by its terms, nature, and purpose it contemplates and intends that each and all of its parts, material provisions and the consideration, are common each to the other and independent. * * * On the other hand, a severable contract is one in its nature and purpose susceptible of division and apportionment, having two or more parts, in respect to matters and things contemplated and embraced by it, not necessarily dependent upon each other, nor is it intended by the parties that they shall be. * * * It is sometimes difficult to determine whether the contract is entire or severable in such cases, and there is great diversity of decisions on the subject, but on the whole, the weight of opinion, and the more reasonable rule would seem to be that where there is a purchase of different articles at different prices at the same time, the contract would be severable as to each article, unless the taking of the whole was rendered essential either by the nature of the subject-matter or by the act of the parties. This rule makes the interpretation of the contract depend on the intention of the parties as manifested by their acts and the circumstances of each particular case." And the cases relied on by appellant, in which this court has declared certain contracts to be severable, all recognize that the intention of the parties governs and that stipulations apparently distinct and separate may, by the agreement of the parties, be made to be mutually dependent and to form parts of an entire contract. Thus, in Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 227, Field, C. J., said: "But a contract, made at the same time, of different articles, at different prices, is not an entire contract, unless the taking of the whole is essential from the character of the property, or is made so by the agreement of the parties, etc." More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251, 6 Am. Rep. 621, declares that where the price is, by the contract, apportioned to each item to be performed, "the contract will generally be held to be severable." And in Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 99, 51 Pac. 27, the court, in speaking of a similar contract, said: "Such a contract of sale the law regards in general as severable, and we discover no evidence here to take the case out of the rule, nothing to show that the sale of one item was contingent upon the sale of the others, or that the contract was for other reasons an entirety." (In all the foregoing quotations the italics are ours.)

The case at bar differs in its facts from all those cited in that the answer alleged and the court found that the two undertakings of the plaintiff as to the different groves were, in fact, by the agreement of the parties, made parts of one contract, and the agreement to buy the oranges from one grove was in consideration of defendant's having the handling of the oranges from the other groves. This was in effect an allegation and finding that the contract was entire and not severable. Such finding being, as we have seen, sustained by the evidence, it follows that on the refusal by the plaintiff to fully perform his part of the contract, there was a partial failure of consideration, which under section 1689 of the Civil Code, gave the defendant the right to rescind. Richter v. Union Land & Stock Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 Pac. 39. By the judgment, the defendant recovered costs against the plaintiff. Since, under the admitted allegations of the complaint, the plaintiff sued as trustee of an express trust, and there was no charge of mismanagement or bad faith on his part, the costs should, under the provisions of section 1031, Code Civ. Proc., have been "made chargeable only upon the estate, fund, or party represented."

The judgment will therefore be modified by inserting therein a provision that the costs recovered by the defendant shall be chargeable only against the trust property described in the complaint, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1906.)

APPEAL — FILING OF TRANSCRIPT — TIME—GRANTING NEW TRIAL—CONDITIONAL ORDER.

A motion for a new trial in an action to quiet title was denied upon condition that plaintiff consent to an amendment of the findings and judgment, and the order denying the motion stated that defendant's counsel should prepare an order specifying in detail the amendment to be made, and it was provided that, if plaintiff did not consent within 10 days, a new trial should be granted. Some four months later an order was made reciting the pendency of the motion for a new trial, specifying the amendment to be made and stating that if plaintiff failed to consent to the amendment within 10 days a new trial would be granted. Plaintiff at no time consented to the amendment. Held, that 10 days within which plaintiff might consent to the amendment and avoid the new trial did not begin to run until after the making of the second order, so that it was not until after the expiration of 10 days from that time that the 40 days allowed for the filing of a transcript on appeal began to run.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thomas J. Lennon, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth A. Shepard against F. A. Robbins Press Works, in which A. D. Shepard, as administrator, was substituted as plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

A. J. Treat, for appellant. Thomas, Gerstle & Frick, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is a motion by plaintiff to dismiss an appeal from the judgment, on the ground that appellant has not filed in this court a transcript on appeal within the time allowed by law. It is conceded that the 40 days, within which such transcript must be filed, did not begin to run until the motion for a new trial made by defendant was decided by the lower court (rule 2 of this court [78 Pac. vii]), and the question here is as to when that motion was decided, within the meaning of our rule. The notice of motion to dismiss was served on November 24, 1905, and filed November 25, 1905, at which times no transcript on appeal had been served or filed. The action was one to quiet title to certain land. On June 22, 1905, in the matter of defendant's motion for a new trial, which had previously been argued and submitted on a bill of exceptions, the trial court made the following order, viz.: "It is ordered that defendant's motion for new trial be denied, but upon the condition, however, that plaintiff consent that the findings, judgment, and decree heretofore herein made, be amended and modified so as to make the southerly side of the disputed fence the northerly boundary of the Shepard property. If consent be not given by plaintiff within 10 days then it is ordered that a new trial be granted. Defendant's counsel will prepare and present to the court an order to this effect specifying in detail the amendment to be made." No order specifying in detail the amendment to be made was presented to the court until November 1, 1905, on which last-named day the trial court made the following order, viz.: "This cause having been tried and findings filed and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant having filed its bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial, and the same having been allowed and certified, and the motion for a new trial having been argued and submitted; and it appearing to the court that the case was tried upon the theory that the plaintiff claimed that the south line of the fence referred to in her complaint was the dividing line between the respective properties of the parties in said action; and it further appearing that the plaintiff by her findings and by her judgment has erroneously been given a boundary on the north line of her property three-fourths of an inch to the north of the north side of the fence between the north line of plaintiff's property and the south line of defendant's property; and it further appearing to the court that the true northerly line of plaintiff's property is a straight line along the southerly line of the said fence, as said line is prolonged from east to west, and that the court inadvertently signed findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff establishing the northern boundary line of her property in a straight line from east to west five and three-fourths (5¾) inches north of the southerly line of said fence; and it further appearing to the court that the said southerly side of said fence was at the time of the erection of the barn herein referred to situated six (6) inches north of the outside face of the corner post of the barn located in the northwest corner of plaintiff's property, to wit, four and one-quarter (4¼) inches from the outer face of the corner board of said barn: Now therefore, it is ordered, that if plaintiff within 10 days after the service of a copy of this notice upon her attorneys signs and files a relinquishment to defendant of all land north of a point beginning four and one-quarter (4¼) inches from the north or outer face of the corner board of the barn on the northwest corner of the property of the plaintiff, said last-named point being originally the southerly side of the fence between the property of the parties, and running thence in a straight line from west to east along the southerly line of said fence, as the same existed during the trial of said cause, the motion for a new trial upon the part of the defendant shall be denied. Further ordered that if within said 10 days plaintiff shall fail to sign the relinquishment herein referred to and directed, then the motion of the defendant for a new trial will be granted upon all the grounds of said motion." This order was served on the attorney for plaintiff on November 13, 1905, and plaintiff having failed to file the required relinquishment, the trial court on December 8, 1905, made an unconditional order purporting to grant defendant's motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff's claim is that the order of June 22, 1905, became, by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to consent to the required modification, an order granting a new trial absolutely, at the expiration of 10 days from the making of such order. See Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 Pac. 11, and cases therein cited. If this claim be well founded, it is apparent that the time for filing the transcript expired long before the giving of the notice of motion to dismiss. We are of the opinion, however, that under the terms of the order in question, the time for plaintiff to comply with the expressed condition upon which a new trial would be denied, could not commence to run until the subsequent order, to be prepared by defendant, should be made by the court, specifying in detail the particular modification to which the plaintiff should consent. It is plain from the meager record before us that there was some doubt as to where the line designated in the order as "the southerly side of the disputed fence" was, such fence not being at all points still in existence, and the order made clearly shows the intent of the court that a subsequent order, specifically showing the modification desired, should be made, that plaintiff should have 10 days thereafter within which to consent thereto, and that if within such 10 days she consented to the modification specified in such subsequent order, the motion for new trial should be denied. Under the terms of the order of June 22, 1905, the 10 days within which plaintiff might comply with the specified condition could not commence to run until November 1, 1905, the date of the making of the second order. Her failure to comply with the condition could not be effectual to render the order one granting a new trial earlier than at the expiration of said 10 days. Until that time, therefore, there was certainly no decision of the motion for new trial, within the meaning of our rule. It is apparent, therefore, that the time for filing the transcript on the appeal from the judgment had not expired at the time of the service and filing of the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal. It is not necessary for the purposes of this motion to decide whether the failure of plaintiff to file her consent to the required modification rendered the order one granting a new trial at the expiration of 10 days from November 1, 1905, and we do not decide that question. It is enough here that there was no decision of the motion prior to such last-mentioned time.

The motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is denied.

(Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1906.)

1. WILLS—ESTATES CREATED—FEE SIMPLE.

Civ. Code, § 1336, provides that words in a will referring to death or survivorship relate to the time of testator's death, unless possession is actually postponed, when they must be referred to the time of possession. A will provided that one of testatrix's children, "if" she remained unmarried should have all that belonged to testatrix, and, if she married, the house that she bought should belong to her, and that "the rest" should be divided among the children. Held, that there was a gift to the child in fee in case of her nonmarriage at testatrix's death, and not an estate limited in its creation to the period during which she might remain unmarried, with a remainder to the other children to take effect on her death, or, if she should marry, on her marriage.

2. WILLS — CONDITIONS — VALIDITY — RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE.

Under Civ. Code, § 710, providing that conditions imposing restraints on marriage, except on the marriage of a minor are void, a condition subsequent in a devise to a daughter, terminating the devisee's estate in fee on her marriage at any time is void.

Department 1. Appeal from the Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Judicial proceedings on the estate of Emilie Alexander, deceased. From a decree of final distribution, George Alexander and others appeal. Affirmed.

Frederick E. Whitney, for appellants. E. M. Rosenthal, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Appeal from decree of final distribution. Emilie Alexander died on June 5, 1904, leaving a will which was admitted to probate in the superior court of Alameda county on July 7, 1904. The testatrix was a widow, and was survived by three sons, George, Henry and Caesar Alexander, and two daughters, Mrs. Ray Rosenthal and Gussie Alexander, all over the age of 21 years. The estate having been duly administered, distribution was prayed for, and after proper proceedings for that purpose a decree was made, distributing the entire estate to Gussie Alexander, one of the daughters, absolutely. From this decree the other children of the testatrix appeal.

The controversy hinges on the construction of the decedent's will, which was olographic and written in the German language. A translation reads as follows:

"Oakland, the 28th March, 1903.

"This is my last wish while I still have good health and full understanding, that if Gussie Alexander remains unmarried, that all that I have as well as real estate belongs to her, should she marry, then the house belongs to her for which she has the contract that she bought it, hers. The rest my other children shall divide among themselves; Henry Alexander, George Alexander, Caesar Alexander, and Ray Rosenthal. This is my last wish. [Signed] Mrs. Emilie Alexander.

"The testament which Mr. Rosenthal has can be torn up, it is against my wish."

The phrase "the house belongs to her for which she has the contract that she bought it, hers," refers to a dwelling house which had been conveyed by the testatrix to Gussie prior to the making of the will, and this property formed no portion of the estate. At the date of the will Gussie Alexander was the only unmarried daughter of the testatrix, and she never has married. The sons were all engaged in business. From these facts we must determine what interest or estate is given to Gussie Alexander under the will, and what to the other children of the testatrix. The essential words of the will are, "if Gussie Alexander remains unmarried, that all that I have * * * belongs to her, should she marry * * * my other children shall divide [it] among themselves." The contention of the appellants is that these words give to Gussie an estate limited in its creation to the period during which she may remain unmarried, with a remainder over to the other children, to take effect on her death, or, if she should marry, on her marriage. The respondent, on the other hand, claims that the gift to Gussie is a fee, which is to vest on condition that she is unmarried, and that the period at which the contingency of marriage or nonmarriage is to be determined is the death of the testatrix. We see nothing in the language of the will to indicate that, in any view, Gussie is given a life estate. There are no words in the instrument referring to her life or death. The only event affecting her title, whether by way of condition precedent or subsequent, or of limitation, is her marriage. She takes, therefore, either an estate limited in duration to the period during which she remains unmarried, or a fee conditional upon her being unmarried at some time. (Whether such fee, once vested, is to be cut off by a subsequent marriage, is considered in another part of this opinion.)

A devise or bequest for the time during which the grantee remains unmarried is a not unusual form of gift. In such case the vesting of the estate does not depend on a condition precedent, nor is it divested by a condition subsequent. The provision regarding marriage is a limitation, not a condition. 2 Woerner's Am. Law of Adm. (2d Ed.) 962. On marriage, the estate ceases by the expiration of the term for which, at the outset, it was created. But the words of this will are not the words ordinarily used for the creation of such limited estate. This is not a gift to Gussie "while she remains unmarried," or "so long as she remains unmarried" or "until she marries." On the contrary, the estate is given to her "if she remains unmarried." The word "if," in legal as in ordinary phraseology, imports a condition, and there is no reason to give it another construction here. This then is a gift to Gussie on condition that she remains unmarried. Unmarried when? Certainly the gift cannot be on condition that she remains unmarried at all times, since in that view, she could never take anything as long as she lived. If she married, the condition would be broken; if not, it would not have been fully complied with. The only reasonable construction to give these words is to hold that they refer to the state of affairs that may exist at the death of the testatrix. And this accords with the general intent of the testatrix, deducible from the whole will, and the circumstances under which it was executed. Her sons were, by reason of their occupations, self-supporting, and the one daughter, being married, was provided for. Obviously the testatrix wished upon her death to make special provision for her other daughter, if that daughter should be left without the protection of a husband.

The words "if she remains unmarried" may be construed to refer to the date of the testatrix's death without violating any settled rules of construction. While, with reference to its effect a will speaks from the death of the testatrix, it will, where the testator speaks of a condition of things as actually existing, be held as referring to the date of the will. 2 Woerner's Am. Law of Adm. (2d Ed.) 887, 888; 1 Redf. on Wills (4th Ed.) 880. This will, by necessary implication, speaks of Gussie as an unmarried woman. Such reference to her is to be taken as speaking of her condition at the date of the execution of the will. And the condition of her remaining unmarried is given full operation by referring the time of its performance to the death of the testatrix. There are many cases of similar construction. A devise to A., with a limitation over in case of his death, vests an absolute estate in A., unless he dies during the testator's lifetime. Wills v. Wills, 85 Ky. 486, 3 S. W. 900; Herbert v. Executor of Tuthill, 1 N. J. Eq. 141; Jones v. Webb, 5 Del. Ch. 132; Biddle's Estate, 28 Pa. 59; Phelps v. Phelps, 55 Conn. 359, 11 Atl. 596; Wright v. Charley, 129 Ind. 257, 28 N. E. 706; Kohtz v. Eldred, 208 Ill. 60, 69 N. E. 900; 2 Jarm. Wills (6th Ed.) 661. Similarly, a gift to various persons "or the survivors of them" refers to those surviving at the death of the testator. 2 Jarm. Wills, supra; Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512; Matter of Mahan, 98 N. Y. 372. The Civil Code of this state provides (section 1336) that "words in a will referring to death or survivorship, simply, relate to the time of the testator's death, unless possession is actually postponed, when they must be referred to the time of possession," but the above authorities, as well as many more that might be cited, show that the same rule exists universally, irrespective of any statute.

A case very similar to the one at bar was Denfield, Petitioner, 156 Mass. 265, 30 N. E. 1018. There the will, after devising certain property to the testator's daughter, went on to say: "The above provision for my daughter is made on condition she remain single." The court said that the condition "seems to be satisfied by holding that it is to continue until the time comes for distribution of the residue. It means on condition she remain single at that time. Otherwise it could never be determined in her lifetime whether she was to take the gift absolutely or not." In principle, the case seems directly in point, notwithstanding the fact that there were special circumstances (not existing here), which led the court to hold that the time when the condition was to be fulfilled was the date of distribution, rather than the death of the testator. If Gussie takes by reason of her having remained unmarried until the death of her mother, it is unnecessary to consider at length the effect of the gift to the other children, if she should marry. For the same reasons governing the construction of the gift to her, it may well be argued that the event of her marriage, which is to vest the estate in her brothers and sisters, must occur before the death of the testatrix. Bu if it be said that the intent was that this language should constitute a condition subsequent, terminating her estate in fee, and vesting it in others on her marriage at any time, the condition would be void as in restraint of marriage. Any distinction that may have existed at common law between such conditions as applied to real and to personal estate (30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] 802) has been abolished in this state by section 710 of the Civil Code, under which conditions imposing restrains upon marriage (with two exceptions not here involved), are void. Under any view, the distribution to the respondent was proper.

The decree is affirmed.

In re WALKER. (S. F. 4,470)

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1906.)

1. WILLS—ESTATE IN TRUST—CREATION OF TESTAMENTARY TRUST TO SELL LAND.

Civ. Code, § 2289, provides that on the death of a trustee the superior court of the county where the property is situated must appoint another trustee and direct the execution of the trust. A will provided that a certain lot should be sold, and that the executor, who was appointed as trustee for such purpose, should invest the proceeds and pay the income to certain beneficiaries until their majority, when the investment should be delivered to them. The executor sold the lot, and after his death the purchaser petitioned for the appointment of a trustee to carry out the trust. Held, that the petition was erroneously granted, as the trust was merely for the investment of proceeds and the payment of income to the beneficiaries, and not for a sale of land.

2. EXECUTORS—EXECUTOR'S SALE—CONFIRMATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1561, provides that where an executor has power, under a will, to sell property, he must make return of sale, and that no title passes until the sale be confirmed, and section 1575, provides for compelling the executor to make a return. Held, that where an executor had authority to sell land for the benefit of certain persons and, purporting to act under the power, he did so, but failed to make any return so that there was no confirmation, the beneficiaries having so ratified the sale as to estop them from disputing it, the court having jurisdiction of the probate proceedings might, because of the estoppel, confirm his sale and direct execution of the conveyance upon a compliance with the terms of the contract by the purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Petition by Mrs. Annie L. Gallagher for the appointment of a trustee in place of a deceased trustee to carry out a trust created by the will of Jane Walker, deceased, and from an order granting the petition, Sadie Mayhew and another, beneficiaries of the trust appeal. Reversed.

R. H. Cross, for appellants. R. Clark and Sargent & Bardin, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Monterey county, made under the provisions of section 2289 of the Civil Code, appointing a trustee in place of a deceased trustee, "to fulfill and complete the purposes of the trust and to complete the contract set out in the petition of the petitioner." The trust in question was claimed to have been created by the last will of John Walker, the provisions of said will which are material being as follows, viz: Third. "I desire that my lot commonly known as Lot No. 3 in Block 41 of the Second Addition to Pacific Grove, Monterey Co. state of California be sold as soon as an advantageous price can be obtained for the same and that William F. Gibson, whom I hereby appoint as trustee for that purpose shall invest the proceeds in some income producing property or first mortgage security and pay the proceeds to my grandnieces Sadie and Nannie Mayhew, one-half thereof to each. I desire that such income shall be paid to Sadie and Nannie Mayhew directly, so that they can use the same themselves; and a receipt from them to my said trustee shall be sufficient to relieve him from any further responsibility therefor. When my said grandnieces shall attain their majority, then I direct my trustee to pay over said trust fund or deliver the investment to said grandnieces. If either shall die previous to attaining her majority, the survivor shall take her sister's portion." Seventh. "I give my executor hereinafter named full power to sell any and all of my estate real and personal as he may deem expedient at either public or private sale and without first obtaining an order of court therefore. * * *" Eighth. "I hereby appoint William F. Gibson of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, as executor of this my last will and request that he be allowed to qualify and to act as such without giving bonds to any court."

This will was dated January 10, 1895, and deceased died in the year 1897, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. Such will was admitted to probate in the superior court of such city and county, and the proceedings for the administration of the estate are still pending therein, no distribution as yet having been had. Wm. F. Gibson was appointed and qualified as executor of the will and continued to act as such until his death in 1901. On February 4, 1899, he, purporting to act as executor and trustee, agreed in writing to sell to respondent, Mrs. Annie L. Gallagher, the lot of land described above for $800, $80 to be paid as a deposit, and $720 within three years, with interest, Mrs. Gallagher to pay all taxes on the land, and agreed that a deed should be executed on full payment of the purchase price. Something over $600 had been paid by Mrs. Gallagher to Gibson under this agreement, prior to his death, and after his death $30 was paid by her to the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of John Walker. At the time of the making of this agreement, Nannie Mayhew, one of the beneficiaries, had attained her majority, and the only other beneficiary, Sadie Mayhew, attained her majority June 7, 1899. The evidence showed that after the attainment of their majority, the beneficiaries received from Gibson small amounts aggregating $185, proceeds of said agreement, and after his death, other portions of said proceeds from the administrator with the will annexed, all of which they still retain. No return of the sale made by Gibson was ever made to the superior court having jurisdiction of the estate. The order appealed from was made by the superior court of Monterey county on May 1, 1905, being based on an application therefor made by respondent May 31, 1904. The beneficiaries of the trust, Sadie Mayhew and Nannie Mayhew, appeal from such order.

It is apparent that the sole object of this proceeding is to enable Mrs. Gallagher to complete her contract for the purchase of this land and obtain title thereto. It is, of course, essential to the right of a court to appoint a trustee under the provisions of section 2289, Civil Code, to fill a vacancy, that there should be an existing trust to be executed. It is claimed by respondent that a valid trust for the sale of this lot and the investment of the proceeds of such sale was created by the will of Mrs. Walker and that this trust for the sale had not been fully executed. We are of the opinion that under a proper construction of the provisions of the will, the sole purposes for which Gibson was appointed trustee were to invest, for the benefit of Sadie and Nannie Mayhew, the proceeds of the sale which the testatrix, in effect, directed to be made, and to pay the come of such investment to such beneficiaries during their minority, at the expiration of which they were to receive the principal in equal shares, and that the provision as to sale was simply a direction to her executor to sell as soon as an advantageous price could be obtained. It is true, as urged by respondent, that no particular form of expression is necessary to constitute a valid trust, but it is essential that the intention of the testator to so do should be apparent, and so far as the sale of the land by a trustee is concerned, we can see no evidence of such intent in the will before us. It will be observed that there is no direct devise of the land to Gibson, and that the provision as to the appointment of Gibson as trustee apparently has reference solely to the matter of investment of the proceeds, and payments of the same to Sadie and Nannie Mayhew. The duties imposed upon him as trustee in regard thereto were not such as to render it imperative that the legal title to the land should vest in him, and there is nothing from which the intent to create a trust for the sale of the land can be inferred. The fifth paragraph of the will contains a substantially similar provision as to the desire of the testatrix for the sale of certain shares of stock and the immediate payment of the proceeds of such sale to certain persons without any bequest in terms. In both of these cases, the direction for the sale is solely to the executor, who elsewhere is empowered to sell at either public or private sale and without any order of court, and the duties of the appointed trustee commence only upon the receipt of proceeds of the sale of the land, relate only to the disposition of such proceeds, and continue only to the time when both beneficiaries attain the age of majority. It would therefore seem apparent that no case was made authorizing action by the superior court of Monterey county under section 2289 of the Civil Code.

Respondent earnestly contends that the appellants are estopped from disputing the validity of the agreement of sale made by Gibson, by reason of the fact that, after attaining majority, they, apparently acquiescing therein, received and retained and still retain the proceeds of such agreement. This may be true, but, in our opinion, that question is not one to be determined in this proceeding. We are not here concerned with any question as to the validity against them of the agreement made by Gibson, or as to the acts of the parties thereunder, but solely with the question as to whether there is an existing trust, for the proper administration of which it is necessary that a trustee should be appointed. If the acts and conduct of Sadie and Nannie Mayhew, the sole parties entitled under the will to receive the proceeds of the sale of said land, or the land itself in the event that no sale is made, have been such as to estop them from asserting the invalidity of the agreement for sale, appellants may doubtless have that fact adjudged in a proper proceeding, and obtain such relief against such beneficiaries as is appropriate. This proceeding was necessarily based entirely upon the theory that there was a trust for the sale of the land, created by the will, and the petition contained no allegation of any fact tending to create an estoppel as to the beneficiaries.

It may properly be suggested that under the circumstances mentioned by respondent we can see no reason why the respondent cannot have adequate remedy in the court having jurisdiction of the probate proceedings. The executor had the power under the will to sell this property for the sole benefit of Sadie and Nannie Mayhew, and, purporting to act thereunder, he made this sale to respondent. By reason of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1561) the sale was ineffectual without confirmation by the superior court having jurisdiction of the estate, and it was the duty of the executor to make a return of such sale. This, so far, has not been done, but there is no reason why such a return should not still be made, and the court having jurisdiction of the estate has the power to require it to be made. Code Civ. Proc. § 1575. If the only persons interested in the proceeds of any sale of this property have so ratified the contract made by the executor as to estop them from disputing it, we can see no reason why the court could not, upon that ground alone, confirm the sale, and direct the execution of a conveyance upon a compliance by the purchaser with the terms of the contract. Certainly, under such circumstances, their objections would not be effectual to prevent a confirmation.

The order appealed from is reversed.

In re SHEPPARD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 4,419)

SHEPPARD v. KENDALL et al.

(Supreme Court of California. April 13, 1906.)

1. Wills—Probate—Petition for Revocation—Sufficiency.

A petition for revocation of the probate of a will, merely alleging in general terms that a certain person exercised undue influence over testator, but stating no facts from which a legal conclusion of undue influence could be drawn, stated no cause of action.

2. Same—Amendment—Delay.

Where a petition for the revocation of the probate of a will was filed 10 months after the will was admitted to probate, leave to amend the petition five months after it was filed was properly denied, in the discretion of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Application by A. B. Kendall and others for probate of the will of Joseph Sheppard, deceased. The will was admitted to probate, and thereafter Lafayette Sheppard petitioned for revocation of the probate. From an order granting a motion to dismiss the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

William A. Coulter and McNab & Hirsch, for appellant. T. L. Carothers, L. G. Morse, John A. Percy, and John W. Preston, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. On February 1, 1904, the probate court made an order admitting a certain written instrument to probate as the last will of Joseph Sheppard, deceased. Afterwards, on December 5, 1904—within the year allowed by section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, for contesting a will which had been probated—Lafayette Sheppard, claiming to be son and heir at law of said deceased, filed a petition for the revocation of the said probate of said will. The executors and other interested parties answered the petition; and the matter coming on regularly to be heard by the court on May 23, 1905, the defendants moved the court for judgment on the pleadings that the proceeding for the revocation of the probate be dismissed; and after due hearing the court made an order granting the motion and dismissing the petition. From this order this present appeal is taken by said Lafayette.

The order appealed from was granted upon the ground that the said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or any ground for the revocation of the said probate of the will. The only averments in the petition of grounds for the revocation are as follows: "Your petitioner alleges that the making, signing and publishing of said paper purporting to be the last will and testament and codicil thereto of the said Joseph Sheppard, deceased, was procured through the undue influence, prejudice, and imposition from and by Isabel Sheppard, the stepmother of petitioner, and from and by Mrs. E. C. Reed, one of the many relatives of the said stepmother who were not related to decedent, but who are beneficiaries and legatees under said alleged last will. "That the said Mrs. E. C. Reed, on the death of petitioner's said stepmother, continued and repeated the said undue influences, prejudices and impositions, and made use of her confidential relations with the said Joseph Sheppard, as his constant companion and professional nurse, during a long period to and at the time of making said alleged will, when the mind of said Joseph Sheppard was weak and enfeebled from the infirmities of age and disease, to repeat and continue to prejudice and unduly influence the said Joseph Sheppard against your petitioner, and to unduly and unjustly influence the said decedent in making and executing the said alleged will, and by such prejudice and undue influence did procure the making of said alleged will and codicil." In our opinion the trial court did not err in holding these averments insufficient. Of course, there is no hint in the petition of any legal ground for revocation other than that of "undue influence"; but undue influence is averred only in general terms as a conclusion of law, and that kind of averment is fatally defective. Undue influence is a legal conclusion to be drawn from certain facts, and the facts must be pleaded. In Estate of Gharkey, 57 Cal. 279, the court say: "When the grounds of contest embrace duress, menace, fraud, undue influence, * * * such matters, not being ultimate facts, but conclusions of law to be drawn from facts, must be pleaded, not in the language of the statute, but the facts (not evidence of the facts) relied on must be stated, and issues relating thereto submitted to the jury, to the end that the court, either upon demurrer to the statement of the grounds of contest, or upon the verdict, may determine whether, as matter of law, such facts so pleaded or found constitute a valid reason why the proposed paper should not be admitted to probate." In the case at bar the averments in the petition, waiving the objection that they are nearly all merely recitals and not positive allegations, amount to nothing more than a general statement that undue influence was exercised over the testator; there are no averments of facts which compelled him to do that which was not his will to do, and procured an instrument which did not express his free intention.

At the time the order appealed from was made the appellant did not ask to amend, but previously to that time, on April 3, 1905, which was more than one year after the order admitting the will to probate, appellant made a motion to be allowed to file certain offered amendments, which was denied on May 9, 1904; and appellants contend that the refusal to allow these amendments was error, which can be considered on this appeal. The contention is not maintainable. The allowance of amendments to pleadings is mostly within the descretion of the trial court, and when the amendments to a petition for the revocation of a will are not offered until after the expiration of a year from the probate, their denial would not be reversed unless the circumstances showed very extreme abuse of discretion, which does not here appear. Moreover, the offered amendments, if allowed, would not have supplied the defects of the original petition.

It is contended that the court erred in denying appellants' motion for a continuance of the trial; but that matter is immaterial if, as we hold, the court was right in rendering judgment on the pleadings.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

STATE v. MILLER. (S. F. 4,367.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1906.)

1. ESCHEAT — ENFORCEMENT—INFORMATION — ABSENCE OF HEIRS—SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATION.

Civ. Code, § 1386, provides that if a decedent leaves no heirs to take his estate, the same escheats to the state. Section 1404 provides that the title of nonresident alien heirs is forfeited unless they appear to claim the property within five years from the death of deceased. Code Civ. Proc. § 1269, regulates proceedings by the Attorney General for the forfeiture of escheated estates, and provides that the information must set forth the facts in consequence of which the estate is claimed to have escheated with an allegation that by reason thereof the state has right to the estate. Held, that in this information an allegation that there are no heirs to take the estate is sufficient as against resident heirs, while an allegation that five years have elapsed within which no nonresident alien heirs have appeared to claim the estate is sufficient as to that class of heirs.

2. SAME—TIME FOR PROCEEDINGS.

Inasmuch as the rights of possible nonresident alien heirs cannot be barred within less than five years after the death, an escheat proceeding commenced within less than five years is premature.

3. SAME — ABSENCE OF HEIRS — EVIDENCE — PRIMA FACIE CASE.

Under the further provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1271, declaring that all persons named in the information or any other person claiming interest in the estate may appear and answer, and that, if no such person does appear, judgment must be rendered that the state is the owner of the property, it is not necessary in an escheat proceeding to offer any evidence in support of the allegation that there are no heirs, but the failure of claimants to appear is sufficient to support a judgment of forfeiture.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Albert G. Burnett, Judge.

Proceeding by the state of California against G. F. Miller, as administrator of the estate of Henry Hemker, deceased, to escheat the property of decedent to the state. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., George A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen., and H. W. A. Weske, for the State. L. W. Juillard, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Henry Hemker died in this state, intestate, on May 9, 1903. His estate was duly administered by the defendant, and on February 27, 1905, upon settlement of the final account therein, it was adjudged that the defendant had in his hands belonging to said estate, for distribution, the sum of $2,053.55 in money. No person having ever claimed as heir, or otherwise, any part of the estate, the Attorney General on May 15, 1905, began this proceeding by information, under section 1269, Code of Civil Procedure, to obtain a judgment of the court declaring said property escheated and the title thereto vested in the state of California. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that the deceased left "no surviving wife or kindred of any kind or degree," and that "there are no heirs to take said estate." In People v. Roach, 76 Cal. 296, 18 Pac. 407, in a proceeding of this kind begun within 12 months after the death of the deceased, there was a similar allegation that the deceased left no wife or heirs to take the estate. It was held that this was an allegation of fact which was "impossible in law, and which cannot be admitted by demurrer," citing Louisville, etc., Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 255, 3 Sup. Ct. 193, 27 L. Ed. 922, in which case it was declared that an alleged fact, impossible in law, is not admitted by a demurrer. In People v. Roach, supra, and in State v. Smith, 70 Cal. 156, 12 Pac. 121, it was further decided that our statutes on the subject of escheats, when considered together, do not contemplate that a proceeding of this kind should be commenced before the expiration of five years after the death of the deceased, and that it is premature if begun sooner, although it may have been commenced after the settlement of the administration. The reason given for this ruling is that there may be nonresident alien heirs, in whom the title would vest, subject to forfeiture or escheat upon failure to appear and claim within the five years, and that, in that event, until that time has elapsed, the state can have no title or right to a judgment declaring an escheat. In State v. Smith there were nonresident alien heirs who were known to exist. In People v. Roach this did not affirmatively appear, but the existence of such heirs was assumed as a possibility necessary to be considered in the disposition of the case. In both of those cases it is clear from the opinions that the court had in mind the existence of nonresident alien heirs, only, and was discussing the rule which should be applied with reference to them alone. Under our law of succession the title to the estate of a person dying intestate vests in the heirs, whether known or unknown, immediately upon his death. Civ. Code, § 1384; Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 586, 26 Pac. 521, 12 L. R. A. 46, 22 Am. St. Rep. 336; Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 164, 34 Pac. 667; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 183, 38 Pac. 715; Murphy v. Clayton, 114 Cal. 528, 43 Pac. 613, 46 Pac. 460; Estate of Packer, 125 Cal. 397, 58 Pac. 59, 73 Am. St. Rep. 58. In the case of nonresident alien heirs this title becomes barred, or forfeited, under the provisions of sections 672 and 1404 of the Civil Code, at the end of five years from the death of the deceased, unless within that time such heir appears and claims the property. Estate of Pendergast, 143 Cal. 140, 76 Pac. 962. And this occurs without any judicial proceeding, and even if the heirs be well known. In such cases the purpose of a proceeding under sections 1269–1272, Code of Civil Procedure, is merely to establish the disputable facts, that the heirs are nonresident aliens and that they have not claimed. From these facts spring the forfeiture, and the investiture of title in the state. As to such nonresident alien heirs, therefore, it follows that the proceeding could not be maintained until after the lapse of the five years necessary to produce the forfeiture. As applied to the fact considered by the court in those cases, the fact that the heirs were nonresident aliens, it was proper enough to hold that the cases were prematurely begun. The resident heirs, however, are not barred ipso facto by any statutory forfeiture. They can be barred only by a judgment in a proceeding by information such as is here sought, and then only after the lapse of 20 years from the judgment. The only sound reason for holding the proceeding premature as to this class of heirs, is that it is necessary to await the five years before proceeding against the nonresident aliens, whose existence is always possible where the heirs are unknown, and as the statute provides for but one proceeding, it must be postponed as to all classes of heirs until it can be maintained against all.

Upon another point, however, we think the case of People v. Roach, supra, requires some modification. The case went off upon the theory, that such heirs as there might have been in that estate were nonresidents and aliens. The existence of such alien heirs being assumed, the only point necessary to be decided in the case was that it was prematurely begun. The effect of an allegation, that there were no heirs was fully considered, but there does not seem to have been any consideration of the question, how that fact could be alleged and proved, where such allegation and proof are required by a statute. If it were legally impossible that it could be true, then, manifestly it could not be legally established at all. An examination of the provisions of the statute leads us to the conclusion that it is not thereby intended that the fact of the nonexistence of heirs shall be established in that proceeding, in the ordinary method, by the production of evidence to that effect. Such a requirement would defeat every such proceeding and render the statute wholly nugatory. Section 1269 provides that the information must set forth "the facts and circumstances in consequence of which the estate is claimed to have escheated, with an allegation that, by reason thereof, the state of California has right by law to such estate." With respect to resident heirs, the estate could not escheat, unless there were no such heirs in existence, or at least unless there were none in existence in contemplation of law, however the actual fact might be. It would be necessary, under this provision, therefore, with respect to such heirs, to make an allegation that there were "no heirs to take the estate," which is the condition necessary under section 1386 of the Civil Code, to cause the property to escheat to the state. We do not see how this can be done except by a direct averment to that effect, nor how it can be held that this is not a sufficient allegation of the fact to serve as a support for the proceeding. As to nonresident aliens, it would be sufficient to aver that none has appeared and claimed and that the five years had elapsed. The proof is regulated by section 1271. It provides that any person named in the information, or any person claiming an interest, though not named, may appear and contest the title of the state, but that "if no person appears and answers within the time, then judgment must be rendered, that the state be seised" of the property claimed in the information. From this it is clear that there need be no further proof. The failure of any claimant to appear, after the 40 days' publication required, is by this statute made sufficient proof, provisionally and for the purpose of authorizing a judgment of the fact that there are no heirs, "to take the estate," and of the right of the state to such judgment. It is true that it also provides that if any claimant appears, and takes issue upon the information, there must be a trial of the issue, as in civil actions, and that if, upon such trial, "it appears from the facts found or admitted that the state has good title" to the property or any part thereof, "judgment must be rendered that the state be seised thereof, and recover costs of suit against the defendant." It is silent with regard to the effect of a finding that the person so appearing is entitled to a part of the estate, but obviously in that event there should be a judgment in his favor for such share. This provision for a trial, however, must be taken to refer solely to the issue between the claimant and the state concerning the share claimed by such person, and not to the right of the state against persons not appearing. The meaning and effect of the statute is that if, on the trial of such issue, the proof shows that the claimant is not an heir, or entitled to the estate, or some share thereof, then such claimant must fail, and judgment must thereupon go in favor of the state for the whole of the property described, although there may be no proof of the nonexistence of heirs, other than the constructive proof afforded by the fact that no heir or person entitled has appeared." The state is not required to prove the impossible in any other manner, or to any greater extent, than this.

The reasonableness of this construction is shown by the provisions of section 1272, that at any time within 20 years after judgment of escheat, any person not a party or privy to the proceeding, may appear and prove his heirship, or right to the property, and thereupon shall receive the property, or its proceeds if it has been sold in the proceeding. This shows that the real purpose and effect of the proceeding, with regard to unknown heirs, is not to establish by ordinary modes of proof, the nonexistence of heirs, but merely to make a statutory, prima facie, showing of failure of heirs, in order to start the running, as against such nonappearing heirs, of a period of 20 years, after which such heirs will be barred, if not under legal disability, otherwise, within five years after such disability ceases. We are of the opinion that the information shows no present right in the state, because begun within the five years after the death of Hemker, but that the allegations are sufficient to have put all claimants upon their proof, if the proceeding had been instituted after the five years had elapsed.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.

3 Cal. App. 371

PEASE v. FINK.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 4, 1906.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR—EFFECT OF APPEAL—JURISDICTION OF LOWER COURT—AMENDMENT OF PROCEEDINGS.

The superior court has authority to correct a misprision of its clerk in entering an order on a motion for a new trial, and to make the record state the facts, though an appeal has been taken.

2. NEW TRIAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—STATEMENT OF CASE.

The only difference between a bill of exceptions and a statement of a case, within Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring a party intending to move for a new trial to serve a notice of his intention, designating the ground on which the motion will be made, and whether the same will be made on affidavits or by a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case, is that in a statement of the case the moving party, in addition to setting forth in the body of the document the exceptions which were taken at the trial, must also specify the particular ones upon which he relies in support of his motion, and, if the insufficiency of the evidence is the ground of an exception, or is stated in a notice of a motion for a new trial, the particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient must be specified in either document.

3. APPEAL—RECORD—SCOPE.

A notice of intention to move for a new trial stated that it would be made on a bill of exceptions thereafter to be prepared. The document set forth in the transcript was entitled "Statement of the Case." The statement contained all the matters essential to a bill of exceptions, stated in the same manner as would be appropriate therein. Held, that the document must be treated as a part of the record on appeal from the order denying a new trial; the errors relied on being sufficiently indicated.

4. SAME.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 950, require appellant to furnish a copy of a bill of exceptions or a statement in the case, and at the hearing the statement is available for considering the objection that the evidence is insufficient, if the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. A judgment was rendered December 7th. The appeal therefrom was taken January 13th following. Appellant set forth in the transcript a document entitled "Statement of the Case," which set forth all the matters essential to a bill of exceptions. Held, that the document was a part of the record, not only for a review of the errors of law therein specified, but also for determining whether the evidence was sufficient.

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—PROOF OF AGENCY—DECLARATION BY AN AGENT.

Under Civ. Code § 2319, declaring that an agent has authority to make representations not including the terms of his authority, the declaration of a person claiming to be the agent of another is insufficient to establish the agency or the terms of his authority.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, §§ 40, 416–419.]

6. SAME—RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS.

One dealing with another, on his mere statement that he is the agent of a third person, takes on himself the risk of being able to show the existence of the agency, and, if he accepts such statement and is deceived, he has no relief against the third person.

7. SAME—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE.

On the issue whether a third person was the agent of defendant in entering into a contract for the exchange of land, whereby defendant was to convey to plaintiff certain land in consideration of plaintiff conveying land to defendant, evidence that a certificate of title to the land which defendant was to convey was made by a searcher of records and in the form of a report addressed to defendant, which was delivered to the third person, was inadmissible to show that the third person was defendant's agent, in the absence of evidence showing the report was delivered to or sent by defendant.

8. SAME.

The evidence was inadmissible to show that plaintiff was justified in believing that the third person was defendant's agent.

9. SAME.

The possession by a third person of a deed does not show that he is the agent of the grantor for any other purpose than to deliver the deed and to receive the purchase price named therein.

10. SAME—RATIFICATION.

Plaintiff entered into a contract with a third person, representing himself as the agent of defendant for the exchange of land. Subsequently a purchaser was negotiating for the purchase of the property which the contract required defendant to convey to plaintiff. At that time, plaintiff held a deed on the premises, and it was agreed that the purchaser could receive a satisfactory deed from defendant by the destruction of plaintiff's deed. Plaintiff's deed was destroyed, and defendant made a conveyance to the purchaser. Defendant had no knowledge at the time of any representations of the third person. Held, that defendant did not ratify the acts of the third person.

11. SAME—EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE OF RELATION—ADMISSIBILITY.

On the issue whether a third person was the agent of defendant, in a transaction whereby the third person entered into a contract with reference to certain land belonging to defendant, evidence of transactions between defendant and the third person, in reference to other property, was inadmissible especially where the party dealing with the agent had no knowledge of such transactions.

W. F. Williamson, for appellant. J. S. Reid, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. Action to recover damages for breach of contract. In the complaint herein the plaintiff shows that, in pursuance of an agreement between him and the defendant for an exchange of properties owned by them respectively, they each executed a deed of conveyance to the other; that at the time of such conveyances there was an incumbrance upon his land which had been placed there by himself, amounting to $4,000; that one of the terms of their agreement was that the defendant would assume and pay the said indebtedness and hold the plaintiff harmless therefrom; that the conveyance to the defendant contained a clause by which he assumed such obligation; that the defendant failed and neglected to comply with his said agreement or to discharge said incumbrance; that by reason of such failure the plaintiff was compelled to and did pay the sum of $1,342, and sustained other damage amounting to $570. He therefore asks judgment against the defendant for these amounts of money. The evidence at the trial disclosed the following facts: In December, 1899, the plaintiff was the owner of a parcel of real estate in Oakland, situated at the northwest corner of Fourth and Jackson streets, which was incumbered by a deed of trust executed by the plaintiff to the Union Savings Bank to secure his promissory note for $4,000, and he was desirous of selling the same or exchanging it for some unincumbered real property. Being occupied with his business, he intrusted the matter to his father, Edwin R. Pease. The latter having been informed that the defendant owned some land in Berkeley, and that Philip Munroe was his agent, visited the office of Munroe in San Francisco, and being told by him that he was the agent of Mr. Fink, the defendant herein, and had the handling of the Berkeley property, went with him to Berkeley and examined the same. Upon reporting to the plaintiff the result of his visit and examination, the latter expressed his willingness to exchange the Oakland property for it, and thereupon his father had a further conference with Munroe, at which they agreed upon an exchange of the Oakland property for 10 lots in the Berkeley tract which had been selected by him. Accordingly, on December 28, 1899, the plaintiff signed and acknowledged a deed of conveyance of the Oakland property, but without having the name of any grantee inserted therein, reciting, however, that "this deed is made subject to a mortgage for $4,000 now on said property, together with the accrued interest thereon." He placed this instrument in the hands of his father, and it was by him delivered to Munroe, who at the same time delivered to the father a deed from the defendant to the plaintiff for the aforesaid 10 lots in the Berkeley tract. Neither of these deeds was ever placed upon record. The deed made by the plaintiff was retained by Munroe in his possession until it was produced at the trial herein upon the demand of the plaintiff, and the one delivered to the plaintiff was destroyed about a year later as hereinafter stated. The lots described in the deed from the defendant to the plaintiff are subdivisions of a block of land in Berkeley, and with other subdivisions of the same block, at the time of these negotiations, stood of record in the name of the defendant. Munroe was a dealer in real estate, and some months prior thereto had agreed with the defendant for the purchase of the block from him at any time within a year at the rate of $75 a lot, with the privilege of taking one or more lots at any time whenever he might dispose of them. After the aforesaid exchange of properties had been agreed upon, Munroe requested the defendant to make a deed of the Berkeley lots, leaving the name of the grantee blank, and thereupon the defendant signed and acknowledged a deed therefor without inserting the name of a grantee, and delivered it to Munroe, who delivered it to the plaintiff. The deed itself had been destoyed prior to the trial herein without having been placed of record, and there was a conflict of testimony as to whether it contained the name of any grantee at the time of its delivery to the plaintiff, but under the findings of the court it must be assumed that before its delivery to the plaintiff his name had been written therein as grantee. In November, 1900, a third person was negotiating for the purchase of some Berkeley property, including the lots described in the deed delivered to the plaintiff, and certain others of which the title still stood of record in the name of the defendant, and, for the purpose of consummating the negotiation, the plaintiff and the defendant, together with the purchaser, met at the office of Munroe. It was then agreed between them that, as the deed for the 10 lots then held by the plaintiff had never been recorded, the purchaser could receive a satisfactory deed by the destruction of that deed and a conveyance to him from the defendant of the entire tract. Accordingly, the deed to the plaintiff was destroyed, and the defendant made a conveyance to the purchaser of all of the property, and received from him his check for the entire purchase price of the land embraced in the conveyance, and gave to the plaintiff his own check for $600, the price for which the plaintiff had agreed to sell his 10 lots. In April, 1901, the Union Savings Bank caused the Oakland property to be sold under the power contained in the aforesaid deed of trust, and its proceeds applied upon the obligation held by it against the plaintiff. There being a deficiency of such proceeds, it afterwards commenced an action against the plaintiff for the recovery of such deficiency, and the plaintiff was compelled to pay $1,342 in settlement of this action. Upon the trial the court found in accordance with the allegations in the complaint, except as to the consequential damage therein claimed, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

1. In the transcript which was originally filed herein the order denying a new trial has the following recital: "In this cause defendant's motion for a new trial came on regularly this day to be heard, J. S. Reid, Esq., appearing as attorney for the plaintiff, the defendant's attorney failing to appear. Whereupon it is ordered by the court that said motion for a new trial be and the same is hereby denied." In the brief of respondent, thereafter filed, one of the points made in his behalf was that, as it thus appeared that the defendant had abandoned his motion in the superior court, he could not now be heard to allege error in denying it. The appellant thereupon procured an amendment of this entry to be made by the superior court, so that it now reads: "In this cause defendant's motion for a new trial came on regularly this day to be heard, J. S. Reid appearing as attorney for plaintiff, and A. E. Cooley, Esq., appearing for W. F. Williamson, Esq., as attorney for defendant. Whereupon it is ordered by the court that said motion for a new trial be and the same is hereby denied." And upon application therefor, and suggestion to this court of a diminution of the record, he was allowed to file a certified copy of such minute entry as a part of the record herein. The respondent, however, contends that this amended entry cannot be considered, for the reason that by virtue of the previous appeal the superior court had lost jurisdiction to make any amendment of its original entry. The principle upon which it is held that, after an appeal from its judgment, a superior court is divested of authority to make any change in the judgment, is inapplicable here. The amendment was not sought for the purpose of making a change in the judicial action of the court, nor did it have the effect to change in any respect the order from which the appeal was taken. It was made to correct a misprision of the clerk in entering the order, and to make the record correctly state the circumstances under which it was made. The judicial action of the court—the order denying a new trial—is in identical language in both the original and the amended entry thereof. The authority of a court to correct its records at any time so that they may speak the truth is well settled. Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 43 Pac. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139.

2. It is further urged by the respondent that the appeal from the order denying a new trial cannot be considered for the reason that in the notice of intention therefor the defendant stated that it would be made upon affidavits and a bill of exceptions thereafter to be prepared and settled; whereas, the document set forth in the transcript is entitled, "Engrossed Statement of the Case," and was settled and allowed as such by the judge before whom the cause was tried. The procedure for obtaining a new trial, authorized by section 659 (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure, implies that a bill of exceptions may have been settled before notice of the motion shall have been given, and that in such case the bill shall be used on that motion. If, however, no bill has been settled, the same procedure is prescribed for its settlement as for the settlement of a statement of the case. There is no substantial difference between the two documents when settled; the only difference being that in a statement of the case the moving party, in addition to setting forth in the body of the document the exceptions which were taken at the trial, must also specify the particular ones upon which he relies in support of his motion. If the insufficiency of the evidence is the ground of an exception to the decision, or is stated in the notice of a motion for a new trial, the particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient must be specified in either document. The legal effect of a document is to be determined upon a consideration of the matter which it contains, rather than by the name which is given to it, and the document is not to be disregarded merely upon the ground that it is erroneously entitled, or is without any title. Although the document set forth in the transcript herein is entitled "Statement of the Case," it may also be treated as a bill of exceptions. All of the matters which would be essential to a bill of exceptions are contained therein, and are stated in the same manner as would be appropriate in such bill. The fact that, in addition thereto, the exceptions taken at the trial are grouped together, and specified as errors of law committed by the court, does not impair its force as a bill of exceptions, and may be disregarded. It must be held, therefore, that the document may be considered as a part of the record upon the appeal from the order denying a new trial. The appellant sufficiently indicated the errors of law upon which he relied by so characterizing the exceptions taken by him at the trial which he enumerated. There is no statutory requirement that either document shall specify the purpose for which it is prepared or settled, and the document when settled is therefore available for any purpose authorized by the Code. Section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, on an appeal from a final judgment, appellant shall furnish the court with a copy of any bill of exceptions or statement in the case on which he relies, and at the hearing of such appeal, if it is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, the statement of the case is available for considering the objection that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision. Code Civ. Proc. § 939 (1); Wall v. Mines, 128 Cal. 136, 60 Pac. 682. The judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff was rendered December 7, 1903, and the appeal therefrom was taken January 13, 1904. Whether the document be regarded as a statement of the case or as a bill of exceptions, it forms a part of the record to be considered on the appeal from the judgment, not only for a review of the errors of law therein specified, but also for determining whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the decision.

3. Counsel for the respective parties have presented in their briefs an able and elaborate discussion of several principles of law claimed to be pertinent to a decision of the appeal, but from the conclusion that we have reached upon one of the alleged errors of the superior court it becomes unnecessary, as well as inappropriate, to determine the other propositions. The basis of the plain-tiff's cause of action is the agreement of the defendant to assume the payment of the obligation secured by the deed of trust, and, accordingly, the court has found that the defendant made such agreement, and that the deed from the plaintiff of the Oakland property of December 28, 1899, was made in pursuance of an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. There is, however, no evidence in the record upon which these findings can be sustained. It is very clearly shown therein that the defendant was not present at any interview or negotiation in which the transaction or execution of the deeds was discussed, and that he never knew or heard of any negotiations for an exchange of the properties, or the execution of the deed of the Oakland property, until after the commencement of this action, and that neither the plaintiff nor his father ever met the defendant, or exchanged any verbal or other communication with him until nearly a year after the date of the said deed. The ground upon which the respondent relies in support of the findings is that, in the negotiations between the plaintiff's father and Munroe for the exchange of the properties, Munroe was the agent of the defendant for that purpose, and that the defendant is bound by all of the acts and representations of Munroe as his agent. There is, however, no evidence in the record tending to establish the fact of such agency, or that Munroe had any authority from the defendant, except the testimony of the plaintiff's father that Munroe stated to him that he was such agent; and the rule is of long standing that the declarations of a person claiming to be the agent of another are insufficient to establish such agency or the terms of his authority. Civ. Code, § 2319 (2); S. & L. Soc. v. Gerichten, 64 Cal. 520, 2 Pac. 405; Smith v. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co., 107 Cal. 432, 40 Pac. 540. On the other hand, the defendant testified that Munroe was not his agent, and that he had never employed or authorized him to act as his agent for the sale of any property; that he never had any dealings with any one in connection with the Oakland property or any conversation with any one about its purchase or sale, or the payment of any incumbrance thereon, and had never had in his possession any paper or instrument referring to it, or known anything about the property until the commencement of this suit, and Munroe himself testified that he had never acted as the agent of the defendant, and did not act as his agent in the transaction of December, 1899, and did not at that time state to the plaintiff's father that he was his agent. One who deals with another, upon his mere statement that he is the agent of a third person, takes upon himself the risk of being able to show that such agency existed. McDonald v. Cool, 134 Cal. 502, 66 Pac. 727. If, instead of satisfying himself thereof by independent investigation, he accepts such statement and is deceived, he is the victim of his own credulity. The testimony of these declarations was inadmissible for the purpose of proving such agency, and should have been excluded by the court upon the defendant's objection thereto, and when received should not have been considered.

During the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a certificate of title to the Berkeley lots made by a searcher of records December 23, 1899, in the form of a report addressed to the defendant, which the witness testified had been given to him by Munroe, and at the time of introducing the same his counsel stated that it was for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff was warranted in believing that Munroe was the agent of the defendant. The defendant objected to its introduction, unless the plaintiff should in some way connect the defendant with it. The court overruled the objection and allowed the certificate in evidence, without any evidence that it had been made at the instance of or with the knowledge of the defendant, or that it had been delivered to or seen by him. The evidence so offered not only had no tendency to show that Munroe was the agent of the defendant, or to justify the plaintiff in believing that he was such agent, but the objections of the defendant were well taken, and the court erred in overruling them. The possession by Munroe of the deed from the defendant to the plaintiff of the Berkley lots had no tendency to show that Munroe was the agent of the defendant for any other purpose than to deliver the deed, and, if the purchase price was named therein, to receive the same; nor did it have any tendency to show, or authorize the plaintiff to believe, that his previous negotiations with Munroe had been authorized or approved by the defendant. If no purchase price was named in the deed, the defendant, in the absence of any showing of fraud, or of bona fides on the part of the plaintiff, might be estopped from disputing the title thereby transferred; but its delivery to the plaintiff would not authorize him to believe that Munroe had authority to deliver it to him as a gratuity, nor did the possession of the deed by Munroe have any tendency to show, or give any ground to the plaintiff for believing, that the defendant had authorize Munroe to purchase any property for him, or to accept any property in exchange for the Berkeley lots, or to fix the terms upon which an exchange should be made, or to enter into an executory contract which should be binding upon the defendant for the payment of an obligation of the plaintiff.

The contention of the respondent that the act of the defendant in November, 1900, was a repurchase of the Berkeley lots by him from the plaintiff, and thereby a ratification of the act of Munroe in exchanging the property, is not sustained by any evidence in the record. There is no testimony that it was a purchase, and the plaintiff himself testified that the defendant said nothing to him in regard to purchasing the lots. It, moreover, clearly appears from the evidence that at that time the defendant had no knowledge of any of the acts or representations of Munroe in reference to the Oakland property, and without such knowledge there could be no implied ratification. The evidence of transactions between defendant and Munroe in reference to other property was unavailing for establishing any agency in this transaction, or to authorize the plaintiff to believe that Munroe was acting in this transaction as the agent of the defendant, since both the plaintiff and his father testified that they had neither of them met the defendant until about a year after the transaction, and there is no evidence that they had any knowledge of the other transactions to which they referred in their testimony.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

ALPER et al. v. TORMEY et al.

REPLEVIN—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY—LIEN—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover possession of steel rails, evidence held to sustain findings that the rails belonged to an insolvent corporation of which intervener was assignee, and that defendant, who held the same as bailee, had no lien thereon for storage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Action by A. Alper and another against Patrick Tormey, and L. N. Buttner, as assignee of the Union Stockyard Company of San Francisco, intervener. From a judgment in favor of intervener, and from an order denying defendant Tormey's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Lattimer and L. F. Tormey, for appellants. Louis H. Brownstone, for respondents. M. R. Jones, for intervener.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to recover from defendant Tormey the possession or the value of certain 60 tons of steel rails. L. C. Wittenmyer, as assignee of the Union Stockyard Company, an insolvent debtor, filed a complaint in intervention, claiming that the property belonged to said insolvent debtor. Defendant Tormey answered the plaintiff's complaint, claiming that said rails were delivered to him as bailee by one A. S. Garretson for safekeeping and that he, defendant, has a lien on the rails as security for services in "safely and securely keeping the said steel rails," which services he alleged to be of the value of $1,500. He further alleged that one E. J. Randall is the owner of the rails as successor to said Garretson. Plaintiffs answered the complaint in intervention denying the ownership and right of possession of the stockyard company, and alleged that prior to the commencement of the action said company sold and transferred to plaintiffs the said rails and that plaintiffs are now the owners thereof and entitled to possession. Defendant Tormey also answered the complaint in intervention specifically denying its allegations and averring a lien as set forth in his answer to the plaintiffs' complaint. Judgment passed for the intervener and this appeal is by defendant Tormey from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The cause was here on the appeal of plaintiffs, and as to them the judgment was affirmed. 82 Pac. 1063.

The only question now here is whether the evidence was sufficient to support the findings that the Union Stockyard Company is the owner of the rails as alleged in its complaint and that defendant Tormey agreed to store them without compensation. In his brief appellant does not claim ownership in Randall, and we shall assume that the allegation of such ownership, alleged in his answer, is waived. He now claims that the evidence fails to show ownership in the Union Stockyard Company, and that if ownership in anybody is shown, it is in Garretson, which, if true, defeats the action. It appears from the testimony of appellant Tormey that a quantity of steel rails, among them the rails in question, was, in the year 1890, deposited on his land, near the property of the company, by Garretson; that Garretson was a stockholder in the company, as was appellant, who was also president of the company from 1892 to 1895; that the company used a large quantity of the rails as they were needed, which were taken from the place where stored on appellant's land and with his knowledge and without objection, many being so used by appellant's direction while he was president of the company and for its purposes; that appellants supposed at the time they were so stored on his land that the rails belonged to the company and were to be used for the improvement of its property and that appellant never claimed to own any of the rails and now makes no claim of ownership to them; that appellant never made any claim for storage until this action was commenced; that he "never gave any attention to the protection of these rails" as he "thought they would protect themselves"; that when they were delivered on his property it was understood that Garretson "could have the rails at any time he wanted them." He testified further: "I knew the Union Stockyard Company helped themselves to these rails so I presumed it was understood at the time that the agreement was to deliver these rails to the Union Stockyard Company." As to his claim for storage appellant testified: "I base my claim to the $1,500 storage on the interest that the money would have fetched me for the land which they promised to take from me." The land referred to did not include the land on which the rails were stored. We think there was sufficient evidence to support the findings.

The officers and stockholders of the company seem to have been the only persons who assumed or exercised any ownership of the rails and this was done for the company alone; no other persons had any use for the rails or showed by evidence that they had or made claim of ownership. The evidence justified the inference that the rails belonged to the company. When the rails were stored on appellant's land it was with his consent and without any understanding that he was to charge for storage and no claim for storage was made by appellant at any time either before, or after, or while he was president of the company. Under his direction as president as well as by the direction of the vice president and manager of the company with appellant's consent, the company made use of the rails as required, and as we have seen it was not until this action was brought that appellant asserted any claim for storage. And his claim then was not for storage services rendered, but, as he testified, it was for interest on the money he expected to receive for the sale of certain land to the company, but which it failed to purchase.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

GATES v. QUONG et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 18, 1906.)

1. Chattel Mortgages—Mortgage of Crop—Loss of Lien.

Under Civ. Code, § 2972, providing that the lien of a mortgage on a growing crop continues on the crop after severance, whether remaining in its original state or converted into another product, so long as it remains on the land of the mortgagor the lien ceases on the removal of the crop from the land on which the crop grew, unless the removal is tortious.

2. Estoppel—Equitable Estoppel—Prejudice to Person Setting up Estoppel.

An estoppel in pais cannot be claimed by a corporation as to transactions with its agent where nothing said or done therein misled the agent to the injury of the corporation.

3. Chattel Mortgages—Mortgage of Crop—Loss of Lien.

The removal of a crop from the land on which it was grown is not tortious as to a mortgagee of the crop where the removal is by virtue of a sale of the crop by the landlord of the mortgagor pursuant to a provision of the lease between the landlord and tenant giving the landlord the exclusive right to sell the crop, which was also made a part of the crop mortgage, and the removal did not fall within the exception to Civ. Code, § 2972, that the lien of a crop mortgage is not lost by a tortious removal of the crop, irrespective of the question of notice of the mortgage.

4. Same—Priority as Between Mortgagee and Garnishing Creditor.

As between a garnishing creditor of the owner of a crop who served his garnishment on the holder of the surplus arising from the proceeds of a sale of the crop, and the mortgagee of the crop after the mortgage lien on the crop had been lost by removal of the crop from the premises on which it was grown, the mortgagee was not entitled to priority.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; L. G. Harrier, Judge.

Interpleader by T. L. Gates against Tom Quong and the Earl Fruit Company. From a judgment in favor of Quong, the fruit company appeals. Affirmed.

Chauncey H. Dunn, for appellant. E. E. McFarland, for respondent Gates. Gregory & Gregory, for respondent Tom Quong.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action in interpleader to determine the right to certain moneys in the hands of plaintiff as the purchase price of certain prunes sold to him. Defendant Earl Fruit Company claimed the money under a crop mortgage executed to it by one Lee Toy. Defendant Tom Quong claimed under a garnishment served on plaintiff, issued in a suit against said Toy. It appears that Toy entered into posession of an orchard tract under an agreement with the owner, one Frank Buck. Toy executed a chattel mortgage on the growing crop to defendant company. One of the questions arising out of the controversy was whether Toy had any mortgageable interest in the prunes. Much attention is given in the briefs to this question; appellant claiming that the agreement possessed all the elements necessary to constitute a leasehold interest in Toy, such as made his share of the prunes grown on the leased premises the subject of chattel mortgage. The court found against the defendant company on this issue, which finding is challenged as unsupported by the evidence. We do not find it necessary to pass upon this question.

The court found "that by the terms of said lease said Buck had the right and was exclusively empowered to sell and deliver to any person or persons he might direct any and all fruit raised upon said demised premises. * * * That said prunes were sold by said Buck to said Gates 'and' were removed from said leased premise and were delivered to plaintiff. That said Earl Fruit Company did not know of said sale until said delivery was nearly completed. That it then notified said Lee Toy and said T. L. Gates that the proceeds of said sale must be paid to said Earl Fruit Company by virtue of said crop mortgage, but neither said Lee Toy nor said T. L. Gates agreed thereto. That no lien * * * existed upon said prunes or the proceeds of the sale thereof * * * after their removal from said leased premises in favor of said Earl Fruit Company." The court further found "that no person representing the Earl Fruit Company was present at said sale of prunes, and that said Earl Fruit Company had no part nor voice therein and neither consented nor objected thereto upon condition that the proceeds should be paid to said company, or by reason of any conditions whatever"; and that neither Buck, nor Toy, nor Gates at any time agreed with one another or with said company "that the purchase price of said lot of prunes should be paid by plaintiff to said Earl Fruit Company, for the purpose of being applied upon said attempted crop mortgage, or for any purpose whatever." Appellant attacks part of these findings as unsupported by the evidence. The court gave judgment for defendant Tom Quong, from which the Earl Fruit Company appeals on bill of exceptions.

Section 2972 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "The lien of a mortgage on a growing crop continues on the crop after severance, whether remaining in its original state or converted into another product, so long as the same remains on the land of mortgagor." Without deciding that the mortgage in this case created any lien on the crop attempted to be mortgaged, but conceding that it did, the lien ceased upon the removal of the crop from the land on which the crop grew. Civ. Code, § 2972; Horgan v. Zanetta, 107 Cal. 27, 40 Pac. 22. The evidence was that the prunes were sold at $17.50 per ton taken from the tree, i. e., undried, and that "nearly all" were picked and delivered to plaintiff at a point away from the demised premises "in town," but what town does not appear. Just what proportion remained undelivered when the agent of the defendant company saw Toy and Gates, does not appear. No point is made, however, on this state of the evidence and both parties seem to treat all the prunes as having been delivered to plaintiff, and that the money involved represents the proceeds of all the prunes in question. Appellant's objection to the findings is aimed particularly at that clause to the effect that neither Toy nor Gates agreed, at the time when the delivery of the prunes was nearly completed, "that the proceeds must be paid to the Earl Fruit Company on its crop mortgage." Upon this point the evidence was sufficient to support the findings. Nor do we think that the evidence shows such a state of facts as would give rise to the principle of estoppel in pais, for we cannot see that the agent of the company was misled to its injury by anything said or done by either Toy or Gates. There was not only no agreement or consent on their part, according to their testimony, that the proceeds should be applied on the mortgage indebtedness, but there was nothing said or done by them from which the agent of the company could reasonably infer such consent or agreement. As there was no agreement of this kind there was no evidence supporting appellant's theory that a novation was established; that is, that in lieu of the mortgage lien a new contract was entered into between Toy, Gates and the company's agent. The case of McIntyre v. Hauser, 131 Cal. 11, 63 Pac. 69, does not seem to us to apply here, for the reason that the court, on sufficient evidence, found that there was no agreement such as appellant relies upon.

Recurring to the assumed lien of the crop mortgage; although it was lost by the severance of the crop and its removal from the demised land, the cases recognize an exception to the rule of the Code where there is a tortious removal of the crops. Appellant claims that there was such removal here and cites in support of the exception to the rule, Wilson v. Prouty, 70 Cal. 196, 11 Pac. 608; Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 178, 26 Pac. 626; Bank of Woodland v. Duncan, 117 Cal. 416, 49 Pac. 414. Aside from the fact that the company never objected to the removal or sale of the prunes, we think the evidence clearly shows authority in Buck to make the sale and a rightful exercise of that authority. Whatever view may be taken of the agreement between him and Toy, as to the mortgageable interest of Toy, the agreement specifically provided: "That all produce shall be sold by lessor [Buck], or by persons indicated by him, and all returns from sales shall come to lessor and be retained by him until he shall be paid the said rent; * * * the balance, if any, to be paid over to lessee." Appellant made this agreement a part of its crop mortgage and of course had knowledge of its provisions. Buck did not have actual notice of the mortgage until after the prunes were delivered and even with such notice it would not have affected his right to sell the prunes. Constructive notice of the mortgage by Gates would not make the purchase by him tortious for the mortgage showed on its face that Buck had the right to sell the fruit. Gates' first actual notice of the mortgage was when the prunes were about all delivered and no attempt was then made by the company, or at any other time, to stop delivery. Appellant's agent seems to have assumed either that the mortgage lien followed and attached to the proceeds of the prunes, or that there was a binding agreement between Gates, Toy, and this agent, apart from the mortgage lien, to pay the proceeds to the company. There was evidence supporting the findings of the court which in effect were that the lien was lost, and that there was no such agreement.

Appellant contends that even if Buck was given the right to sell the crop, the fact did not amount to a consent on the part of the company that the sale should release its lien; that Buck's right was nothing more than that of a first mortgagee and as he is making no claim to the fund, the company, as second mortgagee, is entitled to the surplus remaining after Buck was paid. But this view does not meet the claim of Tom Quong, the attaching creditor, who served his garnishment after the company had lost its lien. When the attachment was served the defendant company had no more claim upon the fruit than any general creditor.

Taking, then, the most favorable view of the Buck-Toy agreement, that appellant had a lien by virtue of its mortgage, the findings that the lien was lost before the attachment was levied, support the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

WORTH v. EMERSON et al.

1. JUDGMENT—MOTION TO VACATE—ERROR.
Where it appeared from the judgment roll that the judgment was rendered on motion of plaintiff and after the court had heard evidence offered and after due deliberation, any error committed therein not shown on the face of the record could not be corrected by motion to vacate, but only by appeal or through a motion for a new trial.

2. APPEAL—MATTERS NOT APPARENT OF RECORD—AFFIDAVITS.
A judgment cannot be impeached for error committed on the trial or in the rendition of the judgment, by affidavits outside the record, but only by bill of exceptions made a part of the record.

3. APPEAL — RIGHT TO ALLEGE ERROR — STRANGERS TO THE ACTION.
Error in rendering a judgment against one of the defendants to an action to enforce the lien of a street assessment, after the dismissal of the action against the other defendants, was available only to the person against whom the judgment was rendered, and not to a stranger to the action.

4. SAME—NOTICE—SERVICE.
In an action to foreclose a street assessment on land belonging to several defendants, wherein judgment was rendered for plaintiff, nonappealing defendants were not adverse parties, and no notice of appeal was required to be served on them.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by E. Worth against Esther B. Emerson and others. From an order vacating a judgment in favor of plaintiff and granting defendant Emerson a right to redeem, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ralph L. Hathorn and Brooks Palmer, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. Action to enforce the lien of a street assessment. Appeal from an order setting aside a judgment previously rendered in favor of plaintiff.

The action was commenced November 4, 1898, against Esther B. Emerson, John Doe, Robert Doe, and Jane Doe; the plaintiff alleging in his complaint that "the defendants on November 5, 1896 (the day the assessment became a lien) were, and still continue to be, the owners" of the lot of land described in the complaint, and that the said defendants John Doe, Robert Doe, and Jane Doe are sued by fictitious names because their true names are unknown to plaintiff. Summons was served upon the defendant Emerson, and her default for want of an appearance was entered October 19, 1901. No service was made on either of the other defendants. February 17, 1904, an answer to the complaint was filed by John H. Grady, stating that he is "sued herein as John Doe, one of the defendants in the above-entitled action." After this answer was filed, but on the same day, the court, on the motion of the plaintiff, dismissed the action "as to the defendants therein sued by the fictitious names of John Doe, Robert Doe and Jane Doe, and John H. Grady, appearing herein as John Doe," and after hearing the evidence on the part of the plaintiff entered its judgment, declaring the amount of the assessment to be a lien upon the land described in the complaint, and directing a sale of the land in satisfaction thereof. February 25th Grady gave notice of a motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, and in support thereof filed an affidavit, in which he stated that he had succeeded to the right, title, and interest of the defendant Emerson in said lot of land, and her right to redeem the same from a sale to the state of California by a deed from her bearing date February 13, 1904, and had thereafter paid certain money for the purpose of redeeming the land from a sale thereof made to the state of California for delinquent taxes. The motion came on for hearing March 18th, and on May 27th was granted by the court. The only evidence presented in support of the motion was the judgment roll in the action and the above affidavit and notice of motion. From the order thus made the present appeal has been taken.

The order appealed from was not made upon the ground or claim that the judgment was rendered by reason of any mistake or inadvertence, or that there was any misprision of the clerk in entering it. It was not void upon its face, and it appears from the judgment roll itself that it was rendered upon the motion of the plaintiff, and after the court had heard the evidence offered on his behalf, and after due deliberation thereon. If any error was committed therein, it was a judicial error, which could be corrected only upon an appeal, or through a motion for a new trial. Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22; First National Bank of Fresno v. Dusy, 110 Cal. 69, 42 Pac. 476. And any error committed by the court upon the trial, or in the rendition of the judgment, in order to be available for the purpose of vacating or setting the judgment aside, must be manifested by a bill of exceptions and made a part of the record. The validity of a judgment cannot be impeached by affidavits outside of the record.

The grounds upon which Grady asked that the judgment be set aside were that the court had no power or authority, in a street assessment case, to dismiss the action as to a portion of the defendants alleged to be the owners of the land, and render judgment against only one of the owners sued; and that, as he was sued as John Doe, a fictitious defendant, and had filed an answer alleging that he is the owner of the land, the court had no power, authority, or jurisdiction to dismiss the action as to him, sued as John Doe, and render judgment against the defendant Emerson. To say that, in an action or proceeding which is within its jurisdiction, a court has no power or authority to make a certain order, or render a certain judgment therein, is merely to say that the court has no jurisdiction to commit error, which is equivalent to saying that it is erroneous to commit error. It may be conceded that the court erred in rendering judgment against the defendant Emerson after dismissing the action against the other defendants (Clark v. Porter, 53 Cal. 409); but such error was available to Mrs. Emerson alone, and not to a stranger to the action, or one not a party thereto. The judgment so rendered was voidable therefor at her instance, but was not void. Chase v. Christiansen, 41 Cal. 253. It was competent for her to waive the error, as she has done by not appealing from the judgment, and submit to a sale of her interest in the land in satisfaction of the lien. Such error, however, is not available to either of the defendants so dismissed from the action. Upon a dismissal as to them, their rights in the land were unaffected by the judgment as if the action had been originally brought against Mrs. Emerson alone. Page v. W. W. Chase Co., 145 Cal. 578, 79 Pac. 278.

Grady is not named in the complaint, nor was he served with any process in the action. His claim in his answer that he is "one of the defendants in the action, sued herein as John Doe," is refuted by the affidavit which he presented in support of his motion. The John Doe who is named in the complaint as a defendant in the action is designated therein as a person who was one of the owners of the land at the date of the assessment, and thence continuously until the commencement of the action; whereas Grady, in his affidavit, claims to have acquired his interest in the land on February 13, 1904, the day before he filed his answer, and does not claim to have had any interest therein prior thereto; and the only interest which he claims to have then acquired was derived from the defendant Emerson, whose default in the action had been previously entered. He does not claim to have been at any time a co-owner with Emerson, and therefore was not one of the defendants in the action or entitled to be made a defendant therein; and his filing an answer to the complaint was unauthorized.

The proposition on the part of the respondent that the appeal should be dismissed for want of a service of the notice of appeal on Mrs. Emerson is overruled, upon the authority of Foley v. Bullard, 97 Cal. 517, 32 Pac. 574.

The order appealed from is reversed.

SIERRA LAND & CATTLE CO. v. BRICKER et al.

1. CORPORATIONS—INCORPORATION—EVIDENCE.

The articles of incorporation of plaintiff with the filing marks thereon are evidence of the proper filing of such articles, and of plaintiff's due incorporation.

2. SAME.

A receipt showing that defendants contracted with plaintiff in its corporate name was competent evidence as to plaintiff's incorporation.

3. DEPOSITARIES—DEPOSITARY FOR HIRE.

Under the direct provision of Civ. Code, § 1503, where defendant contracted to receive back property sold to plaintiff and repay the purchase money if the same should prove unsatisfactory, when defendants refused to receive the property on offer to return the same became the property of the defendants and plaintiff thereafter held it as a depositary for hire.

4. CONTRACTS — ACTION FOR BREACH — EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover the purchase price of a team sold under a contract that it would be taken back and the purchase money refunded if unsatisfactory, evidence as to the unsoundness of one of the horses was admissible as indicating the reasonable character of plaintiff's claim that the team was unsatisfactory.

5. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Even though it was unnecessary to show such fact, the admission of such evidence was harmless.

6. CONTRACTS—OFFER OF PERFORMANCE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1496, providing that the thing to be delivered need not in any case be actually produced upon an offer of performance unless the offer is accepted, an agreement to return property bought if unsatisfactory is satisfied when an offer is made and refused.

7. SAME — ACTION FOR BREACH — CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 1440, providing that if a party to an obligation gives notice to another before the latter is in default that he will not perform the same upon his part, and does not retract such notice before the time at which performance upon his part is due, such other party is entitled to enforce the obligation without previously performing or offering to perform any conditions upon his part in favor of the former party, the cause of action on a contract to receive back property and return the purchase money accrued when the seller refused to receive back the property and return the purchase money.

Action by the Sierra Land & Cattle Company against W. J. Bricker and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Will D. Gould and E. C. Oggel, for appellants. B. W. Hahn and Hahn & Hahn, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for money. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, from which judgment, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

Plaintiff avers in its complaint that it purchased a span of horses from defendants upon an agreement that if, after trial, the same should prove unsatisfactory, such horses should be returned and defendants would repay the purchase money, together with expenses of shipping to the place of trial, and expenses incident to such trial. Further, that the team, upon trial, was found to be unsatisfactory, and plaintiff immediately notified defendants of such fact, offered to return said horses, and demanded the repayment of the money, all of which defendants refused. Defendants deny all of the allegations. The evidence in the record is sufficient to support the verdict. No question of rescission is involved. The action is based upon a contract, the breach of which is clearly shown. The articles of incorporation of the plaintiff, with the filing marks thereon, were evidence of the proper filing of such articles and the due incorporation of the plaintiff, even were such proof necessary, when we consider the written receipt in evidence from which it appears that the defendants contracted with the plaintiff in its corporate name and received money admitted thereby to have been money of the plaintiff. This written receipt was competent evidence in the regard just mentioned, as well as tending to prove the actual receipt of the money, which was denied. Under the contract established, when defendants refused to receive the property upon the offer to return, the same became the property of the defendants, and plaintiff thereafter held that same as a depositary for hire. Civ. Code, § 1503. There is no issue pending in the case involving any counterclaim or demand growing out of a violation of the plaintiff's duty as such depositary, and all testimony received with reference to the use or retention of the horses under the pleadings was immaterial. Plaintiff is the real party in interest, as shown by the receipt and other competent testimony. The evidence with reference to the unsoundness of one of the horses was not improper, as indicating the reasonable character of the claim of the plaintiff that the team was unsatisfactory; even when that fact is unnecessary to be shown, no prejudice could result to defendants by such proof. An agreement to return if unsatisfactory is satisfied when an offer is made and refused. "The thing to be delivered need not in any case be actually produced upon an offer of performance unless the offer is accepted." Civ. Code, § 1496. The cause of action accrued when defendants refused to perform their part of the contract. Civ. Code, § 1440.

We discover no merit in the many other specifications of error in anywise prejudicial to defendants, or worthy of notice.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Action by Jacob Showers and others against Madaline M. Zanone. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mahan & Mahan, for appellant. Gillett & Cutler, for respondents.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This is an action to recover one-fifth of the cost of a drainage ditch constructed by the plaintiffs. The complaint contains two counts. In the first a cause of action for money expended for the use and benefit of defendant at her request is stated. In the second it is alleged that the plaintiffs were duly authorized by defendant to make arrangements for and construct said ditch, she agreeing to pay her pro rata share of the expense. In this connection it is stated that she acted by and through an agent who communicated her authorization and consent to plaintiffs, and that by her conduct preceding the commencement of the work, and during its progress, she led plaintiffs to believe that she acquiesced in the plan proposed to her, and that said agent had authority to speak and act for her in the premises. The court found for plaintiffs, and judgment was entered accordingly. The sole point urged on this appeal is that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

It is a cardinal rule of appellate practice that the findings will not be disturbed when the evidence is conflicting. Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 284, 53 Pac. 699; Rose v. Rose, 112 Cal. 343, 44 Pac. 658; Astill v. South Yuba W. Co., 146 Cal. 57, 79 Pac. 594. The weight and effect to be given the evidence was for the trial court to determine, and even though it was demonstrated that the preponderance of evidence was against the conclusion reached, we could not disturb that conclusion if any evidence was found in the record upon which it might properly be based. All doubts must be resolved, and all intendments indulged in favor of the judgment, and we "must construe the testimony as favorably as possible for the respondents." Carteri v. Roberts, 140 Cal. 165, 73 Pac. 818; People v. Wong Suey, 110 Cal. 117, 42 Pac. 420; Taylor v. Kelley 103 Cal. 178, 37 Pac. 216; Olmstead v. Dauphiny, 104 Cal. 635, 38 Pac. 505; Meyer v. Great Western Ins. Co., 104 Cal. 381, 38 Pac. 82; People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 83, 39 Pac. 12.

Viewing the evidence in this case in the light of these well-settled rules, it certainly cannot be said that the findings are not supported by the evidence. The business relations between the defendant and her alleged agent prior to this transaction, her visit to the scene of the contemplated improvement in his company, their joint examination of the premises and what was said and done by each at that time and subsequently, had a strong tendency not only to show his agency, but her consent to and acquiescence in the plan which had been proposed to her. Her inquiry upon the street in Eureka, and her conduct when the claim of plaintiffs was presented to her were of potent significance. She knew and so did her agent, that the work was in progress, and the latter at least must have known that the plaintiffs were counting on her to pay a portion of the expense incurred. Both defendant and her agent were cognizant of the fact that the ditch would be of great benefit to her land by securing it against overflow, and the facts and circumstances surrounding its construction were such as to warrant the finding and judgment that she was liable for one-fifth of the expense. Bergthold v. Porter Bros. Co., 114 Cal. 688, 46 Pac. 738; Puget Sound L. Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 243, 26 Pac. 902; Burnett v. Fisher, 57 Cal. 152; Anglo-Cal. Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 399, 81 Pac. 1081; Meechem on Agency, 83; Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 422, 49 Pac. 559; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 687, 47 Pac. 695; Dolbeer v. Livingston, 100 Cal. 621, 35 Pac. 328; Scott v. Jackson, 89 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 898. Indeed, her failure to disclaim liability, and the excuse she gave for failure to pay, coupled with her pertinent inquiry as to what was being done, and other facts incident to her visit to the scene would alone lend strong support to a finding that she had fully consented to the scheme and had promised to defray her portion of the expense it would involve.

True, all this testimony was flatly contradicted, and it may even be said that the evidence would support findings directly to the contrary, but we have pointed to the reasons which forbid our interference, and hence the judgment is affirmed.

WETZEL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SISKIYOU COUNTY.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 7, 1906.)

1. Certiorari—Grounds—Errors.

A judgment will not be reversed on certiorari for mere errors committed in the exercise of its rightful jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Certiorari, § 42.]

2. Same.

A writ of review is not a writ of error on which the rulings of the trial court and matters within its jurisdiction may be reviewed, unless they are matters necessary to determine the jurisdictional facts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Certiorari, §§ 1, 42.]

Petition by Sigmund L. Wetzel for a writ of review to review the proceedings of the superior court of the county of Siskiyou, which terminated in a judgment determining petitioner to be insane, and ordering his commitment to a state hospital. Writ denied.

Jacob P. Wetzel, for petitioner.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Petitioner presents to the court what purports to be a statement of the proceedings of the superior court of the county of Siskiyou, which resulted in a judgment that the said Sigmund L. Wetzel was insane and that he be committed to and confined in the Napa State Hospital at Napa, Cal. The prayer of the petition is "that a writ of error issued out of the honorable District Court of Appeal, directed to the superior court of the county of Siskiyou, commanding and directing it to certify up to this honorable court a transcript of the records in the papers in the said matter, of Sigmund L. Wetzel, an insane person, and that this honorable court [review] the proceedings and rulings in said matter, as rendered, ordered and adjudged by the said superior court, because of the error heretofore alleged in this petition, and do whatever is meet and just in the matter." Assuming that the intention of the petitioner is to obtain a writ of review, it is sufficient to say that the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter.

The judgment of a court will not, on certiorari, be reversed for mere error committed in the exercise of its rightful jurisdiction. Hutchinson v. Superior Court, 61 Cal. 119; Holbrook, etc., v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 589, 39 Pac. 936. The writ of review is not a writ of error upon which the rulings of the court and other matters within its jurisdiction may be reviewed, except they be matters necessary to determine the jurisdictional facts. Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580. So far as appears from the petition and accompanying papers and purported copy of records, the errors complained of were mere errors occurring at the hearing and related to the admissibility of evidence, to the refusal of the court to continue the hearing, to the giving of certain instructions and like questions.

There is nothing in the record to show and no claim is made that the court was without jurisdiction.

The writ is denied.

PRINCE v. KENNEDY.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 7, 1906.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—ACTION FOR COMPENSATION—COMPLAINT.

A complaint in an action by attorneys for compensation alleging that plaintiffs were partners engaged in the practice of law as attorneys and counselors, was not insufficient for failing to allege that plaintiffs were authorized by the laws of the state to practice law.

2. SAME.

In an action by attorneys, the complaint alleged that plaintiffs at the request of defendant rendered for him services for which he agreed to pay the reasonable value, and that such services had been fully rendered and performed, and that a certain sum was the reasonable value thereof. Held, that an objection that the complaint did not allege that anything was due from defendant was untenable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 5, Cent. Dig. Attorney and Client, § 365.]

3. TRIAL—FINDINGS BY COURT—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES.

A complaint alleged that plaintiffs as attorneys rendered services for defendant for which he agreed to pay the reasonable value which was $750. The answer denied that the services were of any value, and alleged for a separate defense that defendant had employed plaintiffs to collect a certain claim due to defendant, but that plaintiffs had neglected to collect the same. The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true except the allegation that the services were worth $750, and found the reasonable value thereof to be $500. Held, that the matter set up in the alleged separate defense raised no material issue, and the findings disposed of every issue in the case.

4. APPEAL—RECORD—FAILURE TO MAKE FINDINGS—ABSENCE OF EVIDENCE.

A judgment will not be reversed for failure of the trial court to find on an affirmative defense where the record does not contain the evidence.

5. EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A party alleging an affirmative defense has the burden of proving it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellant. Stutsman & Stutsman and Taylor & Forgy, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. In this action it is alleged in the complaint "that Taylor & Forgy is and at all times herein mentioned was a copartnership, composed of W. S. Taylor and E. W. Forgy, who are, and at the times herein mentioned were, engaged in the practice of law as attorneys and counselors at law, in the city of Los Angeles, Cal.; that within two years last past, as such attorneys and counselors at law, and at the special instance and request of the defendant, H. Kennedy, said Taylor & Forgy rendered to and for said defendant services for which said defendant agreed to pay the reasonable value thereof; that no time was agreed upon for the payment thereof, but said services have been fully rendered and performed and $750 is the reasonable value thereof; that no part of said sum has been paid, and the whole thereof, to wit, the sum of $750, is now due, owing and unpaid." An assignment of the said claim to the plaintiff is also duly alleged in the complaint. The answer, in effect, admits the performance of services, but denies that they were performed within two years last past, and also denies that they were of any value. The answer then proceeds as follows: "And for a further and separate defense this defendant alleges that within six months last past defendant employed W. S. Taylor, one of the members of the firm of Taylor & Forgy, as attorney at law, to collect a certain claim of $525 due defendant as commission upon a sale of real estate from one, Andrea Daneri; that said Taylor and said Taylor & Forgy failed and neglected to collect said claim or any part thereof; that they wholly failed and neglected to institute proceedings to collect said claim, and defendant says that he has no information upon which to found a belief, and basing his denial upon that ground he denies that said Taylor or said Taylor & Forgy performed any services in that behalf." The court found "that all the allegations of the complaint are true," except the allegation that the services were of the reasonable value of $750 and found the reasonable value thereof to be "$500 and no more"; and "that no part of said reasonable value of such services has been paid." From the judgment entered in plaintiff's favor on these findings the defendant appeals.

1. It is objected first that the complaint is insufficient to support the judgment, and fails to state a cause of action because it is not alleged therein that Taylor & Forgy were attorneys at law "authorized by the laws of this state to practice law." This contention is fully negatived by the case of Miller v. Ballerino, 135 Cal. 566, 67 Pac. 1046, 68 Pac. 600. The allegations of the complaint herein are much broader than in the Ballerino Case. There the complaint contained no allegation that the services were performed as attorneys at law. Here it is so alleged, and, further, that the firm was "engaged in the practice of law," etc. From this it will be presumed, if necessary, that they were regularly authorized to practice law. This point is devoid of merit.

2. The point that the complaint does not allege that anything is due from defendant to plaintiff is also devoid of merit. The complaint alleges specific facts leading to the irresistible conclusion that $750 is due from defendant to plaintiff; and that is sufficient.

3. The findings are also clearly sufficient to support the judgment and fully dispose of all the issues in the case. To find that the allegations of the complaint are true negatives every denial of those allegations, and to except the allegation of value of the services from this general finding and to dispose of the question by a specific finding that said value is $500 leaves the findings open to no objection on the score of uncertainty. It is impossible to misunderstand the findings as they are drawn, and we think them sufficient under the authority of Moore v. Clear Lake Water Works, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. 816; County of Sutter v. McGriff, 130 Cal. 124, 62 Pac. 412, and many earlier cases in this state of similar import.

4. The matter set up in the alleged separate defense in the answer constituted no defense to the action, raised no material issue and no finding as to it was necessary. There was nothing in it to show that the employment therein referred to had any connection with the services for which suit was brought, nor were any damages alleged or claimed by way of counterclaim or otherwise. Moreover, if it were conceded that the answer contained an affirmative defense, it is settled by numerous cases and beyond question that a reversal will not be had for failure to find on it where, as here, the record does not contain the evidence. Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 82 Pac. 66. The burden is on the party alleging an affirmative defense to prove it, and the court will not presume, in the absence of the evidence, that there was evidence upon a point in respect to which there is no finding. Klokke v. Escailler, 124 Cal. 297, 56 Pac. 1113. As to whether the appeal was taken for delay, and as to whether damages should be added to the judgment for that reason, the court is unable to reach a unanimous concurrence either way, and therefore damages are not added as for an appeal taken for delay.

The judgment is affirmed.

VAN LEUVEN v. VAN LEUVEN.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 9, 1906.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO EXCEPT.

The admission of an exhibit in evidence will not be reviewed on appeal, where no exception was taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by W. H. Van Leuven against A. B. Van Leuven. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, for appellant. Frank C. Prescott and Prescott & Morris, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This action is brought by one brother against another to reform a written contract of a sale of an interest in real estate, so as to make it also an agreement to purchase on the part of the defendant, and to enforce performance of said agreement to purchase. The findings and judgment are in plaintiff's favor, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. The court found, in substance, that it was agreed by defendant to pay plaintiff $325 on or before the 14th day of November, 1903, in consideration of the conveyance to defendant by plaintiff of plaintiff's interest in the Whaley place, and that said agreement was omitted from the written agreement through a clerical error and mutual mistake of the parties. Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence. It appears from the evidence that defendant had originally purchased the Whaley place, paying therefor $1,400 of money he had on hand, $1,700 that he borrowed from the Union Bank, and $325 from and of the plaintiff's money. After this purchase, the brothers quarreled for some weeks and finally entered into negotiations for a business settlement with the view of placing themselves in a position where no further communication between them should be necessary. To show that in the course of these negotiations the defendant agreed to buy plaintiff's interest and pay him this $325 for it much evidence, oral and written, was introduced. C. E. Truesdell, one of the lawyers who had a hand in the settlement and drew up the contract, testified, among other things, "what I want the court to understand is of a conversation that was had there that A. B. Van Leuven was to purchase W. H.'s interest in the Whaley place; it must have been left out of the contract by an oversight on Mr. Prescott's and my part." It is needless to go into all the evidence on this subject. It is sufficient to say that the very purpose of the agreement and of the negotiations for the agreement was to effect a settlement and segregation between these quarreling brothers, and this could not be done without the defendant buying out his brother and paying off this $325 that the latter had in the land. It was the clear intent and purpose of the parties that this should be done, and it is plain from the evidence that defendant intended that it should be done, and that the contract which was to be formally prepared and signed should accomplish that purpose. The omission of this most essential part of their agreement cannot be accounted for on any other theory consistent with the evidence, than on that of a mistake and oversight on the part of all concerned in the preparation of the written contract. The finding has ample support in the evidence.

2. There can be no reasonable question that plaintiff was interested in the land to the extent of $325 of his money which had gone into the purchase of it. Plaintiff's interest in the land is admitted by defendant's becoming a party to the contract of sale. The finding of such interest is supported by the evidence.

3. As to appellant's complaint concerning Exhibit L-1, there was no ruling of the court, except that it might be marked for identification. It was not admitted in evidence, nor was there any exception taken by appellant to any action of the court in connection with this exhibit. There is, therefore, nothing concerning it that this court can review.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING—EXTENSION OF MORTGAGE—EXERCISE OF MORTGAGOR'S OPTION.

Where a mortgage provided that the mortgagor might extend it for a year from the expiration of the term thereof, it was not necessary that the mortgagor's decision to extend be expressed in writing, as the agreement constituted a written proposition on the part of the mortgagee which on acceptance by the mortgagor became a valid contract in writing on the part of the mortgagee.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by May Delevan Corson against Mrs. Mary A. McDonald. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The mortgage was given to secure a promissory note of date November 26, 1897, for the sum of $3,500, payable with interest on or before one year from date, and for an additional sum of 10 per cent. on principal as attorney's fee, in case suit should be commenced to enforce payment. There is contained in the mortgage the following provision: "And it is further understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto, that the mortgagor herein has the privilege of renewing or extending this mortgage for one additional year from the expiration of the term hereof."

The complaint alleges in effect that the defendant exercised her option of extending the mortgage for an additional year, and the court so finds; and finds further that the option was exercised and the plaintiff's assignor notified thereof prior to November 26, 1898. The court also finds adversely upon the plea of the statute made by the defendant. Judgment was accordingly entered for the amount due on the note and mortgage, and also for the sum of $350 as attorney's fee. The complaint was filed November 10, 1903: that is to say, not within four years from the maturity of the note according to its original terms, but within four years from the closing date of the extension. The finding of the court as to the defendant's exercise of her option to extend the note for one year is fully supported by the evidence of the plaintiff's assignor and another witness. But the point is made that the extension of the time and the acquiescence therein of the plaintiff's assignor was not in writing, and that the court erred in admitting the testimony. But the position is untenable. The agreement contained in the mortgage does not provide that the option of the mortgagor should be expressed in writing. It constituted, in fact, a written proposition on the part of the mortgagee, which, upon acceptance by the mortgagor, became a valid contract in writing on the part of the mortgagee to extend the time. Nor, though the contrary is suggested by the appellant, can the agreement be construed as applying to the mortgage only, and not to the note. It is inconceivable that such could have been the intention of the parties.

With regard to attorney's fee, there is an apparent discrepancy between the finding of the court that $300 is a reasonable fee and the judgment, which is for $350. But as no explanation is given in the briefs of this discrepancy, or any point made thereon by the appellant, we shall assume that the sum contained in the judgment was regarded by the court as a reasonable fee. If, however, there is any error in regard to the fee, it is merely clerical and can be corrected by the court below, notwithstanding the judgment on the appeal. Nor do we see any error in the judgment of the court in making the attorney's fee a lien upon the property. The note itself provides for the fee, and it thus becomes a part of the sum or sums secured by the mortgage. In the decision cited by appellant the case was otherwise. Irving v. Perry, 119 Cal. 357, 51 Pac. 544, 949; Klokke v. Escailler, 124 Cal. 297, 56 Pac. 1113. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. CONTRACTS—COMPENSATION—EXTRA WORK.

Where plaintiff contracted to construct a tunnel according to specifications of the engineers of defendant and agreed that the tunnel should be timbered in a thoroughly workmanlike and practical manner to protect it against outward and inward pressure, and defendant furnished the materials, and during the process of the work plaintiff protested that the timber furnished was defective and the specifications insufficient, he was not responsible for the caving in of the tunnel, but was entitled to recover for extra repair work rendered necessary thereby.

2. APPEAL—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT.

In an action for work performed under a contract for construction of a tunnel, where the judgment awarded an amount greater than the plaintiff's evidence showed that his expenditures amounted to, the judgment will be modified by deducting the difference.

3. DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PROSPECTIVE PROFITS.

In an action for breach of a contract for the construction of a tunnel, in that the defendant prevented its completion, where the evidence showed that the plaintiff was receiving a profit of a certain amount per foot in the preparing of soil he was working, and the number of feet remaining to be dug, the prospective profits were a proper element of damage for the defendant's breach of contract.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Actions by A. L. McConnell against the Corona City Water Company. From judgments in favor of the plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

E. W. Freeman (A. D. Laughlin, of counsel), for appellant. J. V. Hannon and Munday & Redd, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff engaged himself to build for defendant a tunnel "in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner to completion," as far as the defendant might direct; "it being the intention to construct the said tunnel for the distance of about 1,200 feet to the artesian wells, unless water in sufficient quantities is encountered before reaching that point." It was stipulated "that said tunnel shall be constructed on the grades and according to the specifications of the engineers of the party of the second part in charge of the work. The tunnel will be timbered in a thoroughly workmanlike and practical manner so as to protect against outward and also inward pressure." The defendant agreed to furnish all the lumber needed and required by the plaintiff for the tunnel, the lumber to be delivered on the ground at the shafts where it was to be used. The defendant also agreed to make progress payments during the performance of the work on the first of each and every month of 75 per cent. of the work completed during the previous month at the agreed rate. Work was prosecuted under this contract until some 764 feet of tunnel had been driven, the progress payments being made upon the report of defendant's engineers. At this point of the work the tunnel caved, and repair work upon it became necessary. This work was done by the plaintiff. The case L. A. No. 1,496 is to recover from defendant the value of such work done up to March 20, 1902. The other action (L. A. No. 1,495) is for similar work done after that date, and also for damages for loss of estimated profits occasioned by defendant's failure and refusal to allow plaintiff to proceed and complete the tunnel.

The action L. A. No. 1,496, for convenience, may first be considered. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $2,000 as the value of such extra work, and the defendant appeals. Its principle contention is that the contract for the construction of the tunnel was entire and indivisible; that under it, notwithstanding the provision for partial payments, as the work progressed, it became the duty of plaintiff to turn over to defendant a completed tunnel, driven and supported in a thoroughly workmanlike manner, in particular, that plaintiff had agreed to timber the tunnel in a thoroughly workmanlike and practical manner so as to protect against outward and inward pressure; that the caving of the tunnel afforded evidence that it was not properly timbered; that it became the duty, therefore, of the plaintiff, at his own cost, to do this repair work; that it was repair work within the terms of the contract for which, treating the contract as indivisible, plaintiff had no cause of action, and the cost of which he should himself have borne. In support of this position, appellant cites many cases such as Cox v. W. P. R. R. Co., 44 Cal. 18; Boyle v. Agawan Canal Co., 33 Am. Dec. 749; Seguin v. Debon, 5 Am. Dec. 735, to the effect that where a contractor agrees to do certain work, as the grading of a certain section of railroad, in the first case, or the construction of a certain part of a canal, as in the second case, even though the contracts may provide for progress payments, such contracts are entire and the provision for progress payments does not make them divisible. The soundness of these cases and of the proposition of law which they enunciate are not to be doubted, and in the case at bar if the question were whether the contract for the construction of this tunnel was entire and indivisible, there would be no hesitation in saying that it was. But this conclusion does not advance us in the determination of the real question in dispute between the parties. That question may be thus stated: Treating the contract as entire, was the extra work necessitated by the caving of the tunnel, work within the contemplation of the contract, for which, therefore, the contractor was entitled to no remuneration, or was it work without the contemplation of the contract, for the doing of which he is entitled to compensation? To answer this question, in addition to the provisions of the contract, resort must be had to the evidence. First, as to the terms of the contract, it will be noted that while the contractor agrees to timber in a thoroughly workmanlike and practical manner, so as to protect against outward and also inward pressure, he is controlled in this by the further provisions that the tunnel is to be constructed according to the specifications of the engineers of the company in charge of the work, and that the material for timbering is to be furnished him by defendant. The evidence shows that the plaintiff did drive the tunnel and timber it under the directions and specifications of the supervising engineers of defendant; that progress payments were made upon the certificate of the engineers of the completion according to the terms of the contract of certain portions of the tunnel; that the contractor complained of the inferior quality of the timber which defendant persisted in delivering to him, and of the inadequacy of the timber work which the engineers directed should be done, all without avail; that he was obliged to use the inferior lumber which was furnished; and that the timbering was done under the directions of and to the satisfaction of defendant's engineers. Under such circumstances, notwithstanding that the contract is indivisible, there can be no hesitation in saying that the contractor's responsibility for any completed portion of the work, so done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the engineers, relieves him from responsibility for such an accident as that which befell, that the responsibility for such action must rest on the defendant, and that, notwithstanding that the contract was entire and indivisible, plaintiff was under no more compulsion to perform the extra work of repairing the cave in the tunnel so occurring than he would have been if it had been occasioned by a willful act of destruction upon the part of the defendant. The work became necessary to enable the contractor to proceed under his contract. It was occasioned by the failure of the defendant to furnish suitable timbers and by the mistake of their engineer as to the strength of the timbering required. As the contractor was doing his work under the directions and specifications of those engineers he cannot be held responsible for their errors or miscalculations.

Appellant further contends that while the court awarded a judgment in the sum of $2,000 for the value of the work and labor so done up to the 20th of March, 1902, the undisputed evidence offered by plaintiff himself shows that only $1,024.60 was actually so expended. To this contention respondent makes no answer, and the record seems to bear out appellant's position in this regard. It is not necessary, however, that a new trial should be ordered. It is sufficient to order, and it is ordered, that the judgment be modified in this regard, with an allowance to plaintiff of the sum of $1,024.60, instead of $2,000, and that, as so modified, it stands affirmed. The appellant will recover his costs upon this appeal.

L. A. No. 1,495. The complaint in this action charged in two counts: The first for the value of the extra labor performed as in L. A. No. 1,496, after March 20, 1902; the second, for the profits of which the contractor was deprived by the refusal of the defendant to allow him to proceed with the construction of the tunnel to its completion as contemplated in their agreement. The court allowed $1,024.60 as the value of such labor, whereas the record discloses that the only testimony in relation thereto was that offered by the plaintiff himself, and his items of expenditure show an aggregate of $898.10. There must be a modification of the judgment in this regard by the difference between $1,024 and $898.10.

The second count sets up a breach of the contract by defendant in refusing and neglecting to furnish the additional lumber needed and required by plaintiff in timbering the tunnel, by which neglect and refusal the defendant rendered it impossible for the plaintiff to perform his part of the contract. The court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the defendant did violate its contract in this regard, and as the furnishing of suitable timber when required by the contractor was a material part of defendant's agreement, the breach justified the plaintiff in treating the contract as at an end. One who has been injured by a breech of contract has an election to pursue any of three remedies. He may treat the contract as rescinded and may recover upon a quantum meruit so far as he has performed; or he may keep the contract alive, for the benefit of both parties, being at all times ready and able to perform; or, third, he may treat the repudiation as putting an end to the contract for all purposes of performance, and sue for the profits he would have realized if he had not been prevented from performing. In this last case, the contract would be continued in force for that purpose. 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 152; Fountain v. Semi-Tropic L. & W. Co., 99 Cal. 680, 34 Pac. 497. It was the last of these remedies which plaintiff elected to adopt and pursue. But appellant contends that his damages for loss of prospective profit are too speculative and remote to justify the award which the court made, and cites numerous cases where this and other courts have refused to allow prospective profits as an element of damages upon the ground that they were too speculative and remote. Such is the undoubted rule, but it is to be noted that this is not an objection to the inclusion of profits as a proper element of damages, but is a declaration merely that when they are too speculative and remote to be capable of anything like reasonable ascertainment, when they are collateral merely and do not arise directly or by natural consequence out of the tort complained of, they cease to become a proper element in the admeasurement of damages. No one may contest the soundness of this principle, but the converse of it is equally true, that where prospective profits are not too speculative and remote, where they do arise directly and as a natural consequence out of the injury, they are always allowed as an element of damage. Says this court in Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 244, 48 Pac. 64: "An examination of the authorities will show that the cases in which future profits were rejected as 'speculative' or 'too remote' were cases where the asserted future profits were entirely collateral to the subject-matter of the contract, and not consequences flowing in a direct line from the breach of such contract." And again in Martin v. Deetz, 102 Cal. 55, 36 Pac. 368, 41 Am. St. Rep. 151, the syllabus, correctly summarizing the views of this court, declares that remote results produced by intermediate sequences of cause are beyond the reach of any just or practical rule or damages, and financial embarrassment and loss of prospective profits are too remote, contingent, speculative, indirect, and uncertain to come within a legal measure of damages for an alleged wrong in refusing to act as a director of a corporation and inducing others not to participate in the organization. An instructive analysis of the question and of the cases is found in Howard v. Stilwell & Bierce Mfg. Co., 139 U. S. 200, 11 Sup. Ct. 500, 35 L. Ed. 147. But where, as in this case, the loss of profit can, with reasonable certainty be shown, both as to the fact and as to the amount, such loss of profits is properly an element of damage. Thus, says this court, in Fountain v. Semi-Tropic L. &. W. Co., 99 Cal. 680, 34 Pac. 498. "If, however, the breach be of a covenant, the nonperformance of which will render it impossible for the other party to perform, or will frustrate the whole purpose of the contract on his part * * * he may decline to proceed in performance and sue for damages, in which case he may recover all loss occasioned by the breach, including profits he would have made if the contract had been performed." And says Sutherland (Damages, vol. 1, p. 113): "A party to a contract is entitled to recover, against the other party who violated it, damages for the profits he would have made out of it had it been performed. It is no objection to their recovery that they cannot be directly and absolutely proved. In the nature of things, the defendant having prevented such profits, direct and absolute proof is impossible." And, still further (vol. 1, pp. 117, 118), the same learned author very justly says: "Where a party has contracted to perform labor from which a profit is to spring as a direct result of the work done at a contract price, and he is prevented from earning this profit by the wrongful act of another party, the loss of this profit is a direct and natural result which the law will presume to follow the breach of the contract; and he is entitled to recover it without special allegations in his declarations. This he will be entitled to establish by showing how much less than the contract price it will cost to do the work or perform the contract." Plaintiff showed that, in the character of the soil through which he was tunneling—water-bearing soil—his profit over and above the contract price was $4.40 per foot. The court found upon evidence that there was about 1,422 feet of tunnel yet to be dug, and gave judgment for the profits upon this at the rate of $4.40 per foot. It is true that the character of the soil might have changed in that distance, and with the change in the character of the soil to nonwater-bearing, the profits of the contractor might have been decreased. It is true, also, that water in sufficient quantities might have been encountered before 1,422 feet additional had been driven, in which case, under the contract, the defendant had the right to order a cessation of the work; but as these were matters which could not be determined except by a completion of the contract, which defendant's conduct had prohibited, the court was justified in accepting the evidence, which under the circumstances was the best and most convincing that could be offered.

The judgment in L. A. No. 1,495 is therefore modified by reducing the amount allowed for extra work from $1,024 to $898.10, and in all other respects it stands affirmed. The appellant will recover its costs upon this appeal.

DARLINGTON v. BUTLER (KOHN, Intervener).

APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

The consideration of a motion to dismiss an appeal by an intervener, on the ground that he is not a party aggrieved, will be postponed, where some of the questions involved in the appeal will have to be considered in determining the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Wm. F. Bray, for appellant. Chas. A. Swisler, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an original application to dismiss the appeal pending in this court, brought here by Nathan L. Kohn, the intervener in the court below. The motion is made by the respondent upon the ground that said intervener is not a party aggrieved by the judgment and order appealed from, and that he has no right to appeal. As some of the questions involved in the appeal would have to be considered in determining this motion, we think the further consideration of the motion should be postponed, and be taken up with the appeal when it is presented.

It is therefore ordered that the determination of the motion to dismiss the appeal be postponed, to be taken up with the appeal when said appeal is presented and determined at that time.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RY. CO. v. O'DONNELL.

1. Mines and Minerals—Lode Mining Location—Actions — Findings — Construction.

Where, in an action to determine adverse interests in real property, defendant's claim to the property was based solely on a lode mining location, a finding that defendant ever since the spring of 1883 was and had been the owner and in possession of a specific portion of the disputed premises was an implied finding that the mineral location was actually made in 1883, as alleged, that the land was mineral in its character, that the claim was properly monumented, that the annual work was done thereon as provided by law and the mining regulations, and that the claim was not abandoned.

2. Appeal—Findings of Court—Conclusiveness.

Where on an appeal there is evidence in the record tending to support each of certain implied findings of the court, the facts so found are to be considered as established.

3. Mines and Minerals—Federal Right of Way Act—Map of Location—Filing—Intervening Rights.

Right of Way Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 152, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], provides for the granting of a right of way through the public lands to any railroad company, etc., and in section 4 (18 Stat. 483 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1569]) that any railroad desiring to secure the benefits of the act shall, within a certain time, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located, a profile of its road, and that, on the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior, the same shall be noted on the plats in said office, and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject thereto. Rev. St. U. S. § 2322 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1425], declares that the locators of all mining locations shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all of the surface included within the lines of their location. Held, that prior to the filing of a right of way map of definite location and the approval thereof, as provided in said section 4, the lands covered by the map were free from the right of way and subject to mineral location.

4. Same—Rights of Locators.

The rights of one entering upon the public domain and locating and working a mineral claim are of as high order as those of a settler, each of whom is in possession under rights initiated which may by the observation of precedent conditions ripen into the right to a final patent.

5. Same—Area of Location—Lines.

Where the vein within a mining claim ran in a northerly and southerly direction, and the location was crosswise of the vein, the side lines were really end lines, considering the direction of the lode on the surface, and the rights of the locators were restricted to the area within the side lines 300 feet on each side of the vein or lode.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Railway Company against Charles O'Donnell. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. J. Norton and U. T. Clotfelter, for appellant. Henry M. Willis, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action to determine adverse interests in real property. Findings and judgment in favor of defendant as to certain of the premises described, from which plaintiff appeals, as well as from an order denying a new trial.

The claim of defendant to the property is based solely upon a lode mining location. The finding of the trial court that defendant, ever since the spring of 1883, was and has been the owner of and in possession of a specific portion of the disputed premises can only be taken as impliedly finding that the mineral location was actually made in 1883, as alleged; that the land was mineral in its character; that the claim was properly monumented; that the annual work was done thereon as provided by law and the mining regulations; and that the claim was not abandoned. Trevaskis v. Peard, 111 Cal. 603, 44 Pac. 246. Evidence appears in the record tending to the support of each of such implied findings and to the general finding to the extent of the ground covered by the mineral location; and upon this appeal we must accept those facts as established.

The principal contention of appellant is that, notwithstanding the entry and location of defendant's mine, under the act of Congress known as "the right of way act," approved March 3, 1875, c. 152, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], the lands included in defendant's location were not open to mineral location, but had been previously granted to plaintiff. The first section of the right of way act provides:

"That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any railroad company duly organized under the laws of any state * * * which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proof of its organization under the same, to the extent of one hundred feet of each side of the central line of said road. Also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material, earth, stone and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad. Also ground adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side-tracks, turnouts and water stations, not to exceed in amount twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road.

"Sec. 3. That the Legislature of the proper territory may provide for the manner in which private lands and possessory claims on the public lands may be condemned," etc.

"Sec. 4. That any railroad company desiring to secure the benefits of this act, shall, within twelve months after the location of any section of twenty miles of its road, if the same be upon surveyed lands, and, if upon unsurveyed lands, within twelve months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located, a profile of its road; and upon approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior, the same shall be noted upon the plats in said office; and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass, shall be disposed of subject to such right of way. Provided, that if any section of said road shall not be completed within five years after the location of said section, the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to any such uncompleted section of said road."

Plaintiff corporation came into existence in 1882, a year preceding the mineral location of the defendant. It did not, however, procure an approval of its map of definite location by the Secretary of the Interior until December, 1885, until which date no right to select the premises in question as station grounds existed. Lilienthal v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 56 Fed. 703. The language employed in the first section of the right of way act, when used in other acts granting to specified corporations rights of way and other lands, has been uniformly held to be a grant in præsenti; and it is well settled that when the map of definite location is subsequently filed the rights of the grantee attach under the doctrine of relation at the date of the passage of the act and cuts off any and all intervening rights claimed by third parties. A different construction of the right of way act has been announced in Lilienthal v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., supra, Washington & I. R. Co. v. Osborn, 160 U. S. 103, 16 Sup. Ct. 219, 40 L. Ed. 346, and Spokane Falls & N. Ry. Co. v. Ziegler, 167 U. S. 65, 17 Sup. Ct. 728, 42 L. Ed. 79, and this different construction is made necessary by reason of the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of the right of way act, which are not found in any of the specific grant acts. It will be observed that by section 4 of the right of way act there is reserved to the United States the right to dispose of its public lands free from such right of way until a map of definite location is filed and approved; for it provides that after such filing and approval all of such lands shall be disposed of subject to such right of way. "The intention could only have been to confer the right over such public lands as were not disposed of when the roads were actually located." Radke v. W. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 39 N. W. 624. If, therefore, the lands between the termini of the road as expressed in the articles of association are subject to disposal until the route is approved, it can only be upon the theory that they still remain in part of the public domain. If they, therefore, still remain a part of such public domain, subject to sale, they must of necessity be subject to settlement and to rights of mineral location; for, that land may be open to location, three things are essential; "(1) It must be land containing valuable mineral deposits. (2) It must belong to the United States. It must be a part of the public domain at the time of the location. (3) It must be unoccupied and unappropriated by others under claim of right." Barringer & Adams on the Law of Mines and Mining, p. 197. Rights of mineral locators are possessory rights. Section 2322 of the Revised Statutes of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1425] declares that "the locators of all mining locations * * * shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all of the surface included within the lines of their location." That the doctrine of relation will not be extended to cut off settlers intermediate the passage of the act and the filing of the articles of association is determined in Washington & I. R. Co. v. Osborn, 160 U. S. 103, 16 Sup. Ct. 219, 40 L. Ed. 346, and this upon the theory that Congress would not, in authorizing railroad companies to traverse the public lands, intend thereby to give them a right to run the lines of their road at pleasure, regardless of the rights of settlers. The rights of one entering upon the public domain and locating and working a mineral claim are of as high order as those of a settler, each of whom is in possession under rights initiated which may, by the observation of precedent conditions, ripen into the right to a final patent. The mere possessory right involved in Doran v. Central Pacific R. Co., 24 Cal. 246, and Southern Pacific Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 282, 24 Pac. 1032, was held in Washington & I. R. Co. v. Osborn, supra, to be of such character as under the act of 1875, to establish an equity which would preclude the application of the doctrine of relation in so far as it affected such rights; while in the Ziegler and Lilienthal Cases, before cited, the rights of each of the claimants attached intermediate the filing of the map of definite location and the filing of the articles of association, as in this case.

We are of opinion, therefore, that to the extent of the proper area of defendant's mineral location the court properly found defendant to be the owner and in possession thereof. While, as before stated, we are of opinion that the trial court correctly found that defendant was the owner of the land embraced within his mineral location, yet in its findings and judgment specifying the area of such location the same are excessive. The court finds that the mineral claim of defendant is in the shape of a parallelogram about 1,350 feet in length east and west and 300 feet in width north and south. It is conceded that the vein or lode within defendant's claim runs in a northerly and southerly direction and the location was crosswise of the vein. This being true, the side lines are really end lines, considering the direction of the lode on the surface. Argentine Co. v. Terrible Co., 122 U. S. 485, 7 Sup. Ct. 1356, 30 L. Ed. 1140. The location is valid, but the rights of the locator are restricted to the area within the side lines 300 feet on each side of the vein or lode. It is not possible from the record to determine with sufficient exactness to warrant us in a modification of the decree where the vein or lode is actually situated.

An order will, therefore, be made reversing the judgment of the court and remanding the cause for a new trial.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

Per Curiam. In accordance with the opinion filed in this case, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

1. Abatement and Revival — Death of Plaintiff—Action for Tort—Judgment.

The death of the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries after judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial, but prior to an appeal therefrom, did not cause the action to abate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Abatement and Revival, §§ 346-348.]

2. New Trial—Proceedings.

Proceedings by an unsuccessful party to obtain a new trial are analogous to proceedings on writ of error, or appeal in the nature of a writ of error, and are, in effect, a new action brought to reverse a judgment in the trial court; and if for any reason such proceedings abate, the judgment remains in force as if the proceedings had never been brought.

3. Same—Joint Tort-Feasors — Effect of Order Granting New Trial As to One Party.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 578, providing that in an action against several tort-feasors verdict and judgment may be given in favor of plaintiff against one defendant and in favor of the other defendant, if the proofs justify the same, where a verdict was rendered against two or more joint tort-feasors, the granting of a new trial as to one of them did not vacate the verdict and judgment as to the other.

4. Torts—Joint Tort-Feasors — Parties — Severance.

The fact that plaintiff elected to sue two joint tort-feasors jointly did not preclude him from subsequently severing and electing to proceed only against one, without the consent of the other.

5. Shipping—Carriage of Passengers—Injuries—Prima Facie Negligence.

Where plaintiff, a passenger on a steamship, was injured by the breaking of a hawser which was being used to dock the vessel, the fact of injury was sufficient to establish a prima facie case of negligence against the shipowner.

6. Appeal — Findings — Conflicting Evidence—Review.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger of a steamship by being struck by a broken hawser, plaintiff testified that his head was at no time projected over the rail, and that no warning to stand back was given to him or within his hearing to the others standing about him, while other disinterested passengers, etc., testified to the contrary, there was a substantial conflict in the evidence on the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence, which precluded a reversal of a judgment for plaintiff, though the court on the record might consider the verdict greatly against the weight of the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Action by Mark Fowden against the Pacific Coast Steamship Company and others. From so much of an order as denied the motion of the steamship company for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. W. Towle, Jr., for appellant. James G. Maguire and James L. Gallagher, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. On May 15, 1898, Mark Fowden, while a passenger on defendant corporation's steamer, Santa Rosa, bound from Port Angeles, Los Angeles county, to the city and county of San Francisco, and while such steamer was docking at Santa Barbara, was severely injured by reason of the parting of a 13-inch hawser used in said docking, which had been attached to a pile on the wharf, and which parted under the strain to which it was subjected, one end thereof recoiling and striking Fowden upon his face and head. Fowden instituted this action for damages resulting from the injuries thus received, against both the steamship company, and Ezekiel Alexander, the captain commanding said steamer at the time of the accident, alleging that the hawser was broken by reason of the excessive strain to which it was subjected through the negligence of defendants in operating the steamer, and also that said hawser was worn, weak, and defective, and wholly incapable of bearing the strain to which it was subjected in the work for which it was used, and that this defective condition was known to defendants. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff against both defendants for $6,000, upon which judgment was entered. Both defendants moved for a new trial upon various grounds, and the trial court granted the motion as to defendant Alexander, and denied it as to the steamship company. The defendants appeal from so much of the order as denied the steamship company a new trial. Subsequent to the entry of judgment and the order on motion for a new trial, the plaintiff died, and Frank Fowden, special administrator of his estate, has been substituted herein.

1. It is urged that plaintiff's action being based on negligence resulting in his personal injury, his death abates the action and vacates everything done therein. Defendant thus invokes the application of the common-law rule, "actio personalis moritur cum persona," and it may be conceded that the rule applies to such a cause of action as is stated in the complaint herein, and that no change in the common-law rule material to such a cause of action has been made by statute in this state. See Harker v. Clark, 57 Cal. 245. It must, however, be held that the rule has no application under the circumstances of this case. Here, judgment upon the cause of action alleged was given and entered in favor of the plaintiff prior to his death, and this judgment has not been vacated. The pending proceeding instituted by defendants after judgment for the purpose of obtaining a new trial is, as suggested by appellants, a new statutory proceeding, collateral to the original proceeding, and having no other effect thereon, in the absence of an order granting a new trial, than to stay proceedings on the judgment if a proper stay bond be given, and to keep the action pending until the final disposition of the motion. In other words, the judgment entered is, at most, simply suspended pending the proceeding, and not vacated, and if the motion be finally denied, the judgment already entered will stand as and from the date on which it was given. Under our practice, proceedings by an unsuccessful party to obtain a new trial are analogous to proceedings on writ of error, or an appeal in the nature of a writ of error, and are, in effect, a new action brought to reverse a judgment in the lower court, and if for any reason they abate, the judgment sought to be reversed remains in force as if no such proceedings had ever been brought. The authorities are practically unanimous upon the proposition that although the cause of action is such that it would abate by the death of the plaintiff before judgment, the death of the plaintiff after judgment, and pending disposition of a writ of error or appeal in the nature of a writ of error, will not affect the judgment. As some of the cases say, the original wrong or claim is merged in the judgment, which has all the attributes of a judgment in actions ex contractu. After the giving of the judgment, the controversy is over the judgment, and not over the original wrong. The judgment is not annulled during the pendency of such controversy, but simply suspended. Kelly v. Kelly, 137 Ind. 690, 37 N. E. 545; Carr v. Rischer, 119 N. Y. 117, 23 N. E. 1,000; Kimbrough v. Mitchell, 38 Tenn. 539; Akers v. Akers, 84 Tenn. 7, 57 Am. Rep. 207; Knox v. Knox, 12 N. H. 352; Lewis v. McDaniel, 82 Mo. 577; In re First Nat. Bank (C. C.) 49 Fed. 120; Lewis v. St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co., 59 Mo. 495, 21 Am. Rep. 385; Galveston City Ry. v. Nolan, 53 Tex. 139; 5 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 794; 1 Cyc. pp. 78, 79. Where the subsequent proceedings are in the nature of what has been called a "broad appeal," having the effect of absolutely annulling the judgment and requiring a judgment de novo in the appellate or reviewing court, a different rule may logically be applied. Such must have been the reason for the decision in Faith v. Carpenter, 33 Ga. 79, where it was held that the death of the party pending appeal abated the action altogether. Of course, if the order denying a new trial be here reversed, the effect of such reversal would be to vacate the judgment, and the case would then stand in the same position as though no judgment had ever been given, in which event defendant might successfully contend that no further proceedings could be had. That however, is not a question for determination here. The case of Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 151 U. S. 673, 14 Sup. Ct. 533, 38 L. Ed. 311, cited by defendants, is not in point. There the verdict and judgment were for defendant, and the plaintiff died during the pendency of the proceedings instituted by him, to obtain a reversal and a new trial.

2. It is claimed that as the verdict was a joint verdict against both, the granting of a new trial as to one vacated the verdict and the judgment entered thereon in toto. We see no force in this contention. The rule contended for by defendants in this respect is not the law in this state. Plaintiff had the right to join as defendants all whom he may have considered participants in the alleged act of negligence, and, therefore, liable as joint tort-feasors. But this did not make his right to recover the resulting damages from one so joined, in any degree dependent upon his success as against the other. Under our Code, verdict and judgment might be given in his favor against one defendant so sued, and in favor of the other, if the proofs justified it. Code Civ. Proc., § 578. A verdict rendered against both is a finding that both participated in the negligent act, and are therefore jointly liable to the plaintiff therefor, but the verdict and judgment entered thereon are subject to review, and if on such review, it be determined that the verdict and judgment are for any reason erroneous as to one, they may be vacated as to that one only, and remain in full force as to the other. This was definitely decided by this court in Nichols v. Dunphy, 58 Cal. 605. There, verdict and judgment in an action for damages for negligence had been given against two defendants jointly sued, and one only had appealed, and as to him the judgment had been reversed. It was held that as to the other the judgment remained in full force, the court saying, "As to her, there was a valid judgment, in plaintiff's favor, unappealed from and undisturbed." And an order quashing an execution issued against said such other defendant on such judgment was reversed. This case, which is in accord with the prevailing rule in the United States, has been approvingly cited many times by this court, and completely disposes of the theory that the verdict and judgment against two or more alleged tort-feasors are entire in the sense that if they are vacated as to one, they must also necessarily fall as to the others. It is, of course, immaterial whether the vacating of the verdict as to one defendant be accomplished by a reversal of the judgment on an appeal, or by the granting of a motion for a new trial. See, also, Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, 29 Pac. 31; Grundel v. Union Iron Works et al., 127 Cal. 438, 59 Pac. 826, 47 L. R. A. 467, 78 Am. St. Rep. 75; Hubbell v. Meigs, 50 N. Y. 480; Martin v. Farrell, 66 App. Div. 179, 72 N. Y. Supp. 934; and 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, (1st Ed.) p. 676. The case of Rankin v. C. P. R. R. Co., 73 Cal. 93, 15 Pac. 57, does not assist defendants. The appeal there was by the plaintiff from a judgment in his favor against one of two defendants, and in favor of the other defendant, entered upon a verdict which was entirely silent as to such other defendant, and it was simply held that the judgment in favor of such defendant against plaintiff could not stand in the absence of a verdict to support it, and that a verdict which was silent as to a defendant was no verdict at all as to such defendant. Nor is the case of Chetwood v. California National Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 45 Pac. 704, in point. There, the cause of action alleged against three defendants was their joint neglect to perform duties collectively undertaken, as members of the executive committee of a bank, resulting in the loss to said bank of large sums of money, and there was therein no pretense of any claim of a several and separate liability upon the part of each defendant. They were negligent as a body, or not at all. A judgment was given against one defendant only, upon findings which failed to show any negligence on the part of the executive committee, or any member thereof, as such, but only showed that such defendant was individually and separately negligent in the performance of his duties as president of the bank, and it was held that this was a different cause of action from that presented by the pleadings. The case was simply one of a material variance between pleadings and proof. In the case at bar, a verdict and judgment as to one only of the defendants would, as to such defendant, be entirely consistent with the allegations of the complaint which states a complete and separate individual liability on account of the single act complained of, on the part of each defendant, and such a verdict, in the absence of objection by plaintiff as in Rankin v. C. P. R. R. Co., supra, would stand as against such defendant. Defendants apparently claim that where a plaintiff has elected to sue two joint tort-feasors jointly, there can be no subsequent severance without the consent of the defendants, or one of them, as where one moves for a new trial or takes an appeal, and the other does not, as in the case of Nichols v. Dunphy, supra. But, manifestly, this is not so, if the appellate court can, upon the appeal of both, affirm as to one and reverse as to the other, and as to this there can be no question under the authorities. When we consider the nature of the liability of two or more persons jointly engaged in the commission of a tort, it is apparent that any such wrongdoer cannot at any stage of the proceedings insist that any or all of his associates in the act shall bear with him the burden of defending against the claim of the injured party or of compensating him for the injury. There is no right of contribution among them they are all jointly and severally liable, as the injured party may elect. The injured party may sue all or any of them jointly, or each separately, or, having secured a joint judgment against all, enforce such judgment by execution against one only, the only limitation being that he can have but one satisfaction for the injury that he has received. Each of the joint tort-feasors being liable for all the damage, without regard to their different degrees of culpability, when his cause of action is satisfied as to one, it is satisfied as to all. Clearly, the granting of a new trial as to one cannot give to the other any legal ground for complaint. That the liability of defendant Alexander has not been adjudged is entirely immaterial to the steamship company.

3. While a contrary finding would have been sustained, it cannot be held that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the jury that the steamship company was guilty of negligence. We see no good reason why the general rule to the effect that the breaking or giving away of an instrumentality being used by and under the control of the carrier, is prima facie proof of the negligence, throwing the burden upon the carrier to show the absence of negligence, is not applicable to a hawser used for the purpose of docking a vessel. Ordinarily, such a hawser, of suitable size, material, and construction, in proper condition and carefully used will sustain the strain to which it is subjected, and thus serve the purpose for which it is used, and under ordinary conditions a parting thereof would reasonably indicate that it was defective or had been negligently subjected by those in charge of the steamer to an unnecessary strain. This affords the basis for the application of the rule. It is true that the conditions produced by high wind and heavy seas are sometimes such that the highest care will not be effectual to prevent such an unusual strain as will part the very best hawser that it is practicable to use, but these are not the ordinary conditions, and it devolves upon the carrier to show that the parting of the hawser was caused by circumstances over which it had no control and against which the highest degree of care would not avail. Whether such a showing was here made was a question for the jury. See McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 Pac. 324; Cody v. Market St. Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.), 82 Pac. 666, and cases there cited. We see nothing contrary to this view in The Columbia, 109 Fed. 660, 48 C. C. A. 596. While there was some evidence to the effect that the hawser was of the largest practicable size and of the best possible material and construction, it also appeared that the hawser had broken on the second trip on which it was used, under circumstances not disclosed by the testimony, within two or three feet of the second break, and had been spliced, and had been in use for the four or five months preceding the accident without any further or other test than that to which it had been subjected by its ordinary use. As suggested by respondent, there is no evidence whatever of any test or inspection of the hawser by any one from the time it first parted to the time of the accident in question.

4. It is most earnestly contended that the evidence compels the conclusion that Fowden was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury. As already stated, at the time of the accident the steamer was being docked at the wharf at Santa Barbara. The line that parted was known as the spring line, which extended from the main deck through a chock near the bow of the vessel to a pile on the wharf. Its use was to prevent the vessel going ahead, and it was 225 or 230 feet long. Fowden, a first-class passenger, was on the saloon deck, the deck above the main deck, and in a place on the land side thereof given over, under ordinary conditions, to the use of first-class passengers. This deck had a netting bulwark about 3 feet in height, topped by a rail, extending from which to the deck above, a distance of a little over 4 feet, were stanchions about 7 feet apart, the space between said stanchions being open. There were seats about 14 inches wide and 20 inches high running along the net bulwark. Fowden was near the seventh stanchion, and, according to his own testimony, standing upright there, with his hands behind him. The spring line parted somewhere between the sixth and eighth or ninth stanchions, and one end thereof flew up and hit him on the lower part of the head with great force. The claim of defendants was that the hawser in its recoil did not reach the space within the rail at all, but that Fowden at this time was leaning over the rail with his head projected thereover, and that he maintained this position in disregard of the warnings of the servants of the company. The trial court instructed the jury, in effect, that if Fowden was standing with his head projecting over the rail of the steamer, and was warned by the servants of defendants that his position was a dangerous one, and in disregard of such warning maintained such position to the time of the accident, and was there injured, his act in maintaining such position was contributory negligence, and their verdict must be for the defendants. We are satisfied that the evidence was such as to warrant the jury in concluding that Fowden was not guilty of negligence in simply standing near the rail, if he was not warned of the possible danger. The question, then, is as to whether he was leaning over the rail with his head projected thereover, and maintained this position, despite warning to stand back. The jury by their verdict have answered this question in the negative. Was there sufficient evidence to sustain their finding?

According to the record before us, the testimony of the many persons who claimed to be eyewitnesses was contrary to this conclusion of the jury. Several apparently disinterested passengers testified that Fowden's head was projected over the rail, that the passengers were warned by employés of defendant steamship company to stand back and told that there was danger, and some testified that Fowden maintaining his position, and several employés testified to the giving of the warning, some testifying that they personally warned Fowden himself, and that he declined to move. No person testified to the contrary except Fowden himself, but he was very positive in his testimony that his head was at no time projected over the rail, and that no warning was given to him, or within his hearing, to the others to stand back. In the face of this positive testimony on the part of Fowden, can it be said that there was not a substantial conflict in the evidence? While the record produces in our minds the opinion that the verdict of the jury was against the great weight of evidence of the eye witnesses, we are satisfied that this question must be answered in the negative. Leaving out of view, for the moment, the evidence of defendants' witnesses above referred to, there was, under the circumstances of this case, nothing in this testimony of Fowden that was so inherently improbable as to compel the conclusion that it was unworthy of belief. It certainly cannot be held that his injuries were of such a nature that they could have been inflicted only while his head was projected over the rail. Nor can it be held that the end of the hawser could not have recoiled to a place within the rail. Although such a thing was not shown to have happened before in the personal experience of two of the defendant's witnesses, no reason is apparent why it might not so happen, and the evidence of defendants as to the custom of warning passengers back from the rail would indicate an anticipation of just such a contingency. The evidence of two witnesses that the end of the line did not come aboard on this occasion was not such as to legally compel a conclusion to that effect by the jury. The situation, then, is that the evidence of Fowden upon these points can be said to be improbable only because a large number of witnesses testify to the contrary, but this does not reduce such evidence to "a mere semblance or pretense of evidence," insufficient to support a verdict. Taken in connection with the undisputed facts, it was not so inherently improbable as to be unworthy of belief, and to justify the court in ignoring it. As the direct evidence of one witness who is entitled to full credit is sufficient for proof of any fact, except perjury and treason (Code Civ. Proc. § 1844), such evidence is necessarily sufficient to create a substantial conflict, regardless of the number of witnesses who testify to the contrary. The mere number of witnesses on one side or the other is immaterial in this connection. The law requires the jury to be instructed by the court on all proper occasions that they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, against a less number or against a presumption of other evidence satisfying their minds. Code Civ. Proc., § 2061, subd. 2. Apparently recognizing this, learned counsel for defendants contends that Fowden was not a witness entitled to full credit within the meaning of section 1844, Code Civ. Proc., by reason of the nature of the injuries he received and the manner in which he was contradicted by other witnesses. But if he was competent to testify as a witness at all, as to which there can be no question, the question as to the amount of credit to which his evidence was entitled was for the jury alone to determine. Under our system, the jury or trial judge sitting in place of a jury, are the exclusive judges of the credibility of a witness. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847 and 2061, subd. 1. His interest in the result of a case, his physical and mental conditions for some time immediately following the accident, the strong likelihood of his testimony being incorrect upon the point as to whether other persons were standing near him upon the deck at the time of the accident, and the contradictory evidence, were all to be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the amount of credibility given to his testimony, but the ultimate question as to credibility was exclusively for them. If they determined as a fact that his testimony was entitled to full credit, which they must here be held to have done, that finding is conclusive upon us.

The question in the case of County of Sonoma v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32-37, 57 Pac. 681, relied on by defendants, was not the question here presented. There, the trial judge had found against the story of a county treasurer, who was alleged to have converted county funds to his own use, and who testified that he had been robbed. There was no direct evidence opposed to this, but the surrounding circumstances were such as to make the story very improbable, and the trial judge found against it. It was in affirming this judgment that this court said "that the evidence of the defendant so situated does not, as a matter of legal compulsion, command this full credit." There, as here, it was for the jury or trial judge to determine what credit should be given the evidence, and if the judgment had been the other way, doubtless it would have been affirmed on appeal. We find nothing in the other cases cited by defendants that is in conflict with the views herein expressed. It may be admitted that in some cases testimony may, in the light of the undisputed facts, be inherently so improbable and impossible of belief as to, in effect, constitute no evidence at all, and that in other cases alleged testimony may consist of only one or two general statements made in such a way as to render it no more than a mere semblance or pretense of evidence. Such, however, is not the situation in the case at bar. It being determined that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the question of contributory negligence, it must be conceded that this court cannot disturb the finding of the jury thereon, and the approval thereof by the trial court, evidenced by its order denying a new trial. It is the firmly settled law of the state that this court will not disturb the ruling of the court below on a motion for a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence if there be a substantial conflict in the evidence, even though this court may, upon the record, consider the verdict greatly against the weight of the evidence. It is needless to cite authorities to sustain this well-recognized proposition. Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, however much the evidence may preponderate against the verdict, the sole remedy of the aggrieved party is his application to the trial judge for a new trial. It is the duty of the trial judge, who has heard the evidence and had ample opportunity to judge as to the amount of credit to be given to the various witnesses, to grant a new trial when he is of the opinion that the verdict is clearly against the weight of evidence, notwithstanding that there is a substantial conflict therein. No such power exists in this court. It may be that trial courts are sometimes too reluctant to exercise their power of granting a new trial in a proper case, and too much inclined to acquiesce in the verdicts which are clearly against the weight of evidence. See Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 102, 78 Pac. 337. This, however, cannot give the power to this court in a case where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence. The final responsibility must rest where it is placed by the well-settled law, viz., with the trial court.

5. There is no other point requiring discussion. The verdict cannot be held to be in violation of any instruction given by the court to the jury. There was no error as to defendant steamship company in the instructions given to the jury. Upon the facts shown by the record, we cannot say that the damages awarded were excessive. We see no legal ground upon which the action of the court below in denying a new trial as to the steamship company can be disturbed.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

In re DAVIS' ESTATE. (S. F. 4,316.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1906.)

1. Wills — Probate — Collateral Attack— Nature of Proceedings.

An answer and petition in response to a petition for the distribution of an estate, accompanying the final account of the administrator, which alleges that the will under which distribution is demanded is a forgery, and that the probate of the same was fraudulently procured, collaterally attacks the judgment admitting the will to probate.

2. Judgment—Collateral Attack—Matters Available.

In a collateral attack on a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, the judgment can be impeached only for a want of jurisdiction appearing on the face of the judgment roll.

3. Wills—Probate—Collateral Attack.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1306, provides for the hearing of testimony in proof of a will sought to be probated at the time appointed for the hearing or the time to which the hearing may have been postponed. The record in proceedings for the probate of a will showed that a petition for probate was filed; that the clerk's notice fixed a specified date as the time for proving the will, which notice was published as required by law; that subsequently the court made an order, which, after reciting that the petition came on regularly for hearing and that it had been proved that notice had been given as required by law, admitted the will to probate. It did not affirmatively appear from the recitals that the hearing had been continued by the court; neither did it appear that it had not been. Held, that in a collateral attack on the judgment it would be presumed that orders continuing the hearing had been regularly made.

4. Constitutional Law—Due Process of Law.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1303, providing that a will may be probated on 10 days' notice, is not unconstitutional as depriving one of his property without due process of law, when applied to a nonresident so situated as not to receive notice in time to enable him to appear and oppose the probate on the day set for the hearing.

5. Judgment—Collateral Attack — Fraud in Selection of Jury.

In a collateral attack on a judgment, the judgment cannot be set aside for fraud in the procuring of a jury; the alleged fraud not appearing on the face of the judgment roll.

6. Constitutional Law—Due Process of Law—Course of Trial.

A person filing an answer and petition in response to a petition for the distribution of an estate pursuant to the terms of a will duly admitted to probate, praying for the setting aside of the judgment of probate, is not deprived of a hearing by striking out the answer and petition after a hearing on a motion therefor.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Jacob Z. Davis, deceased. From a judgment striking out the answer and petition of Laura E. Tracy and others, made in response to a petition for distribution accompanying the final account of the administrator, Laura E. Tracy and others appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Baggett, F. H. Gould, and Horace W. Philbrook, for appellants. Campbell, Metson & Campbell (Thomas H. Breeze, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Appeal from decree of settlement of final account and final distribution. Jacob Z. Davis died on October 28, 1896. On November 16, 1896, Lizzie Muir and Belle Curtis presented to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco a paper purporting to be the olographic will of said Davis, and filed a petition praying for its admission to probate. The document bore date October 1, 1896, and by its terms purported to give and bequeath all of Davis' property to the petitioners, Lizzie Muir and Belle Curtis. On the filing of the petition, the clerk fixed Monday, the 30th day of November, 1896, and the courtroom of said superior court as the time and place for proving the will, and for hearing the application for letters. The notice was duly published as required by section 1303, Code Civ. Proc. On November 30, 1896, Joseph P. Wilson and Catherine Stead, claiming to be heirs of said decedent, appeared and filed an opposition to the probate of the alleged will on various grounds. On May 15, 1897, Elizabeth Wilson, also claiming to be an heir, filed her opposition to the probate. The petitioners filed answers to both oppositions. While other grounds of opposition were pleaded, the real point raised by those opposing the probate was that the alleged will was a forgery. A trial was had before a jury, which on August 16, 1897, returned a verdict in favor of the genuineness of the document, and thereupon an order was made by the court admitting the said paper to probate, and directing the issuance to Lizzie Muir and Belle Curtis of letters of administration with the will annexed. On April 8, 1898, the superior court made a decree of partial distribution, distributing to Lizzie Muir and Belle Curtis the sum of $15,000. On June 23, 1898, the order admitting the will to probate and the decree of partial distribution, appeals from which had been taken, were by this court affirmed. On the same day a petition to revoke the probate filed by Catherine Stead, Joseph P. Wilson, Elizabeth V. Wilson and her four children, were dismissed and denied. The affirmances of the order and decree appealed from and the dismissal of the contest were made by the consent of all parties who had then appeared, a compromise having been effected as between them. On September 7, 1900, Laura E. Tracy, claiming to be a niece of the decedent, filed a contest and petition for revocation of the probate of the will. She had not been a party to the oppositions and contests above mentioned, and had in no way theretofore appeared in the proceedings relating to the probate of the administration of the estate. Her petition alleged, in substance, that at the time of Davis' death, October 28, 1896, she (the petitioner) was living in the republic of Hawaii, then a foreign country, and had no knowledge of the fact that her uncle had been residing in San Francisco, or of his death, or of the probate proceedings, until after September 15, 1899; that soon thereafter she discovered these facts, and, further, that the document admitted to probate was not the will of Davis, but was a forgery, executed by some person or persons pursuant to a conspiracy entered into between Lizzie Muir, Belle Curtis and others for the purpose of gaining possession of Davis' estate. She further alleged that in execution of this conspiracy the paper was offered for probate, and that upon the trial of the oppositions filed by Joseph P. and Elizabeth Wilson and Catherine Stead, the conspirators fraudulently procured names of three persons not regularly drawn to be included in the panel of jurors selected for the trial of the oppositions; that these three persons, so chosen by themselves, were accepted and served as members of the jury, and that by their efforts, and in consequence of perjured testimony offered on behalf of the proponents, a verdict was returned by nine of the jurors including the three fraudulently serving, finding the paper to have been entirely written, signed and dated by the hand of Jacob Z. Davis. Upon demurrer by the administratrices and beneficiaries, the petition was dismissed. Laura E. Tracy, the petitioner, appealed from the order dismissing her contest, and on June 20, 1902, this court affirmed the order appealed from. Estate of Davis, 136 Cal. 590, 69 Pac. 412. On April 20, 1904, the administratrices filed their final account, accompanied by a petition for distribution. Upon the hearing of the petition Laura E. Tracy, and the parties to the contest of June 22, 1898 (comprising all the parties who had originally opposed the probate of the will or contested it after probate) appeared and filed an answer to the petition, and a petition for distribution to themselves. In their pleading, in addition to allegations showing them to be heirs of the decedent, they repeated substantially the allegations of the petition of Laura E. Tracy for revocation of probate. The administratrices moved that the answer and petition be stricken from the files of the court upon the ground that a will had been admitted to probate under which they were sole legatees and devisees. The court, taking judicial notice of and considering the prior proceedings in the estate, as above enumerated, granted the motion, and, declining to permit the said alleged heirs to be heard or to participate in the proceedings, made its decree settling the final account and distributing the residue of the estate remaining in the hands of the administratrices to Lizzie Muir and Belle Curtis. It is from this decree that the present appeal is taken.

It is plain that if the probate of the alleged will of Jacob Z. Davis was regular, and if such probate was conclusive upon the appellants, the respondents are the only parties entitled to share in the distribution of the estate, and the appellants have no interest in such estate. The position of the appellants is therefore that the attempted admission to probate of the paper (which, as they allege, was a forgery) was fraudulent; that, apart from any fraud, the order admitting the will to probate was without jurisdiction and void for want of notice to the appellant Tracy, and that they are entitled to raise these objections on this proceeding for distribution. It may be well at this point to consider the nature of the attack so made on the probate of the will. Is it direct or collateral? The proceeding for probate had terminated some six years before, in an order admitting the alleged will to probate. The attack now under discussion was made in response to a petition for distribution, a proceeding not having for its purpose the probate of the will, but entirely distinct in its scope. It is true that both proceedings, the petition for probate and the petition for distribution, related to the same estate. But the procedure of this state contemplates, in the administration of the estates of deceased persons, a series of different proceedings, each of which is, as to the matters embraced within its purview, separate. And an adjudication as to each step in this series is intended to be final in its nature, and not subject to review in a subsequent stage of the administration of the estate. Thus, an order appointing an administrator may be appealed from (Code Civ. Proc. § 963), or may be revoked on petition in certain instances (Code Civ. Proc. § 1383). But it cannot be said that an attack on an order appointing an administrator should, after the lapse of the time for appeal, be termed direct merely because made in some proceeding connected with the administration of the same estate, for example, on the settlement of an account, or an application for confirmation of a sale of real estate. So with other proceedings in the course of the administration of an estate, where the order or judgment made is appealable, such as orders admitting wills to probate, orders settling accounts of administrators or executors, or the like. Each can be attacked directly by appeal, or by some motion authorized by law for the purpose, or, perhaps, by bill in equity, but an attack made in a different proceeding in the same estate would clearly be collateral. Thus, in Estate of Devincenzi, 119 Cal. 498, 51 Pac. 845, it was held that an objection to a confirmation of sale of real estate on the ground that the administrator's petition for the order of sale was defective, was a collateral attack upon the order of sale. In principle, the present case does not differ from the one cited. While the opposition of appellants contained a prayer that the order admitting the will to probate be annulled and set aside, this was a mere incident of the relief sought in the proceeding for distribution, and the attack on the probate cannot be regarded as direct. The cases cited by appellants, in which this court held that a motion to set aside a judgment as void was a direct, and not a collateral, attack (People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 16 Pac. 197, 5 Am. St. Rep. 448; People v. Pearson, 76 Cal. 400, 18 Pac. 424; Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 395, 24 Pac. 1089, 21 Am. St. Rep. 52), were all cases where the motion was made in the case in which the judgment had been rendered by a party appearing for that purpose, not, as here, where the setting aside of the judgment complained of was merely a part of the relief sought in a different proceeding. In the case at bar the distinction between direct and collateral attack is important in view of the settled rule that in a collateral attack upon a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, the judgment can be impeached only for a want of jurisdiction appearing upon the face of the judgment roll; or, as sometimes stated, on collateral attack only a judgment which is void on its face may be set aside. People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 571, 36 Pac. 9; In re Eichoff's Estate, 101 Cal. 600, 36 Pac. 11.

This brings us to a consideration of the objections urged against the order in question.

First. It is claimed that the order admitting the will to probate was void as to the appellant Tracy, who had not appeared, for the reason that the hearing was not had on the day specified in the original notice, and the record does not show any order or orders continuing the hearing to the time, some eight months later, when the alleged will actually came up for proof. Section 1306, Code Civ. Proc., provides for the hearing of testimony in proof of the will "at the time appointed for the hearing, or the time to which the hearing may have been postponed." It is argued that if the proof be not heard at the time specified in the notice, and no order is made continuing the hearing to some other time, a discontinuance results, and a new notice must be given in order to vest the court with jurisdiction to entertain the petition. This court has held in Estate of Warfield, 22 Cal. 51, 83 Am. Dec. 49, that, where a notice of time and place of probating a will was given, the failure to adjourn the hearing from the time fixed in the notice to a later day, when the matter was in fact taken up, was, "at most, an irregularity, occurring after jurisdiction had been acquired." We see no reason for departing from the rule so declared, but even if the defect complained of were to be regarded as jurisdictional, we could, on this collateral attack, look only to the record, which does not show affirmatively that the hearing was not regularly considered by the superior court when dealing with probate matters, is to be considered a court of general jurisdiction, and the same presumptions attach to its acts, as in any other action or proceeding over which it has jurisdiction. Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 Pac. 458. The record here shows that a petition for probate of will was filed, that the clerk's notice fixing November 30, 1896, as the time for proving the will was published as required by law, that on August 17, 1897, the court made an order which, after reciting that the petition came on regularly for hearing, and that it had been proved that notice had been given as required by law, admitted the will to probate. It does not appear affirmatively, apart from these recitals, that the hearing was continued from March 30, 1896, by the court; neither does it appear that it was not. The presumption is that everything was done that was necessary to sustain the action of the court. "The rule in this respect is that where the record recites that which was done nothing to the contrary may be presumed; but where the record is silent the presumption is that that was done which was requisite to sustain the jurisdiction." Estate of Twombley, 120 Cal. 350, 52 Pac. 815. We find no provision in our statutes indicating that any orders continuing the hearing form a necessary part of the judgment roll, or "technical record." But even if they do, their absence would not invalidate the order admitting the will to probate. At most, the record is silent on the question of whether such orders were made, and in the case of a court of general jurisdiction, when a judgment "comes in question collaterally, service will be presumed when the record is silent." (Vanfleet Coll. Att. § 830.) If, as contended by appellants, such orders form a part of the notice to which parties interested are entitled, the recitals in the order admitting the will to probate, that the petition came on regularly for hearing, and that notice had been given "as required by law," are sufficient to justify the presumption that such orders were made, where the contrary does not affirmatively appear from the record. People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651; Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, 146 Cal. 745, 81 Pac. 138. This case does not come within the rule that, where a service appearing in the record is insufficient, it will not be presumed that any different and other service was made. This rule "has no application where the record does not purport to show all that was done, and the judgment states that all that was necessary to be done was done." Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, supra.

Second. It is urged that inasmuch as Laura E. Tracy was at the time of Davis' death domiciled in the republic of Hawaii, and as the then existing means of communication between said republic and this state rendered it impossible for her to have seen the published notice in time to enable her to appear and oppose the probate on the day set for the hearing, there was in fact no notice to her, and the statute fixing the time for publication (Code Civ. Proc. § 1303) is, as to nonresident heirs so situated, unconstitutional in that it deprives them of their property without due process of law. The same proposition was urged by the appellant Tracy on her appeal from the order dismissing her petition to revoke the probate of the will. In affirming the order this court said (136 Cal. 596, 69 Pac. 414): "It is next asserted that the statute providing for constructive notice is unconstitutional in this, that the 10 days herein provided is too short to serve as constructive notice to the world, and that the period of time being so short therefore the statute is unreasonable, and consequently void. As before suggested, the proceeding as to the probate of a will is essentially one in rem, and in the very nature of things the state is allowed a wide latitude in determining the character of the constructive notice to be given to the world in a proceeding where it has absolute possession of the res. It would be an exceptional case where a court would declare a statute void, as depriving a party of his property without due process of law, the proceeding being strictly in rem, and the res within the state, upon the ground that the constructive notice prescribed by the statute was unreasonably short. It would seem that very few cases of that kind could be found in the books. Certainly this is not one of them. Public policy demands that a will shall have a speedy probate, and the Legislature, recognizing that fact, has given the heir, by express enactment, one year after probate has been decreed within which time he may attack the will. His rights are in no way concluded by the dercee of probate. He has an entire year thereafter in which to attack the will, and he may attack it upon the same grounds and for the same reasons that he could attack it prior to its probate. Even the measure of evidence demanded of him for a successful attack is no different in the two cases. It is thus apparent that in such a case as the one presented here due process of law was in no degree denied Laura Tracy upon the hearing." We have no disposition to depart from the rule there laid down. The point was elaborately argued and carefully considered. Whether or not this be a proper case for applying the doctrine of "res adjudicata" or that of the "law of the case," we are satisfied with the conclusion reached, and adhere to it.

Third. The contention that the order should be set aside for fraud in the procuring of a jury may be answered briefly in view of our determination that the attack is collateral. It is well settled, as hereinbefore stated, that upon such attack only the jurisdiction of the court can be inquired into, and, as to jurisdiction, only such defects as appear on the face of the judgment roll. Of course, the alleged fraud does not so appear. Whether the appellants could avail themselves of this ground of attack in a suit in equity to set aside the probate is another question (see State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 234, 81 Am. Dec. 118; Langdon v. Blackburn, 109 Cal. 19, 41 Pac. 814) which need not be decided here, since this does not purport to be such a proceeding. It follows that the trial court rightly held that, on this petition for distribution, the probate of the will was conclusive on all parties. Necessarily, then, the persons claiming to be heirs had no interest in the proceeding, since they were not beneficiaries under the will. It is claimed that they were deprived of a hearing by the striking out of their pleading. But they were heard on the question of whether or not their pleading should be stricken out, and this involved the essential point in controversy; i. e., whether, assuming the truth of all facts alleged by them, they were in a position to attack the probate of the will. If they were not in such position, they had no standing to oppose the distribution sought, and were not injured by the striking out of their opposition and petition for distribution to themselves. The effect of the order was the same as that of an order sustaining a demurrer, without leave to amend. We do not think the case comes within the principle of Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 280, 23 L. Ed. 914, and McVeigh v. U. S., 11 Wall. (U. S.) 266, 20 L. Ed. 80, cited by appellants. There a defendant's answer had been stricken out and his default entered for some reason collateral to the merits of the action. Here the pleading is stricken out because, on the face of the record, it appears that the appellants are not parties entitled to resist respondents' petition, and are not, on their own showing, entitled to have any affirmative relief on their own petition. It cannot be said that the appellants were, in any substantial sense, denied a hearing, when they were fully heard on the only question involved, viz., their interest in the estate. The language of the court in Grigg v. Dalsheimer, 88 Va. 508, 13 S. E. 993, is applicable, viz.: "They, however, had their day in court, and they were not arbitrarily put out of court, and denied an opportunity to make defense, as was the defendant in the celebrated McVeigh Case."

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

149 Cal. 253

PEOPLE v. MAUGHS (Cr. 1,297.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1906.)

1. Homicide—Self-Defense—Evidence—Instructions.

Where, on a trial for homicide, the testimony of the state showed that defendant shot decedent under no more provocation than that excited by words of personal abuse, and the testimony of defendant showed that he in self-defense shot decedent, a young and vigorous man, his physical superior, who was making a deadly assault upon him with a deadly weapon, an instruction that no man has a right to kill another in self-defense, unless the same is real or apparently necessary for such defense, and that, before a person can justify taking the life of another, he must, when attacked, employ all reasonable means within his power consistent with his safety to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing, was erroneous, as failing to state the right of defendant to stand his ground as against his duty to retreat.

2. Criminal Law — Instructions — Contradictory Instructions.

An erroneous instruction in a criminal case is not cured by the giving of a correct instruction; the result serving to confuse the jury and to render it impossible to determine whether they followed the correct or incorrect instruction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1994.]

3. Same—Applicability to Evidence.

Where, on a trial for homicide, there was no evidence touching pursuit or any struggle or combat in which either decedent or accused sought to retreat, instructions that one may pursue and slay his adversary where the pursuit is not for revenge, nor after the necessity for the defense had ceased, but must be prosecuted in good faith to the end of winning his safety, and that it must appear that accused, if he were the aggressor, not only in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle and to escape from his assailant before the fatal blow was given, etc., was erroneous, because leading the jury to believe that the court found evidence of pursuit or of a declination to engage in further combat.

4. Same—Presumption of Innocence—Instructions.

An instruction that, for the purpose of the trial and before any evidence is heard, a presumption of the innocence of the accused arises, and that, independent of evidence, accused is presumed to be innocent, which presumption attends him throughout the trial, does not comply with Pen. Code, § 1096, declaring that a defendant in a criminal case is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved.

5. Homicide—Murder in Second Degree—Instructions.

An instruction on a trial for homicide, defining murder in the second degree, is sufficiently explicit when it adopts the definition given in Pen. Code, § 189.

6. Criminal Law — Instructions — Weight of Evidence.

An instruction that, where defendant offers himself as a witness, in determining his credibility, it is proper to consider the consequences and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation, is reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1896.]

7. Homicide—Murder—Instructions.

An instruction, on a trial for homicide, that it is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of the will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer, and, if such is the case, the killing is murder in the first degree, is erroneous, as the killing must be the result of the concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation.

8. Same—Manslaughter—Instructions.

An instruction defining manslaughter should follow the language of Pen. Code, § 192, defining manslaughter, and an instruction defining manslaughter as a voluntary killing upon sudden quarrel and heat of passion, is erroneous as calling for the concurrence of sudden quarrel and heat of passion.

9. Criminal Law — Trial — Instructions — Reading of Information.

It is not error to read the information in the opening of the instructions.

10. Same—Evidence—Evidence of Models.

On a trial for homicide, a structure built as nearly as might be in duplicate of a porch on which decedent was standing when shot was erected in the courtroom, visible to the jury during its impanelment, and afterwards admitted in evidence. Held not prejudicial to accused, for, under Pen. Code, § 1102, providing that the rules of evidence in civil actions shall be applicable to criminal actions, the structure was admissible in evidence.

11. SAME—CUSTODY OF JURY.

Where, on a trial for homicide, the court had exercised the discretion conferred by Pen. Code, § 1121, by ordering the jury to remain in the custody of the sheriff during the trial, it was error to permit the jurors to separate during the progress of the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2039–2045.]

12. SAME — EVIDENCE — PHOTOGRAPHS — ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for homicide, the court admitted a picture of the porch on which decedent was standing at the time he was killed, with a man lying in the assumed position in which decedent's body was found. It was not a photograph of decedent's body when found, and neither the man who took the photograph nor the man who represented the dead body ever saw the body of decedent on the porch. Held, that the admission of the photograph was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 893.]

13. SAME—ADMONITION TO JURY—RECORD.

The record in a criminal case should disclose the fact that the court at each adjournment admonished the jury, as required by Pen. Code, § 1122.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Richard B. Maughs was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. Knox and B. F. Fowler, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant, charged with the murder of one Charles Zander, was found guilty and the death penalty imposed. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Zander and B. E. Cole were working a ranch in partnership. Defendant, a man between 55 and 60 years of age, was in their employ as a "handy man" to cook, take care of the chickens, mend fences, and do other "odd jobs." The two partners, upon the morning of the homicide, had ridden out from the ranch to look after and repair the fences, leaving defendant alone at the ranch house. At about 11 o'clock in the morning Cole returned, and with him came one Edward Gallagher, a wood chopper, who lived about a mile from the ranch house. Cole had come back for a hammer and some staples with which to repair a broken fence, and went away immediately, leaving Gallagher with the defendant. Cole joined Zander, and while the two were repairing a piece of broken fence, Leo Green, a neighbor, rode up and said that he had told Maughs about that break in the fence two or three days before, and Zander replied, "The lazy damn son of a bitch, why didn't he fix it up?" About noon Zander and Cole returned to the house. They put their horses in the stable. and Zander then walked rapidly up to the house and entered it, while Cole remained in the vacant lot near the barn. Zander was flushed and irritated. He asked the defendant why he had not fixed the fence that Leo Green had told him about days before, and defendant replied that he had fixed it. He asked him why in the devil he did not get those cattle out of the horse pasture, and, at the end of defendant's explanations and denials, said: "You ain't doing a damn thing around here. You ain't doing any work at all like you ought to. The best thing I can do with you is to break your damn neck." He turned away down the walk which led to the gate and went half way there and turned and said: "Maughs, the best thing you can do, is to roll your blankets and get off this ranch," to which the defendant replied, "All right, I can do that." Defendant then (according to his own account), worrying over the excited and angry tone and manner of the deceased and fearful of bodily harm at his hands (for the deceased was a very strong, vigorous young man weighing about 165 pounds, while the defendant was a much older man and partially crippled), went into the room, where were many rifles and other weapons, and put his own pistol in his pocket. Deceased, who had gone over to the smokehouse a short distance away, soon returned to the house and renewed his altercation with defendant (this is still the defendant's account), abusing him, charging him with remissness in his work, and with general worthlessness, ending up by saying, "You are a damn Missouri lying son of a bitch," to which defendant replied: "Now cut that part out; that 'lying son of a bitch' part. Just cut that part out, for it is a damn lie. You can accuse me of being trifling, but I am not a son of a bitch." The deceased then walked out of the sitting room into the kitchen, near where the defendant was at work getting dinner, with a knife in his hand, and said to defendant: "I ought to cut your God damn throat." Defendant made no reply to this, and deceased, continuing his abuse, walked out upon the rear porch. The defendant, not hearing him, supposed that he had gone to the smokehouse again. Picking up some potato peelings, he started to the door to throw them into the slop bucket. Reaching the door, he took one step down onto the porch, which was about six inches lower than the kitchen floor, and then saw the deceased at the sink, which was on the porch, about five feet from the doorway. As defendant took this step to the porch, deceased turned toward him with his knife in his hand, gritted his teeth, and said to defendant, "You damn son of a bitch," to which defendant answered, "I told you a while ago that was a lie." Deceased replied, "I will cut your damn throat," and with that rushed at the defendant with the knife in his left hand and his right hand raised. Defendant tried to get back, but stumbled, and as the deceased was upon him, drew his pistol and fired without taking aim. The shot struck the deceased under the right eye, going through the jawbone upward to the back part of the head. He fell back on the porch, and death was instantaneous.

Such is defendant's account of the fatal affray. At the time of the shooting, and at the time the deceased returned to the house for the last time, Cole and Gallagher were sitting in the outer lot on a wagon tongue, about 110 feet distant. Between them and the back porch where the shooting occurred were two chicken fences. Part of the side of the porch intervening between where Cole and Gallagher were sitting and the place of the shooting was covered with trellis work, and a thick vine extended from the floor to the top of the porch. Cole and Gallagher were sitting about 40 feet to the right of the porch and upon an incline which was some 3 or 4 feet lower than the ground at the house. The fences were 6 feet high, and the pickets were close together, made so as to keep the chickens out of the garden. Cole was sitting upon the wagon tongue about 3 feet from where Gallagher was sitting and more directly facing the house. Gallagher says that he was paying no particular attention, and could not see nor hear what was going on at the house, and that his attention was first drawn to the house by the pistol shot. Cole says that he was interested in what was going on at the house and could see and hear from where he sat. Cole's account is that there was a pump on the porch by the sink; that Zander had gone onto the porch, went to the pump, and took hold of the handle of it and worked it up and down; that there is no doubt but what the two men were angry, and from the tone of Zander's voice he was very much irritated: that he heard Maughs go into the kitchen from the sitting room, and before he got to the door he said he was getting damn tired of this noise, he had heard enough of it, "and he says, 'Let this be your last words,' and shot." Zander was then telling him that he didn't see why he couldn't find a hole in the fence that had taken him but two minutes to find after he had got there, but he didn't quite finish that sentence until he was killed. "I could see Zander standing on the porch. I could not see his legs, but saw him from the waist up. I noticed the position of his hands while he was there at the pump. I saw him put the cup to his mouth with his right hand, and had the pump handle in his left. Zander's position when he was shot was he turned around facing, or not exactly facing Maughs, but he was looking in the door. His body was not quite turned square with the door. I should judge he was about 3½ or 4 feet from the door, something like that. I did not see him make any move to the door or raise either hand, and I suppose I would have seen him if he had done so. After the first shot was fired I heard Zander hit the door. I did not see him fall, as I had just dropped my eyes off of him; but as soon as the shot was fired I raised my eyes and he was not there, and in the interim though I heard him fall." After hearing this shot Cole promptly went to the barn, mounted his horse, and rode off. The testimony of Gallagher serves in some respect to discredit that of Cole. Cole says that he was an actual eyewitness, saw the defendant murder Zander, saw the shot fired, and heard Zander's body fall. Gallagher who was also an employé on the ranch, says that, sitting upon the wagon tongue, he was talking to Cole; that he heard the men talking at the house, but did not understand or try to understand what was going on. Pretty soon he heard a pistol shot, "and Cole jumped off the tongue and told him to run to the house and see if he shot him, and he would go to French's." It is a little surprising, if Cole had actually seen what he testifies to, that he should have sent Gallagher to the house to see what occurred. Cole admits to differences and a prejudice against the defendant antedating the shooting. There had, however, been no difficulty between the defendant and Zander prior to the day of the homicide. Cole hastily mounted his horse and left the ranch, in manifest fear of the defendant, and it is in evidence that he said he had told Zander that neither of them "had better bother or crowd Maughs too much, or egg him on; that he might shoot." As Cole turned to go to the barn, Gallagher walked toward the house and stopped and stood when within 80 feet of it. He could hear nothing. He then turned back to the wagon and stood there a little while, when he heard two shots in quick succession, and, looking up, saw Maughs standing on the step of the porch. Maughs spoke to Gallagher, asking him if he had seen a hawk; that one had flown that way. Gallagher replied, "No," and walked away from the house up on a neighboring hillside. He remained there about 10 minutes, when he saw Maughs leaving the house. Maughs went to the barn and took a horse, rode off, and surrendered himself to the peace officer. Gallagher then returned to the house and found the dead body of Zander lying on the porch, with its head against the wall under the sink, and an open pocketknife with a large blade about four inches from his left hand. On the ground, about two feet from the edge of the porch, was lying a drinking cup. This drinking cup, however, Gallagher had not noticed until after several other witnesses had arrived, and one of them had pointed it out. The two shots, which both Gallagher and Cole heard fired in quick succession, were explained by the defendant. He says that after having shot Zander he feared an attack from Cole, went into the gunroom, took down a repeating rifle with which to defend himself, and in the haste and excitement of loading it was twice accidently discharged, the shots piercing the ceiling of the room. Such was undoubtedly the truth, as the two new bullet holes were there discovered.

It has been necessary thus to set forth at length the conflicting stories of the defendant and of the prosecution's chief witness for the proper understanding of the rulings of the court, and also as showing the importance to the defendant of correct instructions upon the law of self-defense, and his right to have the jury properly charged thereon. By the testimony of Cole, the defendant shot down Zander under no more provocation than that excited by a wordy wrangle and words of personal abuse. By the testimony of the defendant he shot, in self-defense, a young and vigorous man, his physical superior, who was making a deadly assault upon him with a lethal weapon. The court instructed the jury as follows: "No man has a right to kill another in self-defense unless such killing is real or apparently necessary for such defense. Before a person can justify taking the life of a human being on the ground of self-defense he must, when attacked, employ all reasonable means within his power, consistent with his safety, to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing." This instruction is taken from Sackett's Instructions to Juries (2d Ed.) p. 707. In support of it is cited Judge v. State, 58 Ala. 406, 413, 29 Am. Rep. 757. There the Supreme Court of Alabama says: "We are pleased to observe that in this case the old, sound, and much disregarded doctrine that no man stands excused for the taking of human life, if with safety to his own person he could have avoided or retired from the combat, has been given in the charge and must have been acted upon by the jury." In People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 467, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403, this court had occasion to consider the right of a defendant to stand his ground, as against his duty to retreat, and it was there said that there was a contrariety of opinion upon the part of writers of common law upon this subject, and that this difference had found its way into the decisions of our states; that some, as Alabama, hold to the rule of retreat, and others, including our own state, declare strongly for the opposite doctrine. It was also said that it was not stating it too strongly to say that the trend of later judicial decisions was in favor of the rule as laid down in this state, and it was further added that the right to stand one's ground should form an element of the instructions upon the necessity of killing and the law of self-defense. This was no new declaration upon the part of this court. The same principle had been enunciated in People v. Ye Park, 62 Cal. 208, and has since been consistently followed in People v. Lewis, 117 Cal. 186, 48 Pac. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 167, and People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405. No exposition is necessary to show that the giving of this instruction, which imposed upon the defendant the duty of right, and forbade him the right to stand his ground, was error of such gravity as to demand a reversal of the case. But, in exposition of the fact, as stated in People v. Hecker, that the trend of modern decision is in favor of the rule as laid down in this state, the following quotation from the Supreme Court of Missouri in State v. Bartlett, 170 Mo. 658, 71 S. W. 148, 59 L. R. A. 756, is apposite. The Supreme Court of Missouri, in receding from the earlier rule, which demanded retreat (State v. Partlow, 90 Mo. 608, 4 S. W. 14, 59 Am. Rep. 31), declares: "It is true, human life is sacred; but so is human liberty. One is as dear in the eyes of the law as the other, and neither is to give way and surrender its legal status in order that the other may exclusively exist, supposing for a moment such an anomaly to be possible. In other words, the wrongful and violent acts of one man shall not abolish, or even temporarily suspend, the legal and constitutional rights of his neighbor. And this idea of the nonnecessity of retreating from any locality where one has a right to be is growing in favor, as all doctrines based upon sound reason inevitably will."

Nor is it any answer to this objection that the court elsewhere gave a correct instruction upon the subject. The result served but to confuse the jury and to render it impossible to determine whether in their deliberations they followed the law as correctly or as incorrectly set before them. People v. Campbell, 30 Cal. 312; People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65; People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 151, 35 Am. Rep. 69; People v. Messersmith, 57 Cal. 575; People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 28 Pac. 589; People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 50 Pac. 376. The court in giving instructions upon the law of self-defense, charged the jury as follows: "So, too, under such circumstances, he may pursue and slay his adversary, but the pursuit must not be in revenge, nor after the necessity for the defense has ceased, but must be prosecuted in good faith to the end of winning his safety and securing his life." And again he charged the jury: "It must appear that the defendant, if he were the aggressor, not only really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle, and to escape from his assailant before the fatal blow was given," etc. In point of law these instructions are unimpeachable, but they are wholly without the evidence in the case and impertinent to any theory based upon that evidence. There is no word of testimony, either by the prosecution or the defense, touching pursuit, nor touching any struggle or combat in which either party sought to retreat. These instructions, too, could only have served to mislead the jury into the belief that the court in some manner found evidence of pursuit, or of a declination to engage in further combat, which prompted the giving of these instructions. People v. Sanchez, 24 Cal. 28; People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 227, 30 Pac. 378; People v. Bird, 60 Cal. 7; People v. Smith, 105 Cal. 676, 39 Pac. 38.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "For the purpose of this trial and before you had heard any evidence a presumption of the innocence of the accused arose. Independent of evidence he was presumed by you to be innocent. This presumption of innocence, arising at the outset, attends him throughout the trial and until you have finally determined upon your verdict. You are not to forget it in weighing the testimony." The language of the Penal Code (section 1096) is brief and clear. "A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved." This, as over and over declared, means that a defendant has the unquestioned right to have the jury which is trying him for crime instructed that they must presume him to be innocent until his guilt is shown beyond a reasonable doubt. The instruction given by the court by no means filled the measure of the defendant's right in this regard. "Independent of evidence," says the court, "he was presumed by you to be innocent." What the jurors may have understood by this language we cannot say; but it is certainly open to the construction that if they were disposed to presume him innocent they could do so, and if they were not they need not. Nothing can be gained and much may be sacrificed by such uncalled-for departures from the plain letter of the statute, and from the oft-repeated and oft-approved language in construing it. It is not the same thing to say to a jury, "This defendant was presumed by you to be innocent," as it is to say, "The law clothes the defendant with the presumption of innocence, and therefore you must presume him to be innocent until the contrary is shown."

People's instruction No. 27 contained a most faulty definition of murder in the second degree. It should not have been given. Section 189, Pen. Code, is sufficiently explicit on the subject.

The court gave an instruction as to the inadvisability of giving which trial courts have been repeatedly cautioned. The instruction is the one copied from People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 195, which declares: "Where the defendant offers himself as a witness, in determining his credibility, it is proper to take into consideration the consequences, inducements and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation." The giving of this instruction has always been discountenanced by this court. It has been said that justice would be more surely accomplished if no such instruction were given. It has been said that it is difficult, logically, to attribute the giving of such an instruction to anything other than a purpose to expressly disparage the defendant—"the very thing that a court has no authority to do, in view of our constitutional provision." Trial courts have been commended by this court when they have refused to give this instruction. People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 43 Pac. 520; People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 329, 57 Pac. 1067; People v. Boren, 139 Cal. 215, 72 Pac. 899. And after all this admonition, after all these cautions, the conclusion is forced upon us that when a trial judge does give this instruction to a jury, it can be with no other purpose than to throw his judicial weight into the scales against the defendant on trial before his court. For this reason, therefore, we think the time has come to say that in all future cases which shall arise, and where, after this warning, this instruction shall be given, this court will hold the giving of it to be so prejudicial to the rights of a defendant, secured to him by our Constitution and laws, as to call for the reversal of any judgment which may be rendered against him.

The court, in instructing the jury that there need be no appreciable space of time between the formation of the intent to kill and the act of killing, said: "It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of the will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer, and if such is the case the killing is murder in the first degree," etc. This instruction is drafted upon the instruction approved in People v. Morine, 61 Cal. 369, but omits the necessary qualifying words given in that instruction, which there reads, and should read, as follows: "It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by and the result of a concurrence of will," etc. The omission of these words would make a killing which was not the result of deliberation and premeditation, but which had at any time been preceded by it, murder in the first degree. Such, of course, is not the law. The killing itself must be the result of the concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation.

The court, in attempting to define manslaughter in the language of the Code, declared that it was: "First, voluntary upon a sudden quarrel and heat of passion." It cannot be perceived how the defendant was injured by the court calling for the concurrence of two conditions, when the law requires but one; but lest, by our silence, it may be assumed that the court has approved this instruction, it should be said that the language of the Code should be strictly followed. Pen. Code, § 192.

We perceive no force in appellant's objection that the court was not warranted in reading the information to the jury, as it did, in the opening of its instructions. The regular procedure in the trial of a criminal case calls for the reading of the indictment or the information after the impanelment of the jury, and that the court should repeat its contents to point the instructions of law which it was about to give, is in no sense error.

There was erected in the courtroom, visible to the jury during its impanelment, and afterward admitted in evidence, a structure built as nearly as might be in duplicate of the porch upon which Zander was standing when shot. In this we perceive nothing prejudicial to the rights of defendant. The rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable to criminal actions (Pen. Code, § 1102), and, under proper restrictions of proof, models, facsimiles, and photographs are admissible in criminal as well as in civil cases.

After the jury had been impaneled and sworn, and had been placed in charge of the sheriff, and the sheriff had been sworn to take charge of the jury, under section 1121 of the Penal Code, the court allowed eight of the jurors to separate and go to their homes, while the remaining four were retained in the sheriff's custody. While the commission of the jury to the custody of the sheriff during the trial of a criminal case is discretionary with the court, when the court has once exercised that discretion the law contemplates that it is exercised quite as much for the rights of the defendant as for the rights of the people. If the jury is liable to be subject to improper influences, if there is danger of this, which is the ground calling for the exercise of this judicial discretion, in the purview of the law those influences may as likely be exercised against the defendant as in his favor. There is absolutely no warrant in the law for the course the jury adopted, and the order permitting the jury to separate was error; indeed, error of such nature that the brief of the state offers no word in extenuation or justification of it.

It was error for the court to have admitted People's Exhibit 12 over defendant's objection. This exhibit was a wood cut taken from a photograph by a newspaper man at Los Banos and published in his newspaper. It was a picture of the porch with a man lying in the assumed position in which Zander's body was found. It was not a photograph of Zander's body when found. Neither the man who took the photograph, nor the man who represented the dead body, ever saw the body of the dead man on the porch.

The record fails to show that the court gave the statutory admonition to the jury upon many of its recesses and adjournments as required by section 1122 of the Penal Code. This admonition should, of course, be given, and the record of the case should disclose the fact of its having been given. People v. Thompson, 84 Cal. 598, 24 Pac. 384.

Other alleged errors touching the misconduct of the jury do not call for particular attention, as it is improbable that there will be a repetition of them upon a second trial.

For the reasons above given, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal upon the ground that there was prejudicial error in the giving of the following instruction: "(27) 'Heat of passion' as used in these instructions, means a condition of quick anger or sudden injury, engendered by real or supposed grievance suffered at the time. And in order to reduce a crime of murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree, the killing must be done upon the instant provocation is given, or so soon thereafter that the blood has not had time to cool and reason resume its sway, before the mind has had time to consider the character and gravity of the act about to be done, and not from hatred or pre-existing revenge." The evidence in the case, as shown by the majority opinion, was such as to make it exceedingly important to the defendant that the distinction between murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree should be clearly and precisely made known to the jury. The homicide was apparently the result of a quarrel commenced on that very day; the evidence indicating that the relations between the parties had been very friendly up to that time. The instruction set forth above is not a correct statement of the law in this regard. To reduce a crime from murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree, it is not essential that the killing should be done upon the instant that provocation is given, or so soon thereafter that the blood has not had time to cool. If, as a matter of fact, a killing is done without deliberation and premeditation, except in special cases mentioned in the Code, of which this is not one, it is only murder in the second degree. The statements contained in this instruction would have been material in determining as between murder and manslaughter, but as between the two degrees of murder they had no place, and we are unable to say that they did not mislead the jury to the prejudice of defendant.

Under the circumstances of this case, as shown by the record, I find no other prejudicial error.

SANTA ROSA BANK v. PAXTON et al.

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1906.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

The allegation in a complaint in an action on a note that defendant made, signed, and delivered the note states a cause of action, and permits the introduction of evidence that the note was signed and delivered by an attorney in fact appointed by defendant.

2. PLEADING — PLEADING WRITTEN INSTRUMENT.

The written instrument on which a cause of action is founded may be pleaded, either by setting forth its substance according to its legal effect, or by incorporating a copy in the body of the complaint, or by attaching thereto by a proper reference a copy of such instrument.

3. BILLS AND NOTES — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in an action on a note alleged that the maker made, executed, and delivered the note to plaintiff; that the maker executed a power of attorney whereby the grantee therein was empowered to appear and act for the maker in her business transactions, which power of attorney was annexed to and made a part of the complaint. The power of attorney was sufficient to empower the grantee therein to execute the note sued on. Held that, conceding that any reference to the power of attorney was necessary, the allegation as to the authority of the grantee in a power of attorney to execute the note was at most defective in form only, which was removed by the reference to the power of attorney attached as an exhibit.

4. PLEADING—DEFECTS—WAIVER.

A party consenting to the overruling of his demurrer to a pleading consents to a withdrawal of the demurrer.

5. SAME.

Where a party withdrew his demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, he could present the point on appeal only by reason of the rule that such an objection is not waived by a failure to demurrer; but where by his answer he raises the issues which he claims were not well pleaded in the petition, and the case is tried on the merits, the objection is waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Santa Rosa Bank against B. W. Paxton and another, as executors of Hannah H. Paxton, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Charles E. Paxton appeals. Affirmed.

Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler (William Rix, of counsel), for appellant. J. R. Leppo, for respondent. James W. Oates and A. B. Ware, for defendant executor.

SHAW, J. This appeal is taken from the judgment by the defendant Charles E. Paxton, and is presented upon the judgment roll alone. The appellant has no apparent interest in the case, except as one of the executors of the will of Hannah H. Paxton, deceased. His appeal purports to be taken by him in his individual capacity; but, as the respondent makes no objection on the ground of want of interest in the appellant, we have considered the appeal as if it were taken by him as executor.

The complaint states a cause of action to recover judgment upon four promissory notes, executed to the plaintiff by the deceased in her lifetime, and to foreclose a lien upon certain personal property pledged as security for the payment of the notes. Each note is copied in full in the body of the complaint, and it is alleged, with respect to each, that the deceased "by and through her attorney in fact, B. W. Paxton, made, executed, and delivered to the said plaintiff herein" the said note. Concerning the authority of the attorney in fact to execute the notes it is alleged that the deceased "made, executed, and delivered to B. W. Paxton an instrument and power of attorney whereby the said Hannah H. Paxton authorized and empowered the said B. W. Paxton as her attorney in fact, and to appear and act as and for the said Hannah H. Paxton in her affairs and business transactions, in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth and the authority given by said instrument and power of attorney, * * * which said instrument and power of attorney is hereunto annexed and referred to and marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this complaint." The power of attorney is annexed to the complaint as stated. It is not ambiguous in its terms, and is in all respects sufficient to empower B. W. Paxton, for and in the name, place, and stead of Hannah H. Paxton to execute the notes sued on. The only objection now offered to the complaint is that there is no allegation therein that B. W. Paxton was authorized to execute, as the attorney in fact of Hannah H. Paxton, the notes sued upon. The point urged is that in such a case the allegation of authority must be made in the body of the complaint, and cannot be made by a reference to an exhibit attached thereto and made a part thereof.

The purpose of a pleading is to inform the opposite party of the facts on which the pleader will rely as constituting his action or defense. It is difficult to perceive how the defendant could be given more explicit and satisfactory information on that subject than by the method adopted by the plaintiff in this case. If it deserves criticism at all, it is upon the ground that it commits the fault of pleading the evidence, rather than the facts. The simple allegation that the defendant made, signed, and delivered the notes would have served to state a cause of action, so far as that fact is concerned, and to let in evidence showing that the signing and delivery was by an attorney in fact thereunto duly authorized. By the method adopted the defendants were not only apprised of the facts alleged against them, but also of the nature of the evidence by which such facts would be proven. The plaintiff has more than performed its duty to the defendant in this regard. The rule that a written instrument upon which a cause of action is founded may be pleaded either by setting forth its substance according to its legal effect, or by incorporating a copy in the body of the complaint, or by attaching thereto, by a proper reference, a copy of such instrument, as the pleader may choose, is thoroughly established in this state. Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 303; Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 603; Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 253; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 175; Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 613, 22 Pac. 327; Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 505, 23 Pac. 50, 227; Whitby v. Rowell, 82 Cal. 635, 23 Pac. 40, 382; Savings Bank v. Burns, 104 Cal. 476, 38 Pac. 102; Georges v. Kessler, 131 Cal. 185, 63 Pac. 466; Estate of Cook, 137 Cal. 191, 69 Pac. 968.

It may be that this rule is not so well settled with respect to instruments which are made a part of the complaint by reference and attached as exhibits, but which do not constitute the contract upon which the complaint is founded. With respect to such instruments, however, the rule is said to be that "if the allegation be defective it may be aided by an express reference to an exhibit for that avowed purpose." Estate of Cook, supra. This case comes precisely within the rule. Conceding that any reference to the power of attorney was necessary at all in view of the allegation that the notes were executed, the most that could be claimed with respect to the allegation as to the authority of the agent to execute them is that it is defective in form. This defect was absolutely removed by the reference to the power of attorney which was attached as an exhibit, and which showed beyond controversy that the maker of the notes did thereby authorize B. W. Paxton to execute the same as her agent. The appellant relies on the two cases of Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298, and Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151. These decisions do not sustain his contention. The decision in Los Angeles v. Signoret was fully explained and distinguished in Ward v. Clay, supra, and Lambert v. Haskell, supra. In Burkett v. Griffith, supra, which was a case of slander, certain leases were attached to the complaint and were referred to therein only for the purpose of identifying certain land by the descriptions therein contained. It was held that these exhibits could not be used to supply the place of a proper allegation in the body of the complaint concerning the terms of the covenants contained in the leases. They were not made a part of the complaint for that purpose. Here the exact contrary appears. The power of attorney was made a part of the complaint for the express purpose of aiding the allegation in so far as it failed to state the legal effect of the instrument, and it comes clearly within the rule as stated in Estate of Cook, supra.

We cannot discover in the record any occasion for this appeal. The appellant filed a separate demurrer to the complaint, based on the ground that the complaint did not express facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This, of course, presented there the point now contended for here. He, however, consented that this demurrer should be overruled, and it was done accordingly. This was equivalent to a withdrawal of the demurrer, and he can present the point now only by reason of the rule of law that such an objection is not waived by a failure to demur. He thereupon filed a separate answer, denying the execution of the notes by the deceased, either through the attorney in fact or at all, and alleging that they were executed in her name by said B. W. Paxton without any authority from her so to do. He thus himself put in issue the precise fact which he now contends was not well pleaded. Upon this as the sole issue in the case he went to trial, and after the evidence thereon was introduced he waived findings without preserving the evidence in the record by bill of exception or otherwise. Thereupon he waited until all but four days of the six months allowed for appeal had expired, and then instituted this appeal upon the bare judgment roll. Upon the trial he had the opportunity to present upon its merits his claim that the notes were executed without authority, and we must presume that he did so, and that the court correctly decided against him on that point. It appears, therefore, not only that his objection to the pleading he did not properly present, that he himself presented the same issue in his answer, that it has been decided against him, and that he virtually concedes that this decision was correct upon the evidence. The respondent should be put to no expense by an appeal so fruitless and devoid of substantial grounds. Whitby v. Rowell, supra.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs and $100 damages.

DARLINGTON v. BUTLER (KOHN, Intervener.)

(Court of Appeals, Third District, California. April 18, 1906.)

1. JUDGMENT—FINAL JUDGMENT—SUCCESSIVE RECORD ENTRIES.

A contest between applicants to purchase land was referred to the court, and on motion by an interpleader to dismiss the proceedings an entry was made stating that, the motion to dismiss having come on to be heard and the court having rendered its decision, it was ordered that the action be dismissed. It was the practice of the judge who presided in the case to announce his decision to the clerk and to require the clerk to make an entry in the minute book, and the clerk testified that he remembered the decision of the court in the case, and that he received a copy, which he supposed went into the minute book, and that he furnished a copy of the decision to one of the attorneys. Two days later another order was entered in practically the same terms, also dismissing the cause. Held, that the order first entered was the final judgment.

2. Public Lands—School Land—Application to Purchase—Reference of Contest—Subsequent Applications.

After a contest between applicants for the purchase of school lands has been referred to the court, the surveyor general has no power to receive the application of a third person to purchase the land involved in the contest.

Action by Abe Darlington against Sarah Butler. From a judgment for plaintiff, Nathan I. Kohn, intervener, appeals. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 85 Pac. 931.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to determine the respective rights of the parties to certain school land situated in El Dorado county. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, intervener, Kohn, appeals.

The record presents the following facts: In 1888 defendant Butler filed her application in the state land office to purchase the land. Thereafter one Graham filed therein a similar application, and on demand and protest of Graham the surveyor general referred the conflicting claims of Graham and Butler to the superior court for adjudication. On May 4, 1889, a complaint was filed by Graham in said court in the action entitled "Graham v. Butler," and summons issued, but no return was made thereon. On May 7, 1903, appellant, intervener Kohn, "presented his application to purchase and protest to the surveyor general, who refused to file the same on the ground that the matter had been referred to the superior court of El Dorado county, and until judgment was had they (sic) had no jurisdiction to receive the same." On May 22, 1903, Kohn, by leave of court, filed his complaint in intervention, and an alias summons issued thereon, and on August 19, 1904, "was duly certified and returned" to the court, and on the same day Graham filed his answer to said complaint in intervention, "disclaiming any interest in the land therein described or in the cause of action, and the default of said Sarah Butler for not appearing in answer to said summons was duly entered." On July 16, 1903, Darlington, plaintiff herein, filed his complaint in intervention, in which he alleged that he had made application to purchase the land from the state on April 11, 1903, which presumably was refused as Kohn's had been. On January 3, 1905, the court "dismissed the proceedings of Graham v. Butler, on motion of said intervener Darlington, upon the ground that summons in said action had not been served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action." It appears from a statement made by the judge, Hon. N. D. Arnot, presiding in the case, as follows: "It was the practice of the presiding judge in this case * * * to announce his decision to the clerk and require the clerk to make an entry in the minute book, and that has been his practice since he became judge of the superior court of El Dorado county. * * * When the judge presiding made his order in the case of Graham v. Butler dismissing the case, he followed the practice he had hitherto pursued." The deputy clerk of the court testified that he remembered the decision of the court in Graham v. Butler, a copy of which the court gave to the clerk, and the directions the court gave him, and he supposed it went into the minute book, and that the court told him as the attorneys came in to give them a copy of the decision; that Darlington came to the clerk's office about closing time, and the clerk gave him a copy, but did not remember to have given Kohn's attorney a copy. The latter testified that he did not know of the judgment dismissing the case until January 5, 1903, on which day a second judgment of dismissal was entered. The judgment of January 3d is as follows (title of court and cause entered in full): "In this action the motion of intervener, Abe Darlington, that said action be dismissed having come on regularly to be heard, and the court having rendered its decision and order that said action be dismissed, wherefore, by reason of the law and decision and order aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said above-entitled action be, and the same is, hereby dismissed. Judgment rendered January 3, A. D. 1905." There apppears in the record a judgment to like effect, signed by the judge and dated January 5, 1905. It is not necessary to set out this judgment fully. It recites the proceedings leading up to it more fully than the judgment of January 3d, and differs from that judgment only in form. It directs that the action be dismissed and the matter referred to the surveyor general for such further proceedings as may be proper in the premises, and that a copy be filed in the office of the surveyor general. The court found, among the facts, that the judgment of January 3d "was never vacated nor set aside and at all times after its said entry was and is in full force and effect." Among its conclusions of law the court found that the judgment of this court made and entered on the 3d day of January, 1905, was and is the final judgment in the action of J. S. Graham v. Sarah Butler, and that the judgment made and entered on the 5th day of January, 1905, was unauthorized, and was not and is not the final judgment therein." It appears that the judgment of January 3d was entered "on page 598 of Judgment Book B, records of the superior court of El Dorado county, in words and figures as follows."

Then follows copy as above given. The judgment of January 5th was introduced as having been "made and entered by this court on the 5th day of January, 1905, and forming part of the judgment roll in the case," but it does not appear where it was entered. On Minute Book J of the court is an entry as follows: "January 3, 1905. Present: Hon. N. D. Arnot, Judge. J. S. Graham v. Sarah Butler. The motion to dismiss is granted." The court found that on January 4, 1905, plaintiff filed in the office the surveyor general a certified copy of the judgment of January 3, 1905, "and on said 4th day of January, 1905, and after the filing of said copy of said judgment, he filed in the office of the surveyor general his application, in due form, for the purchase of the land described in his complaint, and a duly verified protest against the allowance or approval of the application of said Sarah Butler, and demanded that the contest arising thereon be referred to this court for adjudication"; that "thereafter, to wit, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1905, the surveyor general, in compliance with said protest and demand of plaintiffs, made and entered in the record books of his office an order, which recites the fact of said application made by defendant in his office for the land aforesaid, and of the application made and filed by plaintiff as aforesaid, and the said protest and demand of plaintiff filed therewith, and orders and directs that the contest, as set forth between the parties herein, be referred to the superior court * * * for adjudication." On January 6, 1905, Kohn, intervener, presented to the surveyor general a certified copy of the said judgment of January 5th, and at the same time presented his application and demand to purchase said land, and was refused, "on the ground that he had issued his profert to this court to determine the conflicting claims of said Abe Darlington and said Sarah Butler, and hence was without authority to receive any further application." Thereupon Kohn, by leave of court, intervened in this action. The cause was tried, and judgment passed in favor of plaintiff and against both the defendant and the intervener.

The appellant makes the point that the judgment of January 3d was not final, was not intended so to be, and that the clerk was unauthorized to enter it as the judgment of the court; that the judgment of January 5th was the only final judgment in the case; that plaintiff's application to purchase and demand for a reference to the court were premature and without authority, and hence intervener's application was first in time and should have been received and filed. It is beyond dispute that the judgment of January 3d was entered in the judgment book by the clerk on that day, and was so entered by direction of and in accordance with the order of the court. The clerk testified that the judge gave him a copy of his decision, and that the order was entered on the minute book, which, as the court stated, was in accordance with the practice of the court. The finding of the court was that the judgment of the 3d of January was the final judgment, and that the judgment of January 5th was unauthorized, and was not and is not the final judgment. It may be that the court could not by its findings change the effect of its former judgments, but the finding goes to show what its intention was. The court had the right to dismiss the action of Graham v. Butler on its own motion, even though Darlington was not then an interested party as intervener. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7. The court pronounced its judgment of dismissal, or in other words rendered its judgment of dismissal, on January 3d, when it so declared in open court and directed the clerk to enter the order. The order entered in the minute book was in effect the final judgment of dismissal. Marks v. Keenan, 140 Cal. 33, 73 Pac. 751; Pacific Paving Company v. Vizelich, 141 Cal. 4, 74 Pac. 352; Swortfiguer v. White, 141 Cal. 576, 75 Pac. 172. There is no statute requiring the judge to sign the judgment. See subject discussed in Estate of Cook, 77 Cal. 220, 17 Pac. 923, 19 Pac. 431, 1 L. R. A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267. The surveyor general was authorized to act upon the judgment of January 3d in making his order for reference of the applications of Darlington and Butler. After the reference of the contest between Darlington and Butler the surveyor general had no power or right to receive the application of another person to purchase the land involved in the contest, as we understand the decision in Youle v. Thomas, 146 Cal. 537, 80 Pac. 714.

It is claimed that intervention of Kohn was improperly allowed; that he was not in privity with the state, and could not be heard to question the sale, whether already made or about to be made (Id.); that he was in no position to obtain in the action a valid or effectual judgment with respect to his rights (Id.); and that, as was said in Youle v. Thomas, "the conclusion necessarily follows that the intervener has not been aggrieved by the judgment and order from which he appeals," and the appeal might very properly be dismissed. Whether the foregoing is a correct interpretation of the case cited, is immaterial in this case.

Appellant contends that the evidence shows that respondent was not a purchaser in good faith and for his own benefit and not for the benefit of another. This contention is based upon the evidence tending to support the allegations of the complaint in intervention that the plaintiff was, at the time he made application to purchase, in such financial stress as to be unable to pay for the land if awarded to him. Plaintiff objected to the testimony upon this issue as irrelevant and immaterial; but the court allowed it, and much testimony was taken touching the property interests and outstanding indebtedness of plaintiff. We very much doubt the correctness of the court's ruling upon this point. Possibly the evidence might have had some bearing upon the claim that plaintiff's application was for the benefit of some other person if there had been any evidence pointing in that direction, but there was none. However, the court found against intervener on the issue, and there was sufficient evidence to support the finding.

BLACK v. BLACK. (S. F. 3,584.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1906.)

1. APPEAL — JUDICIAL DISCRETION—MODIFICATION OF DECREE IN DIVORCE.

Applications for the modification of a decree in divorce are addressed to the sound discretion of the lower court and its conclusions will not be disturbed on appeal unless the record presents a clear abuse of that discretion.

2. DIVORCE—POWER OF COURT—DISPOSITION OF CHILDREN.

Under Civ. Code 1903, § 138, providing that, in an action for divorce, the court may, before or after judgment, give such direction for the custody, care, and education of the children as may seem necessary, and may at any time vacate or modify the same, the power of the court to subsequently modify the decree is not abridged because of it having adopted the agreement of the parties as to the disposition to be made of the children.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

J. R. Welch, for appellant. Henry Ach, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J.* In this action, which was for a divorce, the parties having entered into an agreement to that effect, the court, in its original decree in favor of plaintiff, entered in March, 1900, awarded the custody and control of the minor son of the parties to the defendant, with leave to plaintiff to visit said child at reasonable times and to have the child visit at her home six months in the year. In February, 1903, the court, on application of plaintiff for a modification of said original decree so as to award the custody and control of said child to her, and after hearing, at which evidence was presented on both sides, modified said decree and awarded the care, education, and control of said child (then 7 years of age) to plaintiff, with leave to defendant to visit the child at reasonable times and to have him spend his vacations with him. It is from this modified decree that this appeal is taken.

While it is insisted that the modification of the decree was not justified by the evidence, we do not think the point calls for any special notice, or that it is necessary to review the evidence presented in the bill of exceptions. All applications of the character here involved are addressed to the sound discretion of the lower court, and the conclusion it reaches will not be disturbed unless the record presents a clear abuse of that discretion. We perceive no such abuse. There was no question raised as to the morals of either parent; in fact, it was conceded that they were both persons of moral worth. But, upon all other matters affecting the best interests of the child, particularly as to its physical necessities and comforts and the ability of either parent to best provide for them, the evidence, which was presented solely upon affidavits, was radically conflicting. If that presented on behalf of the mother was accepted by the lower court, and it undoubtedly was, that tribunal, having in view the welfare of the child as the controlling factor in directing its custody, was warranted in making the order and we may not disturb it.

It is also insisted by appellant that the provision in the original decree awarding the custody of the child to defendant, being made in pursuance of a stipulation of the parties in the nature of a contract, the court had no power, upon application of the plaintiff, to modify it, and refers to Sargent v. Sargent, 106 Cal. 541, 39 Pac. 931, as sustaining his claim. This case, however, has no application. The contract there under consideration was one relative to the custody of the minor child provided for in the articles of separation executed by the parents pursuant to section 159 of the Civil Code, 1903, which contract the court held binding and obligatory until avoided by the mutual resumption of marital duties, or the divorce of the parties, the court further declaring, however, that "in the event of a divorce being granted * * * the question of the custody of the minor would be left at large for the disposition of the court, the same as if the contract had not existed." The power of the court to vary or modify its decree in divorce proceedings as to the custody, care, and education of the minor children whenever it may seem to it necessary or proper is provided for by section 138 of the Civil Code, 1903, and we are not aware of any authority which holds that the power of the court to subsequently modify such decree is abridged because it adopts the agreement of the parties as to the present disposition to be made of the children. A decree based upon such an agreement as to custody is simply provisional. The court is not required to award the custody of the children in conformity to it. It does so only because the parents, in view of a judicial separation and solicitous for the welfare of their offspring, have the greatest interest in determining which of them can best care and provide for them in the future, and an agreement prompted by these considerations is generally approved and adopted by the court, and made part of the decree. The decree, however, made in pursuance to the agreement is subject to the power of modification authorized by the statute. The children are not parties to the action for divorce, and the jurisdiction which the statute confers on the court, to be exercised, from time to time as changed conditions or circumstances may require, in protecting their interests, cannot be limited or abridged by the contract of the parties made pending the divorce litigation which the decree follows, or by the action of the court in originally approving and adopting it.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1906. Rehearing Denied May 14, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

On appeal, the question is whether there was substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court, and not whether there was a preponderance of evidence on the side thereof.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—POWER TO BIND CLIENT—CONTRACTS.

Code Civ. Proc. 1903, § 283, providing that an attorney has authority to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding, by his agreement filed with the clerk or entered on the minutes of the court, does not apply to a contract made by an attorney for his client before commencement of an action thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 5, Cent. Dig. Attorney and Client, §§ 140, 141.]

3. SAME—CONTRACTS—RATIFICATION.

Where defendant bank ratified a contract whereby plaintiff was to be appointed receiver in a certain action for a consideration, by procuring the appointment of plaintiff as such receiver, the contract became, on the part of the bank, an executed contract, although the same was made by the bank's attorney and was not in writing and filed with the clerk of court, etc., as provided by Code Civ. Proc. 1903, § 283.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by S. Ephraim against the Pacific Bank and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. Everett Ball, for appellant. Roger Johnson and Gavin McNab, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover of defendants, the Pacific Bank and its directors, etc., quite a large sum of money for services, etc., rendered by plaintiff as receiver of certain lands and premises in a certain action instituted by said Pacific Bank, entitled "Pacific Bank et al. v. Madera Fruit & Land Company et al." The findings and judgment were for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The defense set up in the answer is, briefly, that plaintiff importuned the bank to be appointed receiver in said action of Pacific Bank v. Madera Fruit & Land Company, and promised and agreed that if he should be so appointed he would look solely to the crops of fruit which the land would produce for compensation for his services and expenses as such receiver, and "waived all claim and demand against said Pacific Bank for any liability to him therefor," and "would under no circumstances make any claim against said bank for his services or expenses as such receiver." The court found the above averments in the answer to be true, and found as a conclusion of law that there was no liability of defendants to plaintiff for any sum of money whatever.

The main question in the case is whether the above findings were warranted by the evidence, and we think that they clearly were. Appellant argues that there was not a preponderance of evidence on the side of the findings; but we need not discuss that question, for the question is: Was there substantial evidence to support the findings? And that there was such evidence is beyond doubt. The witness Grant testified that he made the alleged contract on the part of the bank with appellant, and there was considerable other testimony corroborating that of Grant. Appellant testified that no such contract was made, and there was some other testimony which probably tends to support him; but this made, at best, only a case of conflicting evidence.

Appellant contends that the contract as testified to by Grant was not binding on the bank, and therefore not binding on appellant, because Grant made it as the bank's attorney, and it was not in writing, filed with the clerk of the court or entered upon the minutes of the court, as provided in section 283, Code Civ. Proc. 1903. But this contention is not tenable. That section refers only to "steps of an action" after it has been instituted, and pertaining to its conduct; but in the case at bar the contract was made before the commencement of the action. Moreover, the bank ratified the contract by procuring the appointment of appellant as receiver; and, as by procuring such appointment it did all it was required to do under the contract, by that act the contract became on the part of the bank an executed contract. See Ephraim v. Pacific Bank, 136 Cal. 646, 69 Pac. 436.

Appellant has some exceptions to rulings on the admissibility of evidence; but none of them, even if well founded, would be of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PIERCY v. PIERCY. (S. F. 4,385.)

1. APPEAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL.

The action of the trial court in specifying in an order granting a new trial the ground upon which it was granted did not restrict the court on appeal to the ground so specified in its examination of the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether a new trial should be granted.

2. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—MISCONDUCT OF PARTY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1, authorizes a new trial for irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury, or adverse party, whereby either party was prevented from having a fair trial. In a suit to set aside a conveyance as procured from plaintiff in fraud of her rights, she moved for a new trial on the ground that through the wrongful procurement of defendant the action had been tried as a mere formal matter, without any complete presentation of plaintiff's case, with the understanding on the part of those representing plaintiff that the object of the trial was to dispose of any question as to the validity of the deed, whereby material evidence in support of plaintiff's claim was not presented. Held, that such conduct on the part of defendant was sufficient ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 42.]

3. Appeal—Review—Trial Court's Discretion—Ruling on Motion for New Trial.

The finding of the trial court, on motion for new trial, that the misconduct of defendant had affected the substantial rights of plaintiff, was conclusive on appeal, as it was a matter within the discretion of the trial court.

4. Same — Questions of Fact—Conflicting Evidence.

The decision of the trial court, based on conflicting evidence on a motion for a new trial, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Andrew J. Piercy, as administrator of the estate of Mary Piercy, deceased, against Edward M. Piercy. From an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch and W. F. Williamson, for appellant. H. V. Morehouse and J. E. Alexander, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action was instituted by the deceased, Mary Piercy, to set aside a deed purporting to convey valuable real property in Santa Clara county to defendant, on the ground that the same had been obtained from her by defendant by means of undue influence, and ignorance on her part as to the contents of the deed. The conveyance was dated March 13, 1901, and this action was instituted September 13, 1901. Findings and judgment were in favor of defendant, and Mary Piercy subsequently dying, and the administrator of her estate having been substituted as plaintiff, notice of intention to move for a new trial on various grounds was given. The motion was subsequently heard on a bill of exceptions and affidavits, and the trial court made its order granting said motion on "the sole ground of irregularity in the proceedings of the defendant, by which the plaintiff was prevented from having a fair trial of the action; the irregularity here referred to being that which is shown by the affidavit of R. M. F. Soto, verified on April 7, 1904, and filed herein on April 9, 1904." While the action of the court below in specifying in its order the ground upon which it granted the new trial could not have restricted this court to the ground so specified, in its examination of the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a new trial should be granted, except upon the single question as to the sufficiency of the evidence where it was conflicting (see Weisser v. Southern Pacific Co. [Cal. Sup.] 83 Pac. 439, and cases there cited), the respondent in his brief advances no other reason than the one specified in the order, in support of the action of the trial court. It will therefore be assumed that no other valid ground for a new trial exists.

The irregularity shown by the affidavit of Mr. Soto may be fairly said to be substantially that, through the wrongful procurement of defendant, the action was, so far as the plaintiff's side thereof was concerned, practically tried as a mere formal matter, without any full and complete presentation of her case, and with the understanding on the part of those representing her at the trial (viz., a guardian ad litem appointed for her as an incompetent person, more than 1½ years after the commencement of the action, and his attorney), both that the transaction between the parties was entirely regular and valid, and that the real object of the trial was to dispose of any question as to the validity of the deed, and confirm the title of defendant to the land described therein, such representatives being without knowledge as to material evidence which could have been produced in support of the cause of action stated in the complaint. We have carefully examined the affidavits and bill of exceptions used on the hearing of the motion, together with the judgment roll, and find nothing that would justify us in reversing the order appealed from. It can serve no useful purpose to here set forth the statements made by various affiants, which, in the light of the facts shown by the bill of exceptions and judgment roll, were, in our opinion, sufficient to sustain the conclusion of the trial court. Our law provides that a new trial may be granted, on the application of the party aggrieved, for "irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury, or adverse party, or any order of the court or abuse of discretion by which either party was prevented from having a fair trial." Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1. It is settled that any misconduct of a party to an action, by which a full presentation to the court or jury of evidence material to the other party's cause is prevented, is an irregularity for which a new trial may be granted, if thereby a fair trial of the issues has been prevented. See Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, §§ 25, 46, 49; Spelling's New Trial and App. Pro. §§ 80, 86. The evidence here was sufficient to sustain a finding of such misconduct on the part of defendant. It is true that there was a conflict of evidence, but upon such a motion it is for the trial court to determine the true facts, and we cannot interfere with such determination where there is substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached.

It is, of course, true, as contended by counsel for defendant, that a mere irregularity which does not affect the substantial rights of the other party or prevent him from having a fair trial does not justify the granting of a new trial. The affidavit of Mr. Soto, however, was clear as to the the direct effect of the irregularity in this case, showing that as a result thereof certain material evidence in support of plaintiff's claim was not presented. The question as to whether this materially affected the substantial rights of plaintiff and prevented her from having a fair trial, was peculiarly one which was addressed to the discretion of the trial court, for the same reasons that a motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence is so addressed, as has been repeatedly held. The trial court, having heard and seen the witnesses on the trial, and having knowledge as to those circumstances of a case which cannot be reproduced in the printed record, is in a better position than is the appellate court to determine as to the effect of the shown irregularity upon the result of the trial. It is certainly enough to justify the affirmance of an order granting a new trial upon such ground that the irregularity found, upon sufficient evidence, by the trial court, to have existed, was of such a nature, that it may, under the circumstances of the cases, as shown by the record, have affected the substantial rights of the aggrieved party and prevented a fair trial. Under such circumstances the conclusion of the trial court that it did have such an effect should be held absolutely binding upon the appellate court.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Jan. 18, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Change of Venue—Convenience of Witnesses—Discretion.

The denial of a motion for a change of venue on the ground of convenience of witnesses and that the ends of justice would be promoted will not be reversed on appeal, unless it appears that the trial court abused its discretion.

2. Venue — Change — Convenience of Witnesses.

Where it was shown that plaintiff was in destitute circumstances and could not procure the attendance at the trial of some of his important witnesses if a change of venue should be granted, and plaintiff and six of his witnesses resided in the county where the action was brought, it was not an abuse of discretion to deny the defendant's motion for a change to another county for convenience of its witnesses, 17 of whom resided in the county to which the change was desired.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Antone Bird against the Utica Gold Mining Company and another. From an order denying defendants' motion for a change of the place of trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

See 84 Pac. 256.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendants' motion for a change of the place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco to Calaveras county. The motion was made upon the ground that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by such change. The action has since been tried, as appears by the appeal from the judgment now pending in this court. 84 Pac. 256.

The refusing or granting of a motion for a change of venue upon the ground that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted thereby lies in the sound legal discretion of the trial court. Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192; Reavis v. Cowell, 56 Cal. 588; Avila v. Meherin, 68 Cal. 478, 9 Pac. 428; Clanton v. Ruffner, 78 Cal. 268, 20 Pac. 676; Stockton v. Houser, 103 Cal. 377, 37 Pac. 179. The mere preponderance in the number of witnesses does not necessarily control the matter; and unless it appears that the trial court has abused its discretion the appellate court will not interfere with the action of the lower court. From a careful examination of the record on this appeal we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in denying appellants' motion. It is true that the witnesses for appellants 17 in number, resided in Calaveras county; but it is also true that the plaintiff and his witnesses, six in number, resided in San Francisco. It was also shown that plaintiff was in destitute circumstances, and could not procure the attendance at the trial of some of his important witnesses, especially the physician that treated him for his injuries, if the trial should be transferred to Calaveras county.

The order is affirmed.

Evidence — Parol Evidence — Contract of Compromise—What Constitutes.

Where defendant disputed complainant's bill for $721.35, whereupon a compromise was effected, and plaintiff's president wrote across the bill the words, "Paid $650 in full satisfaction of all claims and guaranteed against liens," which bill he delivered to defendant, the indorsement was not a mere receipt, but an unambiguous contract of settlement, which could not be varied by parol.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge

Action by the Jersey Island Dredging Company against Arthur L. Whitney. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Myrick & Deering, for appellant. Walter H. Linforth, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. The plaintiff, under an agreement with the defendant therefor, did certain dredging work at a rate per diem agreed upon between the parties on the defendant's ranch in Sonoma county, at the head of San Pablo Bay, on account of which the defendant paid to it $1,000 about September 1, 1900, leaving a balance of $97.75 unpaid upon the amount then claimed to be due. September 17th, the plaintiff presented a bill for $721.35 (including said unpaid amount of the former bill), which it claimed to be then due to it. The defendant objected to this bill on the ground of the unsatisfactory character of the work, and also disputed his liability for one item of $168.60 in the bill; but after a few days the dispute was compromised, and the plaintiff agreed to accept $650. The defendant thereupon paid it that amount of money on September 25th, and the plaintiff gave the defendant the following receipt, which was indorsed across the face of the bill and signed by its president: "Paid $650 in full satisfaction of all claims and guaranteed against liens." The work was not completed at that date, and after its completion the plaintiff brought the present action to recover the sum of $550.45 claimed by it to be due for work done "between the 19th and 30th days of September." In his answer the defendant denied any liability to the plaintiff, and alleged that all claims in its favor on account of any dredging work had been fully compromised, satisfied, and discharged. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

At the trial the defendant read in evidence the aforesaid bill of September 17th, together with the indorsement of the plaintiff thereon, and gave his testimony of the circumstances under which it was made. The plaintiff's president was a witness in its behalf, and, when upon the stand, was asked the following questions: "Mr. Wright, at the time of that conversation between Mr. Whitney and yourself, that you have just referred to, was any bill or claim under discussion or consideration other than that shown on this exhibit?" To which he answered, "No, there was nothing else except that bill." "When you took this $650, what claims were you settling?" to which he answered, "That bill." "Were you settling anything else?" to which he answered, "No, sir." Objections to each of these questions were duly made by the defendant upon the ground of incompetency, in that the plaintiff sought thereby to contradict the terms of a written instrument by parol evidence. The court overruled the objections, and the defendant duly excepted thereto. The appellant contends, in support of his appeal, that the court erred in these rulings and that for this reason the judgment should be reversed. On the other hand, the respondent contends that the evidence was properly received, under the rule that the terms of a receipt may be always explained or contradicted by parol evidence.

The rule is universal that a simple receipt for money or for property paid or delivered is not conclusive thereof, but is merely prima facie evidence of the fact. Such a receipt is only an acknowledgement or admission by the party giving it that he has received the money or property therein named, and, like any other admission or recital, may be controverted or explained by extrinsic evidence. Greenl. on Ev. § 305; 2 Pars. on Con. *555; Comptoir d'Escomptes v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28. The same rule obtains, even though the receipt purports to be "in full," or "in full payment," of an admitted or undisputed liability or indebtedness. A creditor does not discharge his debtor from all liability upon an admitted obligation for $2,000 by receiving from him only $1,000, even though he give him a receipt "in full" for his claim. Such an agreement is without any consideration to support it. Ryan v. Ward, 48 N. Y. 204, 8 Am. Rep. 539; American Bridge Co. v. Murphy, 13 Kan. 35; Morris v. St. Paul, etc., Co., 21 Minn. 91; Price v. Treat, 29 Neb. 543, 45 N. W. 790. An exception to this rule prevails in Connecticut, the courts of that state having at an early day (Fuller v. Crittenden, 9 Conn. 401, 23 Am. Dec. 364), following the rule then prevailing in England, held that such a receipt had the effect to discharge the claim, and that parol evidence could not be received to contradict its terms. A receipt "in full of all demands" is held in Illinois (Waldrath v. Norton, 5 Gilman, 437) and in Missouri (Ireland v. Spickard, 95 Mo. App. 53, 68 S. W. 748) to be subject to explanation by parol evidence; while in Indiana (Henry v. Henry, 11 Ind. 236, 71 Am. Dec. 354), New York (Vedder v. Vedder, 1 Denio, 257), Wisconsin (Conant v. Kimball, 95 Wis. 550, 70 N. W. 74), and other states, it is held otherwise. So, too, a receipt of that character joined with a receipt for the amount of a particular demand will be limited to the matter particularly expressed. See Grumley v. Webb, 44 Mo. 444, 100 Am. Dec. 304; Randall v. Reynolds, 52

N. Y. Super. Ct. 145; Civ. Code, § 1648. A receipt may, however, be accompanied with a contract, as, for example, where the money for which it purports to be given is paid in discharge of an unliquidated claim for damages, or upon a compromise or settlement of a contractual liability, when the amount claimed therefor is disputed, and the receipt purports to be in full payment or satisfaction of such claim. In such cases the transaction is regarded as an accord and satisfaction, and the instrument will have the same effect as a release from the claim. Such an instrument may be contradicted as to any facts which it erroneously recites, and evidence will also be received for the purpose of showing that it was given by reason of some fraud or mistake sufficient in equity to set it aside; but in the absence of such evidence it is to be construed in accordance with the rules for interpreting written contracts. A claim or demand about which there is a bona fide dispute, either as to the amount claimed or as to the existence of any liability therefor, is an unliquidated claim, and the acceptance of a part thereof upon a compromise of a dispute will be a sufficient consideration for an agreement on the part of the creditor to discharge the entire claim. Tuttle v. Tuttle, 12 Metc. 551, 46 Am. Dec. 701; Nassoiy v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 42 N. E. 715, 51 Am. St. Rep. 695. A receipt given upon such compromise, which purports to be in full satisfaction of the claim, will operate as a contract by the creditor for the discharge of the debtor, and, like any other written contract, is not subject to be varied or explained by parol evidence. Coon v. Knap, 8 N. Y. 402, 59 Am. Dec. 502; Fuller v. Kemp, 138 N. Y. 231, 33 N. E. 1034, 20 L. R. A. 785; Komp v. Raymond, 42 App. Div. 32, 58 N. Y. Supp. 909; Hills v. Sommer, 53 Hun, 392, 6 N. Y. Supp. 469; Tanner v. Merrill, 108 Mich. 58, 65 N. W. 664, 31 L. R. A. 171, 62 Am. St. Rep. 687; Cummings v. Baars, 36 Minn. 350, 31 N. W. 449; Conant v. Kimball, 95 Wis. 550, 70 N. W. 74; Stapleton v. King, 33 Iowa, 28, 11 Am. Rep. 109; Babcock v. Hawkins, 23 Vt. 561; Hilliard v. Noyes, 58 N. H. 312; Goodwin v. Goodwin, 59 N. H. 548.

Under these rules the indorsement of the plaintiff upon the bill paid by the appellant, "Paid $650 in full satisfaction of all claims," is not only an admission that that amount of money was paid, but it also operated as a contract of the plaintiff for the release of the defendant from its claim. The testimony of both the appellant and the president of the plaintiff show that the defendant disputed the correctness of the bill, and that in consequence of such dispute the latter agreed to receive $650 therefor, and signed the above indorsement. The term "satisfaction" has a distinctive significance in legal phraseology, and imports a release and discharge of the obligation in reference to which it is given; and the statement in the indorsement that the money paid was in satisfaction of "all" claims is without any ambiguity in its terms, and includes, not only the claim on which it was written, but every other claim which the plaintiff then had against the defendant. It was therefore error for the court to receive testimony for the purpose of explaining the terms of the indorsement, or seeking to place a limitation upon the meaning of the words employed. Especially was it error to permit the witness to testify as to his understanding of the claims he was settling. Squires v. Amherst, 145 Mass. 192, 13 N. E. 609; Baker v. Baird, 79 Mich. 255, 44 N. W. 604; Solary v. Webster, 35 Fla. 363, 17 South. 646.

Whether the agreement thus indorsed upon the bill had the effect to discharge the defendant from liability for the work done for the plaintiff after September 25th cannot be determined upon the record before us. Such discharge was alleged by him in his answer, and upon the trial he gave testimony to the effect that the $650 was paid to the plaintiff upon an agreement between them that it should cover, not only the work already done, but all work thereafter to be done by the plaintiff under their previous agreement. At the trial this defense was presented in two branches: One, by the above indorsement, which by its terms is limited to claims existing at the date it was given; the other, by this verbal agreement. The finding of the court that the allegations of the answer constituting this defense are "untrue," in so far as it refers to the claims covered by the indorsement, is, as we have seen, not sustained by the evidence; but the failure to make a finding upon that portion of the defense which the defendant sought to sustain by the testimony respecting the verbal agreement, notwithstanding such testimony was denied by the plaintiff, necessitates a new trial.

The payment to the plaintiff by the Beet Sugar Company is not available to the defendant as a defense to the plaintiff's claim. Aside from the objection that such defense is not alleged in the answer, there was no evidence that the payment was made for or on account of the defendant.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: COOPER, J.; HALL, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

COOPER, J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing in this case. The contract provides that the work of dredging shall be paid for at the rate of $70 per day of 22 hours. The bill presented to the defendant, dated September 17, 1900, was for a total to date of $721.35. In this bill was an item of $168.60 for time while the dredger was aground. There was a dispute about the bill, and on September 25, 1900, it was agreed that the plaintiff would accept $650 in payment thereof. The amount was paid, and on the bill was indorsed "Paid $650 in full satisfaction of all claims and guaranteed against liens. Jersey Island Dredging Co., per W. H. Wright, Pres't." The amount claimed here, and for which recovery was had, is for labor performed by plaintiff after the date of the bill. In fact it includes 20 hours work on September 25th, 21 hours on the 26th, 23 hours on the 27th, 12 hours on the 28th, 12 hours on the 29th of the same month, and 12 hours on October 1st, all of which work was done after the receipt was given. Now there was no contract except for work by the day, and no agreement to do the entire work for any sum. The defendant testified that he could not say as to the day the discussion commenced over the bill, but that he knew in a general way what had been done. He further testified: "When I paid the $650 September 25th I figured down how much would be proper to pay on this bill. I don't remember now what amount I arrived at." The defendant was also allowed to testify to the effect that he understood when he paid the $650 it was a payment of everything.

I think parol evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing that the receipt referred to the bill upon which it was indorsed, and was for all claims included in the bill, and nothing more. In any event, I think it was competent for plaintiff to show by parol evidence as to what was intended to be covered by the receipt. Defendant had testified as to his understanding in regard to the matter, and it was clearly right to allow plaintiff also to state his understanding. As the claim upon which the action is brought is all for work performed after the date of the bill upon which the receipt was indorsed, and much of it after the date of the receipt, it would seem unjust not to allow any evidence as to what was intended to be paid by the $650. If the receipt was intended to be a contract and to include future work, it could easily have been so written. Parol evidence as to a receipt, for the purpose of explaining it, where it is not a contract, is clearly admissible. Hawley v. Bader, 15 Cal. 45; 1 Greenl. on Ev. § 305; Dolan v. Freiberg, 4 W. Va. 101.

HALL, J. On the authority of Hawley v. Bader, 15 Cal. 45 (a case not referred to in the opinion heretofore filed in this case), I am of the opinion that the petition for a rehearing should be granted.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action in the nature of ejectment, prosecuted by the widow and administratrix of George M. Zumwalt, deceased. The demanded premises consist of four acres of land, upon which are a dwelling house and other improvements. In May, 1897, Mrs. Larkin, who was then the owner of the land, executed and delivered her deed purporting to grant it to said George M. Zumwalt, and if that deed took effect according to its terms, the plaintiff at the commencement of the action was the owner and entitled to the possession of the premises. The adverse claim of the defendant, who is a brother of plaintiff's intestate, and who ousted the plaintiff in October, 1900, is based upon a deed of that date from their father, Isaiah Zumwalt, purporting to grant the premises to him and to another brother; and he defends the action upon the allegation that his brother George took and held the bare legal title to the land under the conveyance from Mrs. Larkin in trust for his father, who, he claims, purchased it for his own use, paid the full purchase price from his own funds, and personally received Mrs. Larkin's deed when it was delivered; his sole purpose in having his son named as the grantee being to screen the property against any possible claim of his wife, from whom he had been separated, whether by divorce or agreement does not appear. The cause was tried in the superior court without a jury, and the findings were in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant as to every material issue. With respect to the equitable defense of a resulting trust in favor of Isaiah Zumwalt and his grantees, they were, in effect, that the land was purchased from Mrs. Larkin by George M. Zumwalt and the deed delivered to him; that the purchase money ($150) was given to him by his father as an advancement in furtherance of his proposed marriage to the plaintiff, and upon an understanding that after the marriage the old man was to have his home with them during the remainder of his life; that when the dwelling erected on the land was ready for occupancy the marriage took place, and from that time until June, 1900, the father, son, and daughter-in-law resided there together. Towards the close of this period dissension arose between the father and the young people, and on the 7th of June he shot and killed his wife and son, and his son's infant child, and seriously wounded the plaintiff. Afterwards, while in jail, he executed the deed under which defendant claims title, and in pursuance of which he took possession of the premises in the absence of the plaintiff. Upon these and other findings judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for restitution of the demanded premises and for mesne profits. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, alleging errors in certain rulings of the court, and contending that the evidence does not support the findings of fact.

As to the evidence, we think it is abundantly sufficient to sustain the findings, without regard to the testimony of the plaintiff herself; and as to her testimony we do not think it involves any such inconsistencies or contradictions of statements made elsewhere as to have required the court to disregard it. In all material particulars it is entirely consistent with itself, and it is strongly corroborated by the testimony of apparently respectable and wholly disinterested witnesses. There was no error—certainly no prejudicial error—in the rulings of the court upon objections to evidence. To sustain his equitable defense of a resulting trust the defendant offered to prove that the plaintiff during the lifetime of her husband had made certain declarations or admissions favorable to his claim. Upon plaintiff's objection to the competency of her declarations or admissions to impeach her husband's title to the land, the evidence was excluded, and we think properly so. Her husband's estate could not be bound by her admissions. And, besides, the plaintiff was afterwards examined as a witness and testified fully as to all these matters. If defendant had desired, he could then have offered all this rejected evidence to impeach her; for there was nothing in the previous rulings of the court to prevent him from making this legitimate use of the evidence, which was all contained in the depositions of two of his sisters then on file in the case.

The defendant, by his answer, also asserted a prescriptive title to the premises by adverse possession for more than five years, but under the findings of the court as to his claim of constructive trust, there is no support for this defense. If Isaiah Zumwalt gave his son the money to pay for the land upon the sole condition that he should be provided with a home there, his subsequent residence on the premises as a member of the family did not constitute possession, and certainly there was nothing to give it the character of an exclusive or adverse possession. Defendant's adverse possession commenced in October, 1900, and the action was commenced in February, 1903.

The only remaining question in the case arises out of the ruling of the court denying the motion of the defendant to call in another judge to preside at the trial. The motion was based upon the alleged bias of the judge (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, par. 4), and was supported by the defendant's affidavit averring his belief that he could not have a fair and impartial trial before Hon. M. P. Bennett, the judge of the superior court of El Dorado county, by reason of the prejudice and bias of said judge, and alleging as grounds of his belief, the following facts: "That at a trial of this affiant in the justice's court of Mud Springs township, in said county, the said Hon. M. P. Bennett, who was then district attorney of said El Dorado county, declared that if he had known as much about the case just tried before it had been tried as he knew at the end of the trial he would have dismissed the charge of battery, and have taken me up on his own responsibility for assault to murder, and sent me across the bay where I belonged, meaning thereby that he would endeavor to send me to the state penitentiary; that said declaration by said Hon. M. P. Bennett was the expression of a malevolent desire on his part to injure this affiant, and that there was no just ground for such remark, as the case was a mere petty quarrel, and that upon conviction of affiant upon the charge of battery a sentence of six months in the county jail or $250 fine was imposed upon affiant; that thereupon every public officer in the city of Placerville, except Judge Bennett, and all the merchants and business men of Placerville, petitioned the Governor of the state to interpose his executive clemency to relieve affiant from what they considered to be a grossly unjust and severe sentence, and that said Hon. M. P. Bennett went personally to the Governor and protested so forcibly against any action on his part that the Governor declined to interfere; that said Judge Bennett has ever since regarded affiant with hostility, and that at the trial of a certain criminal cause entitled 'People v. Isaiah Zumwalt' in the month of September, 1900, in which the plaintiff in this present action, Mrs. Rose H. Zumwalt, was the prosecuting witness, and affiant was diligently aiding the defense, the foregoing facts were set out by affiant in an affidavit filed by the defendant in said criminal proceeding in support of a motion made by the defendant in that case for a change of judge, which affidavit has since disappeared from the records of said El Dorado county and cannot now be found; that said motion was heard by Hon. J. H. Hughes, superior judge of Sacramento county, Cal., who determined that upon the facts alleged the said Judge Bennett was disqualified from trying the said original cause of People v. Isaiah Zumwalt, by reason of his prejudice and bias against the said defendant therein and this affiant, and said cause was thereupon tried before Hon. F. T. Nilon, superior judge of Nevada county; that in this present case the plaintiff, Rose H. Hoyt, is the same person who was the prosecuting witness in the said criminal cause, and that the testimony necessary to be offered and used on the trial of this present action will include a part of the matters testified to on the trial of said criminal proceeding, and that the same reasons that disqualified the said Hon. M. P. Bennett on the trial of the said criminal proceeding also disqualify him to try the present action; that affiant requested his counsel to suggest these matters to the superior court of El Dorado county in the hope and belief that said Hon. M. P. Bennett would, on such suggestion, of his own motion declare his disqualification, ad request another judge to sit in his place on the trial of this action, and that affiant is informed by his said counsel and verily believes, and on such information and belief avers the fact to be, that said Hon. M. P. Bennett refused to make any request to any other judge to try this action and declared that he is not disqualified, and if any affidavit as to facts showing his prejudice and bias against affiant were filed, he, the said Judge Bennett, would cause counter affidavits to be filed, and would unless affiant would put up the money to pay another judge to come here and try said action, refuse to allow any other judge to try said cause, but if affiant would put up the money to pay another judge to come to this county, he, the said Judge Bennett, would then call in some other judge to try this case; that affiant is advised by said counsel that for affiant to furnish money, or to offer to furnish money, to pay another judge to come to this county to try said cause, would be contrary to the law and a contempt of court, and contrary to public policy. C. T. Zumwalt."

The plaintiff, in opposition to the motion, filed the affidavit of the judge, and of a witness, who, as constable, was present throughout the trial referred to by the defendant in his affidavit, and who deposes that he heard no such language used by Judge Bennett—then district attorney of El Dorado county—as alleged by defendant. The affidavit of the judge shows that the trial referred to was had in 1887, 16 years before the trial of this cause; that he attended the trial of the defendant, his father, and one Brown, jointly charged with the crime of battery, at the request of the justice of the peace of the township, and in obedience to his official duty; that the defendants were entire strangers to him; that on the evidence produced they were all three convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $250; that the judgment was just, and erred, if at all, on the side of leniency; that he did not at any time use the language attributed to him, and that if he said anything at all resembling it he did so in the argument addressed to the court in commenting upon the evidence; that subsequently a petition for the pardon of the defendants was circulated in the county containing a misstatement of the facts of the case; that he refused to sign it, and to prevent the Governor from being misled in the matter, he, in the performance of his official duty, sent him a written communication—a copy of which is set out in his affidavit—containing a correct summary of the evidence adduced at the trial; that he did not go personally to the Governor to oppose the granting of the pardon; that after his official connection with the battery case ended he thought no more of the parties, and had never entertained any sentiment of personal hostility to them or either of them. His affidavit further shows that the objection to his presiding at the trial of Isaiah Zumwalt for murder was submitted to Judge Hughes upon the uncontradicted affidavit of this defendant, the same in substance as his affidavit in this case, except as to those proceedings. He admits that he expressed his willingness to invite another judge to preside at the trial if defendant would pay the expense of his attendance, but says that, deeming himself not disqualified, he was unwilling to subject the county to the expense involved in calling another judge.

The court did not err in refusing the request of the defendant that he should call in another judge to hear and determine the motion and did not err in denying it on the showing made. The amendment constituting subdivision 4 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was considered and construed in People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 412, 56 Pac. 44, and in Talbot v. Pirkey, 139 Cal. 326, 73 Pac. 858, in both of which cases it was held that the judge whose bias is alleged must himself decide the motion, but that he must decide it upon the facts averred in the affidavits without reference to his state of mind. It was therefore the right—if not the imperative duty—of Judge Bennett to decide the motion, and it was also his privilege to contradict special averments of defendant's affidavits as to any matters of fact from which bias might be inferred. He had a right, for instance, to deny the use of the language which the defendant charged him with having used at the trial for battery, though he might have found it a delicate matter to decide the question if he had not been corroborated by a disinterested witness. He had a right also to show—what the affidavit of the defendant did not show—that 16 years had elapsed since the trial of the battery case, that he had not gone to Sacramento to make a personal appeal to the Governor to refuse a pardon, that he had merely reported the facts of the case in writing, as his official duty required, and, although he could not base his decision upon his consciousness that he was free from bias, it was not improper for him to state that fact. Our view in regard to this matter is that an affidavit which merely avers the belief of a party that a judge is so biased against him that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial of his cause amounts to nothing. To support the motion facts must be stated from which it may be reasonably inferred that such bias exists. When such facts are averred the belief or the affidavit of the judge that he is not biased is no ground for denying the motion; but as to specific facts, which uncontradicted might justify the inference of bias, the judge is as competent a witness as any other, and, if the facts happen to be exclusively or peculiarly within his own knowledge, it is entirely proper that he should state them. In opposition to this view it is urged that the judge will necessarily find the fact as he has averred it, and that this would be to make him a judge in his own cause. But the proposition is entirely unfounded. The cause is not his. He has no interest pecuniary or otherwise in trying it—if he had he would be disqualified on other grounds—and where he has no interest in the cause he has a right to consider probative facts within his own knowlegde, if put in the form of an affidavit, in determining the ultimate fact of bias or indifference.

In this case, upon all the facts shown by the affidavits, there was nothing to support the motion of defendant except the bare circumstance that Judge Bennett, 16 years before the motion was made, had, in the discharge of his duty as district attorney, prosecuted and convicted the defendant, his father, and a confederate of an aggravated case of battery, and had then in his official capacity laid the facts before the governor for his information in passing upon a petition for a pardon. From such facts no just inference arises that he could not try the cause with perfect impartiality.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BURNETT v. PIERCY et al. (three cases). (S. F. 4,390, 4,411, 4,412.)

1. Appeal—Parties to Appeal—Effect of Failure to Give Notice.

Where, in partition, it was decided that plaintiff and two of the defendants each owned a one-third interest, and that another defendant had a lien on the interest of one of the parties, and defendant on appeal failed to give such fourth party notice of the appeal, it was not ground for dismissal, as the court might decide the case as to the parties before it without injury to the fourth party's interests.

2. Same—Notice of Appeal—Admission of Service.

Where notices of appeal were not addressed to a party nor to his attorney, the admission of service by such attorney, who was also attorney for another party, limited by a statement following the attorney's signature to an admission to the latter party only, did not constitute an admission of service as to the other party.

3. Same—Waiver of Failure to Give Notice.

A stipulation filed on appeal by the attorney of record for a party and signed by him as attorney for such party, stipulating that the appeal had been "perfected," waived any failure to serve notice of appeal on such party.

4. Deed—Construction—Repugnant Clauses.

Civ. Code, § 711, provides that conditions in a deed restraining alienation, where repugnant to the granting clause, are void. Section 1642 provides that several contracts between the same parties as to the same matters are to be taken together. Section 1641 provides that the whole of a contract is to be taken together, and section 1636 provides that a contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intent of the parties. Held, that when, on a fair consideration of all the parts of a deed and of the contemporaneous instruments constituting parts of the same transaction, it appears that it was the intent of the parties by other expressions in the deed to limit the effect of the granting clause so that it should not transfer the entire estate, but only a limited estate, the rule that repugnant conditions restraining alienation are void, does not apply unless the conditions refer to the limited estate actually granted.

5. Powers—Construction—Joint Execution.

A husband and wife, the owners of certain land, conveyed it in trust, with a provision for the reconveyance by the trustee to the grantors according to the terms in a deed "already prepared to be executed." The reconveyance by the trustee was executed contemporaneously to the grantor and his wife, and gave the wife the exclusive control, with the right to the income during her life, she not to convey or incumber the land except by the joint deed of herself and husband, with the intent that, on her death, if the property had not been disposed of by such an instrument, it was to vest in the children then living and the lawful issue of those who had died. The survivor of the two grantors was to retain the right to control the property and receive the rents during his or her natural life, and at the death of the survivor it was to vest in the children. Held, that the power to dispose of the fee by a joint act of the grantees ceased to exist on the death of one of them.

6. Deed—Nature of Estate—Life Estate.

Land was conveyed to a husband and wife, the wife having the right to control the property and receive the income during her life, but without power to convey, except by the joint deed of herself and husband, it being the intent of the deed that on her death, if the property had not been disposed of by a joint instrument, it was to vest in the children of the grantees then living or the lawful issue of such as had died, the survivor to retain the right to control the property and receive the income during his life, and at his death it was to vest in the children. Held that on the death of the husband the wife had only an estate for life.

7. Partition—Answer — Sufficiency as Predicate for Accounting.

In partition, an answer of a defendant to the effect that another defendant had received rents for which he had not accounted, and praying for an accounting, was a sufficient foundation on which to base an accounting.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Three separate actions for partition by Viola Piercy Burnett against Edward M. Piercy and others, in each of which Edward M. Piercy appeals from an interlocutory judgment of partition and by stipulation the appeals were heard together. The parts of the judgment in each of the cases declaring the interests of the parties and directing partition affirmed and remanded for further proceedings, but reversed in so far as they require appellant to render an account.

Jackson Hatch and W. F. Williamson, for appellant. H. V. Morehouse, J. E. Alexander, J. H. Meredith, Lloyd & Wood, and Thomas F. Barry, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In three separate actions for partition, entitled as above, interlocutory judgments of partition were entered, from each of which the defendant Edward M. Piercy appeals. By stipulation between all the respective parties it has been agreed that the three appeals shall be heard and determined together, upon a single transcript. It appears from the stipulation that the decision of all of the cases depends on the same facts and affects the same parties. The respondents present a motion to dismiss the appeals, the ground of the motion being that in each case there was a failure to serve the notice of appeal upon Christopher C. Rivers, one of the respondents, that he is a necessary party to any disposition of the case, and hence, that this court has no jurisdiction of the appeals.

By the interlocutory judgment it was declared that Viola Piercy Burnett, Edward M. Piercy, and Andrew J. Piercy were each the owner of an undivided one-third interest in the real property, and that the defendants Thomas W. Rivers and Christopher C. Rivers had a lien and charge against the interest of Andrew J. Piercy for $10,500, which was secured by a deed of trust of said lands theretofore executed by him to them. In his answer Edward M. Piercy alleged that he is the owner of the whole of the property, and that neither of the other parties had any interest therein, and this is his contention upon the appeals. It is apparent, therefore, that, so far as the lien of Christopher C. Rivers, or his interest in the joint lien of himself and Thomas W. Rivers, is concerned, the court can make no valid disposition of the cases on appeal, unless it has in some way obtained jurisdiction of the cases as to him. The court can, however, notwithstanding such failure to secure jurisdiction as to Christopher C. Rivers, decide the cases with respect to the interests of the other parties, so far as it may be done without injuriously affecting his interests. If the appeals result in an affirmance of the judgments, of course his interests will not be disturbed. If they result in a reversal, the cases must be remanded for new trial, or with directions to enter judgments in favor of Edward M. Piercy and dismissing the actions. In either of the latter contingencies, if jurisdiction does not exist as to Christopher C. Rivers, the former judgments will be final as to him, notwithstanding the reversal as to the others, and the result will be that the estate of Edward M. Piercy, as to the undivided one-third of the land claimed by Andrew J. Piercy, will be subject to the interest of said Rivers under the trust deed, and to his interest in the lien secured thereby. No persons will be affected by this lien, except the appellant himself and the respondent James Gould, Jr., who claims a lien for $6,000 and interest, secured by a mortgage executed by Edward M. Piercy purporting to mortgage the whole estate in said lands, and who was, by the judgments, declared to have a lien by virtue thereof upon a one-third interest only. The appellant cannot justly complain; for he will have himself brought the appeals to this court without making said Rivers a party thereto. He does not complain, and is not only content, but is insisting upon having his appeals decided, so far as it can be done with the parties before the court who are properly served. Gould cannot be injured by the appeals. He has not himself appealed, and he is satisfied with his lien as given by the interlocutory judgments, confining it to the undivided one-third of the land. The only effect upon him of successful appeals by the present appellant, will be that his security will be extended to two-thirds with a second lien upon the remaining third, whereas, if the appeals are dismissed he will have a lien upon one-third only. The appeals could, therefore, be decided by giving to the parties thereto such relief as the record warrants, and providing in the judgments of this court on the appeals that they shall not in any wise affect the right or interest of Christopher C. Rivers. Under such circumstances an appeal will not be dismissed. The court, having jurisdiction of the parties properly before it, will hold the appeal in order to determine the rights of such parties with respect to each other. Williams v. S. C. Mining Ass'n, 66 Cal. 195, 5 Pac. 85.

We are further of the opinion that this court has jurisdiction of the appeals as to Christopher C. Rivers. It may be conceded, as claimed by the respondents, that there was no service upon him of the notice of the appeals. The notices were not addressed to him, nor to his attorney, that is to say, neither his name nor that of his attorney appears in the list of persons given in the introductory clause as those to whom notice is given thereby. The admission of service by Mr. Barry, who was attorney of record for him and also for Thomas W. Rivers, was limited, by the statement following the signature, to an admission for Thomas W. Rivers only. Under the principle of the decision in Estate of Pendergast, 143 Cal. 138, 76 Pac. 962, and the cases there cited, this does not constitute an admission of service by or for Christopher C. Rivers, and hence the notices were ineffectual as to him. But it has been said that "the notice of appeal by which the adverse party is brought before this court corresponds to the summons by which he is bought before the superior court. * * * The notice itself, like the issuance of a summons, may be waived. A voluntary appearance will be equivalent to a personal service of the notice, but the mere waiver of the service is insufficient. There must, in addition, be given a notice of appearance, either in person or by attorney." In the cases at bar there is a stipulation on file signed by "Thos. F. Barry, attorney for defendants and respondents, Thomas W. Rivers and Christopher C. Rivers." This stipulation recites that "said Edward M. Piercy has duly perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court of the state of California from the interlocutory judgment" in one of the cases, particularly describing it, and "has also perfected an appeal" from each of the other two judgments, describing them, that all of them were made upon the same facts and evidence, and "are to be presented to said Supreme Court for review upon said appeals upon records presenting precisely the same issues * * * and upon precisely the same briefs * * * and oral arguments." It was thereupon agreed therein that the appellant should file his record on appeal in one of the cases, and need not file any record on appeal in the other two cases, and that the appeals in the other two cases "may be heard and determined in the Supreme Court upon the transcript so to be filed" by the appellant in the first-mentioned case; that the briefs and oral arguments in the said first-mentioned case should be considered by all the parties to the other two actions, and by the Supreme Court, as briefs and arguments in the other two cases, and that "whatever order or judgment the Supreme Court shall make in said actions, in which said printed transcript is to be filed, shall be made in the other two of said actions." This stipulation was filed in this court in each of the three appeals, and in two of them constitutes the only record on appeal. In Valley Lumber Co. v. Struck, 146 Cal. 268, 80 Pac. 405, there was a similar stipulation and a similar objection that one of the respondents had not been served with notice of appeal. It was held that the stipulation constituted an appearance to the appeal, sufficient to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction thereof. In Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 180, there was a stipulation that "the appeal was duly perfected," and it was held that this was an admission that the notice of appeal had been filed, and that it could not be contradicted for the purpose of dismissing the appeal. In this case the stipulation of Christopher C. Rivers is that the appeals have been "perfected." This could not be true unless a notice of appeal had been duly served on him. Following Carey v. Brown, supra, we hold that this is an admission of the due service of a properly addressed notice of appeal upon all the parties signing the stipulation. On the authority of Valley Lumber Co. v. Struck, supra, we may also say that the stipulation constitutes an appearance to each appeal by all the respondents, and precludes a dismissal thereof for want of service of notice upon either of them. We are of the opinion that this court has jurisdiction of the appeals as to Christopher C. Rivers, and that the appeals should not be dismissed.

We now come to the merits of the case. In November, 1867, the title to the lands in controversy was vested in John C. Piercy and Mary Piercy, his wife. The title of the respective parties to this action depends on the construction and legal effect of two deeds for said lands, executed on November 16, 1867, one made by John C. Piercy and Mary Piercy to Joseph B. Crockett, and the other a reconveyance by Crockett to John C. and Mary Piercy. The deed to Crockett was in the usual form of a grant, bargain, and sale deed, except that it contained the following clause: "In trust, nevertheless, and for the purpose only, of conveying the above described premises by a deed bearing even date herewith, and to be executed immediately by said party of the second part to said John C. Piercy and Mary Piercy, according to the terms, conditions and limitations in said deed contained, which deed is already prepared to be executed." No other consideration was stated in the deed. The reconveyance by Crockett to the Piercys, referred to in the foregoing trust clause, was executed contemporaneously with the first deed, and in execution of the trust therein declared. It styled Crockett as party of the first part, John C. Piercy as party of the second part, and Mary Piercy as the party of the third part. For convenience we will designate them by name. The material parts of this reconveyance, omitting the description of lands, were as follows:

"The said [Crockett] for and in consideration of his friendship for the said [John C. and Mary Piercy], doth by these presents give, grant, convey and confirm unto John C. Piercy, his heirs and assigns, on the terms and subject to the conditions and limitations hereinafter expressed, the following described real estate. [Here follow descriptions of four tracts of land not here involved.] And the said [Crockett] in consideration of his friendship for the said Mary Piercy, does hereby give, grant, convey and confirm unto the said Mary Piercy, her heirs and assigns for her sole and separate use, free from the debts or control of her husband. [Here are inserted descriptions of three parcels of land, being the lands in controversy.] Each of the said parties of the second and third parts, being entitled respectively under this conveyance to the property heretofore conveyed to them severally as his or her separate property, and not as common property of the marriage, and the premises hereby conveyed to the said Mary Piercy to be her sole and separate estate free from the debts or control of her husband, except as herein otherwise provided. And this conveyance is upon the further condition that the said parties of the second and third parts respectively shall each have the exclusive right for and during his or her natural lifetime to manage and control and to receive the rents, profits, and income from the property hereinbefore conveyed to them severally, that is to say, each shall manage, control and receive the rents, profits and income from the property herein conveyed to him or her severally, and neither shall interfere with the other in the management, control or enjoyment of the property hereby conveyed to the other, nor in the receipt or disposition of the rents, profits or income therefrom, except as herein otherwise provided, and out of the said rents, incomes and profits, each of the said parties respectively shall pay all taxes and assessments, which shall be levied on the property herein conveyed to him or her severally, and shall keep said property in repair. [Here follow provisions requiring John C. Piercy to pay certain sums to Mary Piercy within certain periods.] And this conveyance is upon the further condition that neither one of the said parties of the second or third parts shall sell, convey, mortgage or in any wise encumber, during their joint lives, the said property or any part thereof, or erect any new buildings thereon, without the consent in writing of the other. But nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prohibit or prevent the said parties of the second and third parts from at any time conveying, mortgaging or otherwise disposing of the said property or any part thereof by an instrument or instruments in writing, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered by them jointly, nor from building upon and improving said property or any part thereof, provided they both consent in writing thereto. But if the said parties of the second and third parts shall not by an instrument or instruments in writing duly executed, acknowledged and delivered by them jointly during their joint lives, convey or dispose of the said real property, such parts or portions thereof as shall on the death of either of said parties not have been thus conveyed or disposed of, shall vest in and become the property in fee simple of the children of the marriage of the said parties of the second and third parts and the lawful issue of such of the said children as shall have died in the meantime, such issue taking per stirpes and not per capita, it being the true intent and meaning of this instrument that nothing herein contained shall restrict or limit or impair the right of the said parties of the second and third parts to convey, mortgage, encumber or dispose of the said property or any part thereof, by an instrument or instruments in writing duly executed, acknowledged and delivered by them jointly, nor shall anything herein contained be construed to restrict, limit or impair the right of each of said parties of the second and third parts to manage, control and receive the rents and income from the property herein conveyed to him or her respectively during his or her lifetime, notwithstanding the death of the other, it being the true intent and meaning hereof, that on the death of either of said parties such portion of the property hereby conveyed to the person so dying as shall not before then have been conveyed or disposed of by their joint act as hereinbefore provided shall vest in the children of their said marriage as hereinbefore stated, the survivor retaining the right to manage, control and to receive the rents and income from the property hereby conveyed to such survivor during his or her natural life, and at his or her death to vest in the children of said marriage as hereinbefore provided."

Upon this deed the following writing, signed by John C. and Mary Piercy, was indorsed, and the execution thereof duly acknowledged before a notary public: "The foregoing deed has been executed and delivered in pursuance of the trust created in a deed from us to said J. B. Crockett of even date, and is the same deed which is therein referred to as then prepared to be executed Nov. 16, 1867." John C. Piercy died in 1885. Mary Piercy died intestate on June 9, 1903. At the date of her death the only surviving children of the marriage were the two defendants, Edward M. and Andrew J. Piercy. The plaintiff was the daughter of Samuel W. Piercy, a deceased son of the marriage, and these three were the only surviving descendants. John C. and Mary Piercy did not jointly convey or otherwise dispose of any of the property. After the death of John C. Piercy, Mary Piercy executed to Edward M. Piercy a deed purporting to convey to him all of her right, title, and interest in the land. It is conceded that if the effect of the deed from Crockett was to vest in Mary Piercy an estate for her life only in the lands, with the remainder to the children of the marriage living at her death, and the descendants of such as were then deceased, and with no power in her to dispose of such remainder except by the joint conveyance of herself and John C. Piercy, then the deed made by her to Edward M. Piercy was of no effect after her death, and the judgment of the superior court, holding that Edward M. Piercy, Andrew J. Piercy and Viola Piercy Burnett were each entitled to a one-third interest in the land was correct. We are of the opinion that this was the true legal effect of the transaction in question.

The contention of the appellant is that, as the Crockett deed was made in 1867, prior to the adoption of the Codes it must be interpreted according to the rules of the common law and the statutes then in force, and that the rules of interpretation established by the Civil Code are not applicable, except so far as they restate those of the common law; that the rule which must control the effect of this deed is that of the common law, re-enacted in section 711 of the Civil Code, to the effect that conditions restraining alienation, where repugnant to the interest created by the granting clause, are void; that the grant "to Mary Piercy, her heirs and assigns," as expressed in the deed, created in her an estate in fee, including the absolute power of alienation, and that the conditions and limitations restricting her power to convey the land are repugnant to the existence in her of a title in fee; that by the operation of this rule they must be considered void and the deed construed to vest in her an unqualified estate in fee simple, and that her deed transferred the same to Edward M. Piercy. Examples of the application of this rule occur in Murray v. Green, 64 Cal. 363, 28 Pac. 118, where, after words constituting a grant in fee simple, a condition was inserted that the grantee should not convey the lands without the consent of the grantor, and the condition was held void, and also in Eldridge v. See Yup Co., 17 Cal. 51, where a limitation upon the use was held not to be effective as against a fee conveyed by the previous granting clause. It may be freely conceded that in proper cases, this rule existed in California in 1867. But it is not correct to say that the rules for the interpretation of contracts, laid down in the Civil Code, are innovations upon the common law and are not applicable to deeds executed before the adoption of that Code. That deeds are to be construed according to the laws in force at the time they were executed is true. But these rules of the Civil Code, for the most part, are parts of the common law previously existing, and are applicable to deeds and other contracts executed prior to the adoption of the Codes as fully as to those executed since. We do not think the rule stated in section 711 of the Civil Code controls the construction of the instrument in question. There are other rules which control the effect of the transaction involved here and prevent the operation of the rule stated in that section. Where two or more written instruments are executed contemporaneously, with reference to each other, for the purpose of attaining a preconceived object, they must all be construed together and effect given, if possible, to the purpose intended to be accomplished. Civ. Code, § 1642; 13 Cyc. 1642; 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 845. All parts of a deed must be applied so as to give effect and meaning to every part, if possible, each clause being considered separately and being governed by the intent deducible from a fair consideration of the entire instrument. Civ. Code, § 1641; 13 Cyc. pp. 604, 605; 2 Devlin on Deeds, §§ 836, 840. The primary object of all interpretation is to ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties. Civ. Code, § 1636; Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 487; 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 835; 13 Cyc. p. 601. All the rules of interpretation must be considered and each given its proper weight, where necessary, in order to arrive at the true effect of the instrument. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 840. There are qualifications to the effect that the intention of the parties must be lawful, and that the construction must not be contrary to some positive rule of law. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 836; 13 Cyc. p. 602; Civ. Code, § 1636.

It is a necessary conclusion from these principles of construction that when, upon a fair consideration of all the parts of a deed, and of the contemporaneous instruments constituting parts of the same transaction, it appears that it was the intention, by other expressions in the deed, to limit and qualify the effect and meaning of the granting clause, so that it should not operate to transfer the entire estate, but only a limited estate, the rule that repugnant conditions restraining alienation are void, does not apply, unless the conditions refer to the limited estate actually granted. In such cases the other provisions in the deed operate on and affect its true meaning, the granting clause is to be taken in the limited sense which the entire instrument shows it was intended to have, and the limitations and conditions relating to the fee are not to be considered as repugnant to the grant, but as descriptive of the estate conveyed, and in harmony with the grant when truly interpreted. Thus, in Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 347, the granting clause, purporting to grant, bargain, and sell, and thereby showing an intention "to convey in full property," was held to be modified and explained by a subsequent clause declaring the intention to make a quitclaim only. And in Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 295, the granting clause alone would have conveyed a fee simple, but it was held to be explained and modified by the language of the habendum, to such an extent that the effect of the entire deed was to convey a life estate only. This rule prevailed at common law (13 Cyc. pp. 643, 669; 1 Devlin on Deeds, §§ 214, 215, 215a), and it is also made a part of the Code. Civ. Code, § 1105. It was applied in Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049. In that case a grant purporting to convey a fee was held to be limited to a life estate by the language of the habendum. The case arose after the enactment of the Civil Code, but we do not understand that it was decided on the theory that the Code establishes a rule on this subject different from that which prevailed before its adoption. Morrison v. Wilson and Montgomery v. Sturdivant, supra, were each decided upon the law as it stood prior to the Code and apply substantially the same doctrine. These cases are not antagonistic to the principle of Murray v. Green, supra, and section 711 of the Civil Code. Where, as in that case, from the whole of the instrument the intent is clear to convey an unqualified fee the attempt to put restrictions upon its alienation will be held void under the rule of that case and that section. See 4 Pac. Coast Law J. 215, for a full statement of the terms of that deed. But conditions which would be void as restrictions upon the alienation of a fee conveyed by the deed may contain expressions which show that no such fee is granted, and, in construing a deed, such language must be given due weight. Where the intent to be gathered from the deed as a whole, including the otherwise void conditions, is that a lesser estate was to be conveyed, then such intention must prevail, and, as the effect will be that no fee is conveyed by the deed, there will be nothing upon which the restrictions upon the alienation of the fee can operate.

Coming now to the deed in question, we find it to constitute one part of an entire transaction comprised in three separate writings relating to the same matters between the same parties, all of which must be considered and given due weight in determining the intent and effect of the deed. The trust clause in the deed from the Piercys to Crockett shows that, although Crockett was given a fee, yet that he received it upon a certain trust to convey, and consequently that he was powerless to convey, except in accordance with the terms of the trust. Such trusts were, at that time, permitted by law. By this trust clause the deed to be executed by Crockett was referred to, and all its conditions and limitations were thereby incorporated into, and made parts of, the terms of the trust upon which Crockett held the land. Any attempt by him to convey a fee, contrary to the terms of the trust, would, therefore, have been ineffectual and void to the extent of such conflict. By the writing indorsed upon the Crockett deed and signed by them, the Piercys affirmed that deed as a performance of the trust, and again signified their intention that the estate thereby conveyed to them was limited and qualified as stated in the provisions of the deed. In view of these circumstances showing the importance attached to the limitations following the granting clause, it is obvious that, whatever would be the effect of the rule contended for by the appellant upon such limitations in ordinary cases, it has no just application to this case, where the contemporaneous instruments and the language of the deed itself show that the chief purpose of the transaction was to vest an estate in the grantors subject to and qualified by those conditions and limitations. In order to carry out the manifest intention of the parties, it is necessary that the conditions and limitations should prevail over and qualify the granting clause. When these qualifying clauses are considered, the intention to vest in Mary Piercy a life estate only, with a limited power of disposition, and nothing more, over the remainder in fee, is made plain. She was to have the exclusive right during her lifetime to manage, control, and receive the income from the property; she was to pay all accruing taxes and make repairs out of such income; she was not to convey or incumber it, except by the joint writing of herself and John C. Piercy; and, finally, it was declared to be the true intent and meaning of the deed that, upon her death, if the property had not been previously disposed of by their joint instrument, as provided in the power of disposition therein given, then it was to vest in the children of their marriage then living, and the lawful issue of such of said children as had died in the meantime, and the survivor of the two grantees was to retain "the right to manage, control, and receive the rents and income from the property hereby conveyed to such survivor, during his or her natural life, and at his or her death to vest in the children of said marriage," as above stated. These provisions all refer to the character of the estate to be vested in Mary Piercy by the deed. They accurately describe an estate for her life, and are inconsistent with the idea that she was to have a fee. It is not an essential requisite to the giving of a life estate, that it be expressly declared to be such, nor that the term "life estate" shall be used. The intention can as well be manifested by other words, referring to the estate conveyed and describing its characteristics, and if, by that means, the intention to vest a life estate only is shown, it will be as effectual as if it were expressly so stated. The intention of the parties as manifested by these instruments, that she should have nothing more than the enjoyment of the use of the property during her life, if the joint power was not exercised, is too plain for controversy. To give the deeds a contrary effect by declaring these provisions void, would produce a result which the parties manifestly intended to prevent and give the deed exactly the opposite effect to that intended. Such forced constructions should not be indulged in, unless made necessary by some positive rule of law. It is not necessary to do so here. The intention declared by the language of the parts of the deeds following the description are descriptive of the estate conveyed and must prevail over the general language of the granting clause and the estate granted is to be limited according to the effect of these conditions and limitations.

It is apparent from these special provisions that Mary Piercy had no power over the fee after the death of John C. Piercy. The power to dispose of the fee by their joint act ceased to exist upon the death of one, and thereafter the survivor was possessed of a simple life estate, without further power of disposition of the fee. The deed of Mary Piercy, made after the death of John C. Piercy, whereby she conveyed all her right, title, and interest to Edward M. Piercy, was therefore ineffectual upon the remainder, and conveyed to him only an estate during her life. Edward M. Piercy therefore stands in the same class with the other descendants and takes only his pro rata share of the land, that is to say, an undivided one-third thereof. Section 2 of the act of 1855 (St. 1855, p. 171, c. 140), which was in force when this deed was executed, provided that every conveyance of real property should "pass all the estate of the grantor, unless the intent to pass a less estate shall appear by express terms, or be necessarily implied in the terms of the grant." It is contended that the word "grant" as here used refers to the words used in the granting clause of the deed, and that when the intent to convey a less estate cannot be implied from the granting clause, the other portions of the deed cannot be resorted to for the purpose of qualifying its meaning. We do not think the word "grant" in that statute was used in the narrow sense here claimed. It refers not to the granting clause alone but to the entire instrument by which the grant is effected, and, consequently, the whole deed may be looked to in order to ascertain whether or not the intent to convey to any party thereto an estate less than the fee is "necessarily implied from the terms of the grant."

The objection that the Crockett deed could not be operative to convey the entire estate, unless it is construed to vest the fee in Mary Piercy, and that to construe it otherwise would leave the remainder in abeyance, or still vested in Crockett, is not maintainable. We do not consider it important to determine whether the estate in remainder thus disposed of by the deed was vested or contingent during the life of Mary Piercy. Whether the one or the other, it was, under the common law, a legal conveyance of a future estate. Gray on Perpetuities, §§ 108–110, 112, 113. The intent is clear that the estate in remainder after her death was to vest in the children of the marriage living at her death, and the issue of such children as should have died in the meantime taking per stirpes and not per capita, subject to defeat by the exercise of the joint power of disposition. Inasmuch as the question bears only upon the construction of the deed, and as the events upon which this remainder was to vest and by which the persons in whom it was to vest were to be determined have all happened, so that the estate is now safely vested, the precise place where this fee in remainder has been resting in the meantime need not concern us. There is no merit in the proposition that it is necessary that the fee should be conveyed to Mary Piercy in order that she should be enabled, with the concurrence of John C. Piercy, to convey a fee. The vesting of a fee in the person to whom such a power of disposition of a remainder in fee is given, is not necessary to an effectual exercise of the power. 2 Wash. on Real Prop. (6th Ed.) §§ 1659, 1661; 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1095, 1097. "A power to dispose of the land in fee may be and often is given to a tenant for life." Sedgwick v. Laflin, 92 Mass. 432. Such powers can be created by deed as well as by will. 2 Wash. on Real Prop. (6th Ed.) § 1678.

There is a finding that Edward M. Piercy has heretofore collected rents of the property and has not accounted for the same, and there is a clause in the interlocutory decree requiring him to render an account. The appellant insists that the finding is not supported by any evidence, and that in consequence thereof the judgment must be, to that extent, reversed. This contention is well founded. The answers of Andrew J. Piercy allege that Edward M. Piercy has received rents from the property for which he has not accounted, and pray that he be required to render an account. In an action for partition all the parties owning an interest in the property are actors, and this allegation is a sufficient foundation upon which to base a finding and judgment for an accounting. The bill of exceptions recites that it contains all the evidence, and upon examination we find no evidence whatever to the effect that Edward M. Piercy has received any rents from the property, or that he has been in possession of more than his undivided interest, as declared in the interlocutory judgment. The findings and judgments for an accounting are therefore unsupported by the evidence. It is not necessary, however, that the entire judgment be reversed in each case, nor that there be new trials upon the other issues. The findings and judgments of the court below defining the interests of the parties and directing a partition and a sale need not be disturbed. If, in the several cases, applications had been made to the court below for new trials or modifications of the judgments by striking out the parts relating to an accounting, doubtless they would have been granted. This feature of the cases is unimportant and obviously was not the occasion of the appeals. We think the appellant should not recover the costs of his appeals on account of these partial reversals.

The part of the judgment in each of the cases directing Edward M. Piercy to render an account is reversed, without costs to respondents, and the causes are remanded for a new trial of the issues relating to such accounting. The remaining parts of the judgment in each of the cases, declaring the interests of the respective parties and directing a partition and sale of the property are affirmed, and each cause is remanded for further proceedings to carry out the partition in accordance with the interlocutory judgment.

PRINCE v. KENNEDY.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 11, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 9, 1906.)

1. Attorney and Client—Action for Services—Pleading—Issues.

In an action by an assignee for attorneys' services, a defense that plaintiff ought not to recover because his assignors advised defendant to enter into an illegal transaction, by which defendant deceived his principal with a view to making a secret profit, and thereafter revealed the facts to defendant's principal, was unavailable, where it was not pleaded.

2. APPEAL — FINDINGS — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

A finding by the court based on conflicting evidence, and which there is substantial evidence to support, will not be interfered with on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by George H. Prince against H. Kennedy, doing business under the name of H. Kennedy & Co. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellant. Taylor & Forgy and Stutsman & Stutsman, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This is an action to recover $750 for services rendered by plaintiff's assignors as attorneys at law. The finding and judgment were in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $500 and costs. The appeal now before us is by the defendant from an order denying him a new trial. An appeal from the judgment in the same case has already been disposed of, and reference is had to that decision for a statement of the issues necessary to an understanding of this decision. See Prince v. Kennedy (No. 152; decided by this court April 7, 1906) 85 Pac. 859.

1. It is urged by appellant that plaintiff ought not to have recovered, because his assignors advised defendant to enter into an illegal transaction, by which the defendant deceived his principal, whose land he was selling, with the view of making a secret profit on such sale, and that thereafter and before the secret profits had been realized they revealed the facts as to the secret profits to defendant's principal, who instituted suit against defendant and forced a division of the secret profits between defendant and his said principal. The trouble with this contention is of a twofold character: First, it is not directed at any specific finding of the court as to the facts in the case; and, second, the whole matter relates to something entirely outside the issues made by the pleadings and having no relation whatever thereto. It was the duty of the defendant, if he had any defense of this character, to have at least shadowed it forth in his pleadings; and, of course, it is of no efficacy to argue in a court of review that the evidence is defective upon a matter not in issue and as to which no findings were either required or made. Moreover, if it be conceded that the sufficiency of the evidence as to this question can be now raised, still the evidence is in conflict concerning the matter. Taylor's testimony shows that there was no bad faith or deception practiced by his client, the defendant, or himself as attorney, in relation to the secret profits. Daneri was the owner of the property that defendant sold, and Mr. Winder was Daneri's attorney; and as to the transaction Taylor testifies: "That after lunch of the same day, Judge Winder and Mr. Daneri came to witness' office, and with paper and pencil in hand Judge Winder said, 'What is your proposition?' That witness said, 'We will give you $19,750,' and witness repeated the terms just given, which Judge Winder took down, and, after rehearsing the same to Mr. Daneri, replied, 'We accept the offer.' That witness said to Mr. Daneri, 'You understand, Mr. Daneri, that you are to get $19,750 for your place, pay the first half of the taxes, and all over and above that Mr. Kennedy is to get for his commission and the expenses of making the sale.' That Mr. Daneri nodded his head and said, 'I understand.' That witness further said, 'And you understand that you do not care, and it is none of your business, how much Mr. Kennedy got from the purchaser, over and above $19,750.' That Mr. Daneri said, 'I understand that.' And Judge Winder said, 'We understand that thoroughly.'" If it be conceded, then, that the decision and judgment of the court against defendant is equivalent to or implies a finding against the defendant as to this matter, it can still be said that there was substantial evidence to support such a finding, and therefore it is not to be interfered with.

2. That the services were performed is admitted in the answer by failure to deny the same. The only issues raised by the answer relate to the value of the services It is urged that the finding that the value of the services is $500 is not supported by the evidence. The testimony of at least two witnesses tended strongly to show that the services were worth this exact sum. Consequently we cannot disturb the finding, even though this be contradicted by other evidence.

The other points urged by appellant are disposed of on the former appeal. There is no merit in this appeal.

The order is affirmed.

DAVIS v. TRACHSLER et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. May 15, 1906.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—EXCEEDING AUTHORITY—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL.

One who purchases land of another, knowing that he is acting as agent, is bound to learn the extent of his authority, which Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, requires to be in writing, and having purchased 10 acres only, when the writing gave no authority to sell in less quantity than 20-acre lots, he acquires no right in the land, as against the owner, on account of payments made to the agent, but not received by the owner.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, §§ 529, 574–582.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by John T. Davis against Josephine Trachsler and others. From an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants Trachsler appeal. Affirmed.

Edw. J. Hill, for appellants. A. E. Ball, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to quiet title, commenced January 21, 1903. There was no demurrer. Defendants Josephine Trachsler and Frank Trachsler answered and set up their claim of interest in the land. The record does not disclose that either of the other defendants appeared at all. The judgment was against all of the defendants. Frank Trachsler and Josephine Trachsler moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and they appeal from the order denying them a new trial. The appeal comes here on a bill of exceptions.

On July 13, 1896, the respondent was the owner of 2,500 acres of land in Stanislaus county, and on that day entered into a written contract with one George W. Hopkins, whereby he appointed said Hopkins his agent for the sale of said lands upon the following considerations: "Second party is authorized to sell the said lands in parcels of twenty and forty acres each as indicated on the plat hereto attached, at the minimum prices noted on said plat, and upon the following terms, to wit: Ten (10) per cent. of the purchase price payable at time of sale, and the balance payable in eight equal semiannual installments, with interest on deferred payments at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum. Contracts of purchase and sale shall be executed by said first party and the purchaser, and, when any purchaser shall have paid one-half of the purchase price of the land purchased by him, he shall be entitled to receive from said first party a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the same, and the purchaser shall execute a mortgage to said first party for the amount due thereon, payable in accordance with the terms named in the contract. Said second party's compensation for managing the sale of said lands shall be ten (10) per cent. of the purchase price payable out of the first payments received on account of the purchase price. The said second party shall furnish said first party full reports of quarterly of sales effected and payments made and pay over to said first party all sums received by said second party, in excess of his commissions as above provided." On December 14, 1897, respondent indorsed upon said contract, "This day the within contract is canceled. J. T. Davis." And at the same time the said George W. Hopkins indorsed on said contract, under the indorsement of cancellation: "Except as to sales already made. Geo. W. Hopkins."

The answer and cross-complaint of Frank Trachsler avers that he purchased 10 acres of said land on May 24, 1897, for which he was to pay in installments the sum of $350, and entered into a written contract with plaintiff in relation to such sale, and that he made payments thereon to the amount of $276.80, which was paid at the time and in the amounts as follows, to wit: On May 24, 1897, the sum of $35.50; March 1, 1897, the sum of $39.40; June 18, 1898, the sum of $18.90; September 1, 1898, the sum of $39.40; January, 1899, the sum of $39.40; June 21, 1899, the sum of $39.40; August 18, 1899, the sum of $39.40; May 20, 1900, the sum of $18.90; and April 6, 1900, the sum of $6.50—making a total of $276.80. The first and second payments, amounting to $74.90, were made before the agency of Hopkins was canceled. George W. Hopkins testified that he made sale of the 10 acres to the said Frank Trachsler on March 24, 1897, for $367.87, and received thereon on that day the sum of $35.40, and received the balance of said $367.87 in different sums at different times, and that he gave to said purchaser the following receipt and agreement: "San Francisco, May 24, 1897. Received this day of Frank Trachsler the sum of thirty-five (35) dollars, in consideration of which I agree to sell to said Frank Trachsler at any time before March 1, 1898, that certain real property situated in Stanislaus county, California, more particularly described as the east ½ of the west ½ of lot No. one hundred and sixteen (116) of Elmwood Colony lands, the same containing about ten (10) acres of land, at the price and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter provided, the price thereof to be three hundred and fifteen (315) dollars, payable as follows, to wit: The sum of thirty-nine (39) dollars and forty (40) cents, payable on the first day of March, and an equal amount each six months thereafter, until the said sum of three hundred and fifteen (315) dollars shall have been fully paid, together with interest on all deferred payments at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, interest payable annually. In event that said Frank Trachsler shall on, or before March 1, 1898, cause to be planted in fruit trees, not less than five (5) acres of said land, then the payments herein provided to be made may at the option of said Frank Trachsler become due and payable twelve months after the dates herein above provided. The said land to be subject to a twenty (20) foot strip of land lying along the northerly line thereof for road purposes, also to right of way for necessary irrigating ditches. Time is of the essence hereof. Executed in duplicate. Geo. W. Hopkins, Gen'l Agt. for J. T. Davis. Frank Trachsler. Witness: F. McCracken."

The answer and cross-complaint of Josephine Trachsler avers that she claims some interest in a part of said land, and alleges that on the 10th day of April the plaintiff agreed in writing to sell her 10 acres thereof for the sum of $375, and that she agreed to purchase, and that she had paid $280.69 thereof. The contract made with this purchaser was not introduced in evidence, but the following receipt was admitted: "San Francisco, March 1st, 1899. $42.50. Received from Josephine Trachsler forty-two & $^{50}/_{100}$ dollars, being payment due this day on account of purchase price of the west half of the west half of lot No. 116 Elmwood Colony Lands, per contract of date Apl. 10, 1898. [Exhibit 12 in same form as Defendants' Exhibit 2.] Geo. W. Hopkins, Gen'l Agt. for J. T. Davis."

According to the testimony of Hopkins this sale was made March 28, 1898, and according to the above receipt it was made April 10, 1898; but, whether made March 28th or April 10th, he had no power to make this sale, because his indorsement on the original power is equivalent to his consenting thereto, excepting the sales made up to that date, December 14, 1897. Therefore the motion for new trial was properly denied as to her.

On further examination the witness Hopkins said he did not remember when he signed the indorsement, "Except as to sales already made," but he knew that it was signed by him after he had sold all the land he sold to the defendants in the action. This, however, cannot be reconciled with his written receipt that it was April 10, 1898, and his other statement that it was March 28, 1898. He would not swear that the cancellation was not signed at the time it bears date; says he went with McCracken to Davis with all the contracts, and asked him to sign them, but he refused, because no money had been paid to him. The defendants knew Davis had refused to sign these contracts, and this was prior to the cancellation. The respondent J. T. Davis testified that he at no time dealt with the defendants, and at no time did he receive any money from them, had no contracts with any of them, and recognized no rights they had in the land. McCracken and Frank Thrachsler came to him and wanted him to sign some contracts for the sale of the land. He said that until the money was paid him he would have nothing to do with them, and would sign no contracts made with Hopkins. This was October 27, 1897. On cross-examination he said: "The bringing of this action was the first time I notified defendants that I would not carry out the terms of the deal they made with Hopkins." He says he at no time refunded defendants the money they claimed to have paid him. He further testified in rebuttal as follows: "I told Hopkins I knew of no sales, and I repudiated all contracts at that time, for the reason that no money had been paid to me or anybody for the land. I never received any money from any of these defendants or Hopkins. The cancellation of the contract with Hopkins was signed by Hopkins and myself at the time it was dated." This is the substance of all the testimony given in the case so far as relates to the appellants. In his cross-complaint appellant Frank Trachsler accepts the "rescission" of the contract and demands the respondent repay to him the money he alleges to have paid for the land alleged to have been purchased by him, and demands a lien on said lands to secure payment of the amount of the payments made and that said lien be foreclosed. The answer of respondent to said cross-complaint denies any and all obligation to defendant, denies receiving anything from him, and pleads the statute of limitations as to the demand on him for the return of the money paid Hopkins. There is no conflict in the evidence as to the time when respondent refused to make the contract with appellant, and that such refusal was made prior to December 14, 1897, which was over five years before the action was commenced. Appellant kept on making his payments to Hopkins up to April 6, 1900; this last payment being made 2 years 9 months and 17 days before the action was commenced. If he had any cause of action to compel performance, it arose when appellant refused to contract with him, and the the statute of limitations (period of 4 years) would have run against such action. The court found all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint to be true, and that defendants have no interest in the land, are not entitled to a lien thereon; that they have no contract of purchase with plaintiff; that plaintiff never received any money from any of them; that defendants have no cause of action against plaintiff; and that if they had any claim against plaintiff the same is barred by the statute of limitations.

The question first to be determined by this court is, was the sale made by G. W. Hopkins to Frank Trachsler on March 24, 1897, within the scope of Hopkins' authority under the appointment of July 13, 1896? Authority to an agent to sell real estate must be in writing (subdivision 6, § 1624, Civ. Code), and his actual authority is only such as the principal intentionally confers or intentionally allows the agent to think he possesses. Section 2316, Civ. Code. There is no testimony tending to show the instrument by which Hopkins was appointed was recorded. But it was known by appellant that he was holding himself out to be the agent of Davis. The receipt and contract of May 24, 1897, was signed as agent. The appellant having actual notice of the agency, it was incumbent on him to ascertain the scope of authority possessed by Hopkins (Solari v. Snow, 101 Cal. 387, 35 Pac. 1004), and whether he had any right to make contracts of sale and especially the kind he made with appellant. Mudgett v, Day, 12 Cal. 139; Hayes v. Campbell, 63 Cal. 143; Stetson v. Briggs, 114 Cal. 514, 46 Pac. 603. An agent can only bind his principal when he acts within the scope of his authority. The agency of Hopkins was a special agency, with all his powers fixed and determined in the instrument appointing him, and on which the appellant himself relies. No power was given to sell the land in less quantity than 20-acre lots, yet he sold a 10-acre lot to appellant. He had no power to stipulate with the purchaser for any terms other than those named in his appointment, yet he contracted with appellant that should he plant half of said 10 acres in fruit trees on or before March 1, 1896, then, at the option of appellant, the payments would be extended to 12 months. This he had no power to do. He made no provision in his contract for procuring a deed when one-half of the purchase price was paid, and for the purchaser giving a mortgage for the balance of the purchase price, as in his appointment provided. His plain duty was that, when he had found a purchaser who was willing to purchase a 20 or a 40 acre lot on the terms and conditions mentioned in the instrument by which he was appointed, to bring such person to his principal, when it would have been the duty of the principal to make a contract of purchase, if satisfactory to him, with such purchaser on the terms named. Of course, the agent had the right to collect the first installment, which must be 10 per cent. of the was such a sale as he had power to make, purchase price, when the sale made by him and not otherwise. There is nothing in the bill of exceptions to indicate that appellant ever went into the possession of the 10 acres. He does not appear to have been a witness at the trial. We think the sale to appellant was one made entirely outside the power of the agent Hopkins to make, and, not having been sanctioned or in any way ratified by Davis, is void as to him.

Neither the question of rescission nor forfeiture is involved in this case. The agent, through no fault of the respondent, exceeded his authority in dealing with the appellant, and the appellant, knowing the scope of authority of Hopkins, or it being his duty to know, must look to Hopkins for the redress of whatever wrong he may have suffered.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is sustained.

PEOPLE v. GRILL.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Homicide—Corpus Delicti—Evidence.

Evidence in a homicide case held sufficient to prove the corpus delicti, so as to allow of admission of defendant's statements.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1225, 1226.]

2. Same—Intention—Instruction.

The instruction in a homicide case, in which defendant testified that he killed deceased by accident, that when an unlawful act is proven the law presumes it to have been intended, unless otherwise shown by the evidence, and, if defendant killed deceased, the law presumes he intended to kill him, and, unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless, is erroneous, in taking away from the jury the question of accidental killing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; A. G. Burnett, Judge.

A. J. Grill was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ross Campbell, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BUCKLES, J. The defendant was informed against by the district attorney of the county of Sonoma for the crime of murder in killing one W. S. Pearce. He was tried and convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to the state prison for life. From the judgment of conviction, and the order overruling his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

The deceased lived with his 16 year old daughter in the country. The defendant had been stopping there for some time, working at times for others. A son of deceased had also been residing with him up to about two weeks before the homicide. The deceased and defendant were hunting together on Sunday afternoon, June 23, 1905, returning about half past 7 in the evening. The deceased claimed to have left $19.50 between the mattresses of his bed, and when he returned from the hunt it was missing, and he accused the defendant with taking it. They quarreled. A disturbance was heard out of doors, and defendant took the shotgun and went out the back door, and deceased came to the front door and had undressed for bed. The noise seemed to have been made by a pet dog, and defendant said he would shoot it, and deceased remarked, "You dirty son of a bitch, if you shoot him you will never shoot another dog as long as you live." They came in the house and were quarreling about the money all the time. The daughter was out of doors, ready to go with defendant in a buggy to Mrs. Stoffal's near Lytton's Springs. She heard the shot fired, and in a minute defendant came out, and she asked him what he had shot, and he replied he had killed a skunk. Defendant and the daughter then got in the buggy and drove away. The report of the gun was heard by the witness Bennett, who was 150 yards away, and the next morning Bennett went into the Pearce cabin and found the deceased lying on the bed dead. He had been shot with a shotgun. The wound was at the top and back of the head, and there were no powder marks. The evidence showed the shot was fired from the rear, and a person sitting on the bed in the room occupied by defendant could plainly see deceased's head where the charge of shot entered. The doorway between these rooms was an open space. All the evidence up to this point, and none of it elicited from the defendant, fully established the facts that the death of deceased was caused by criminal means, and by another person, and not by his own act or by accident, and all this independently of who committed the crime. Besides, the evidence pointed very strongly to the defendant as the guilty person. At this point objection was made to the admission, actions, and statements of defendant, upon the ground that the facts above narrated did not establish the corpus delicti. People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63 Pac. 1001. The objection was overruled, and upon the same ground, and that without these admissions and statements of defendant the corpus delicti had not been proven, defendant moved a dismissal and to have the court instruct the jury to acquit. The court denied the motion, and we think very properly. The corpus delicti involves the elements of crime, and in order to prove it all the elements of crime must be made to appear before defendant's confessions, admissions, or statements are admissible for any purpose. In other words, every necessary element to show the act was a crime must be proven before anything the defendant may have said tending to connect him with such crime can be given in evidence. People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440; People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 566; People v. Thrall, 50 Cal. 415; State v. Kesner (Kan.) 82 Pac. 720; People v. Ward, 145 Cal. 736, 79 Pac. 448. The corpus delicti was abundantly proved before any statement of defendant was offered in evidence.

There is a more serious assignment of error. The defendant complains of the instruction No. 6, asked by the people and given by the court. As the criticism has been quite pointed of the decision of this court rendered in People v. Solani (Cal. App.) 83 Pac. 281, we feel compelled to review the subject much more at length than we otherwise would. The ruling in the Solani Case was based upon what we conceived to be the decision in People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 267, 50 Pac. 405. Whatever conclusion counsel for the people may draw from the language used in the Newcomer Case, this is what the court said, quoting the instruction first: " 'Every person is presumed to intend what his acts indicate his intention to have been, and, if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant shot the deceased with a pistol and killed him, the law presumes that the defendant intended to kill the deceased; and, unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless.' Appellant objects to this because it omits to state that this presumption does not arise where 'the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show' that the killing was justifiable. It is evident, however, that this instruction does not deal with the question as to when the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the killing was justifiable. It deals only with the question of the intent to kill. In this view the instruction would not have been erroneous if it had not closed with the expression, 'the law will not hold him guiltless.' The court no doubt intended to say that the shooting of the deceased with a pistol was sufficient proof of his intent to kill, in the absence of any other evidence tending to show that he did not intend to kill; but the conclusion that in the absence of any such other proof 'the law will not hold him guiltless' was erroneous, because he might have intended to kill and yet have been guiltless." It is true the case was not reversed because of this instruction, but upon other grounds, error in another instruction; but the court did hold that the instruction was erroneous, and we think proceeded to advise the trial court not to use it again, and that the Newcomer Case was one in which the defendant sought to show the killing was in self-defense can make no difference. The court seems to lay great stress upon the last words of the instruction, "The law will not hold him guiltless."

The instruction in the Solani Case is as follows: "Intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. The intent must be proved; but when an unlawful act is proved, the law presumes it to have been intended, unless otherwise shown by the evidence. It is never required by the prosecution to prove an unlawful intent by positive and direct evidence. In many cases such proof could not be made; and it is deemed sufficient to prove the unlawful act, and from such proof the law presumes the unlawful intent. And if the defendant in this case shot John Guidotti, and killed him, the law presumes the defendant intended to kill the deceased; and, unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless." The instruction in this case at bar is as follows: "Intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. The intent must be proved; but, when an unlawful act is proven, the law presumes it to have been intended, unless otherwise shown by the evidence. It is never required by the prosecution to prove an unlawful intent by positive and direct evidence. In many cases such proof could not be made; and it is deemed sufficient to prove the unlawful act, and from such proof the law presumes the unlawful intent. And if the defendant in this case shot W. S. Pearce, and killed him, the law presumes the defendant intended to kill the deceased; and, unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless." It is true that in declaring such instruction erroneous in the Newcomer Case no reference is made to other cases in which the instruction has been held good. In the case at bar the defendant testified in his own behalf, and said he was taking the shotgun from his bed to hang it on the wall when it was accidentally discharged and shot the deceased, and we think to give the last clause of the instruction is taking away from the jury the question of accidental killing. The jury was told, "And if the defendant in this case shot W. S. Pearce, and killed him, the law presumes the defendant intended to kill the deceased." Now he did shoot the deceased, and he did kill him, and therefore he intended to kill him. The court then said to the jury: "Unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless." It can make no difference, in our opinion, that the words "unlawful killing" were used in Solani Case and the case at bar, and were not used in the Newcomer Case. The words "unlawful killing" in the instruction stand too far away from the words "the law will not hold him guiltless" for them to have the qualifying effect the Attorney General claims for them.

People v. Langton, 67 Cal. 428, 7 Pac. 843, is a case which the Attorney General cites and a case in which the court sustains a somewhat similar instruction. The question raised here and in the Solani Case was not raised there. The contention there was that the instruction fixed upon the defendant to show by testimony adduced by himself what his intention was. And the court said: "The words 'unless the defendant can show' mean unless he can or does show from the whole evidence in the case." In People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 162, 22 Pac. 127, 549, cited by the Attorney General, the words "unless the defendant can show" were changed to "unless it is shown by the evidence," thus expressing clearly just what the court had said the words in the Langton Case intended. And the court approved it by simply saying, "The eleventh instruction stated the law correctly," referring to the Langton Case.

We feel certain this instruction was prejudicial to defendant's rights, and entitles him to a new trial. We again call attention to the Newcomer Case as furnishing authority in this case for this ruling. Not necessary to notice other assignments of error.

Judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

3 Cal. App. 519

GRANGE CO. v. FARMERS' UNION & MILLING CO.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. SALES — STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU — TERMINATION OF TRANSIT.

Civ. Code, § 3078, declares that the transit of property is at an end when it comes into the possession of the consignee, or its agent, unless the agent is employed merely to forward the property, and section 3080 declares that stoppage in transit can be effected only by notice to the carrier or depositary of the property, or by taking actual possession thereof. Plaintiff sold certain grain to C. & Co., which was shipped according to their directions to defendant. A draft on C. & Co. was returned dishonored on September 15th and they became bankrupts on the 16th. Plaintiff obtained the shipping receipts on the next day, and notified the railroad agent not to deliver the grain to defendant, but was informed that it had already been delivered, whereupon notice was given to defendant, not that the grain should not be forwarded to C. & Co., but that plaintiff held the shipping receipts and demanded warehouse receipts; defendant having stored the grain for C. & Co. Held, that defendant was not a mere forwarding agent, and that there was no effective stoppage in transitu.

2. BANKRUPTCY — REDELIVERY OF SHIPPING RECEIPTS TO SELLER—EFFECT TO REVEST TITLE.

Where a bankrupt consignee of grain, after the filing of a bankruptcy petition against him, redelivered the shipping receipts for the grain to the seller, the grain having been already delivered to the consignee by the carrier, such redelivery did not operate to reinvest the seller with the title, which had already become vested by operation of law in the bankrupt's trustee.

3. SALES—PASSING OF TITLE—INTENTION OF PARTIES.

Where, by a course of business between buyer and seller, the conduct of the latter indicated an intention to pass title to grain shipped on delivery of the grain to the carrier, the title vested in the buyer as of the date of shipment, as provided by Civ. Code, §§ 1140, 1141.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. D. Nutter, Judge.

Dennett & Wathall, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Action to recover the value of certain grain which appellant claims the respondent converted to its own use. On September 8, 1904, the appellant corporation sold two car loads of wheat, and one car load of oats to A. B. Costigan & Co., of San Francisco, who directed that the grain be shipped to them, care of the Farmers' Union & Milling Company, at Stockton. The grain was loaded and shipped according to directions, and the shipping receipts were sent to the purchaser's office in San Francisco. The wheat was shipped on September 12th and the oats two days later. On the last mentioned day the appellant issued its draft upon A. B. Costigan & Co., payable to the First National Bank of Modesto, for the sum of $1,500, and on September 15th this draft was returned after dishonor and protest. A. B. Costigan & Co. filed their petition in bankruptcy about 4 o'clock on September 16th, and three-quarters of an hour thereafter the shipping receipts were, pursuant to directions previously given, mailed to the appellant at Modesto. Upon receiving notice that the draft had been protested, the vice president and assistant manager of appellant went to San Francisco, and was informed of the bankruptcy of Costigan & Co. and of the return of the shipping receipts. He returned to Modesto, procured the shipping receipts, and went to Stockton, where, on September 17th, he notified the railroad agent not to deliver the grain to respondent, but was informed that it had already been delivered. There can be no question that the grain had been delivered and unloaded by respondent before appellant took any steps to prevent its delivery according to the billing instructions, which required that it be delivered to respondent. The car load of oats was delivered after the wheat. It reached Stockton on September 15th, was placed in the private yard on the private tracks of respondent on the 16th, and unloaded on the morning of the 17th, before appellant had notified the railroad agent not to deliver it, and before said agent had communicated with respondent. The business of respondent with A. B. Costigan & Co. was generally a warehouse business. At times respondent loaned them money on grain in the warehouse. On July 13, 1903, an agreement was entered into between A. B. Costigan and respondent, by the terms of which all grain and grain bags stored with the latter became pledged as security for advances made to A. B. Costigan & Co. Just prior to the delivery of the grain in question, the respondent made certain shipments of grain for their pledgor, with the distinct understanding that it was to be replaced with grain to be shipped by appellant within a few days. At no time subsequent to July 13, 1903, was respondent acting as the mere agent of A. B. Costigan & Co. to forward property to the latter as consignee. There is abundant evidence to show that, according to the customary and unvarying business methods and usage obtaining between these two concerns, the delivery of this grain to respondent constituted a complete and final delivery to Costigan & Co. Of course there is a conflict in the evidence on this and other vital points, but every presumption and intendment must be indulged in favor of the action of the trial court, and hence we are compelled to accept the evidence supporting the findings and judgment as absolutely true.

The first point urged by appellant is that the grain was stopped in transit, and that appellant by recaption had resumed possession thereof before final delivery. "A seller or consignor of property, whose claim for its price or proceeds has not been extinguished, may, upon the insolvency of the buyer or consignee becoming known to him, after parting with the property, stop it while on its transit to the buyer or consignee, and resume possession thereof." Civ. Code, § 3076. "The transit of property is at an end when it comes into the possession of the consignee, or into that of its agent, unless such agent is employed merely to forward the property to the consignee." Civ. Code, § 3078. Stoppage to transit can be effected only by notice to the carrier or depositary of the property, or by taking actual possession thereof." Civ. Code, § 3080. That respondent was the agent of the consignee is shown, not only by the whole course of business between them, but by the conduct of appellant in billing the grain to be delivered to respondent Stockton and endeavored to prevent deconduct of appellant's agent who went to at Stockton and endeavored to prevent delivery of the grain according to the terms of the bill of lading. Every act of appellant's agents before and after delivery of the grain to respondent, unerringly and convincingly indicates full knowledge that the grain was to be delivered to respondent and stored in its warehouses at Stockton, and that such delivery was considered as a final delivery to Costigan & Co. This is evidenced by the very terms of the bill of lading, by the draft pursuant to business usage between seller and purchaser, and by the steps taken to exercise the right of stoppage in transit, which but for tardiness would have been all sufficient. In all of this record we can find nothing indicating a belief that respondent was a mere forwarding agent. If such belief had been entertained, the ordinary, usual, and legal course would have been to give immediate notice to respondent, as depositary of the property not to forward the same to the consignee. Instead of giving such notice, however, two notices were served, both notifying respondent that appellant held the shipping receipts, and demanding the warehouse receipts. This is hardly reconcilable with the theory that respondent was regarded as a mere forwarding agent, or that delivery to respondent was not regarded as a delivery of the consignee. The context of both notices, and particularly the one dated September 22d, clearly demonstrates that appellant entertained no such idea. Much is said about the secret pledge claimed by respondent, but in the view we take of the matter, the existence or validity of this pledge concerns neither the appellant nor this court. This action is brought upon the theory that appellant owned and had a right to the possession of this grain, because it was stopped in transit before delivery to the consignee. If it was delivered to an agent not employed merely to forward the property to the consignee, before the right of stoppage in transitu was exercised, then appellant must fail in this action whether respondent has a lien or not. Having reached the conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to support the implied finding that it was so delivered, it is unnecessary to consider the intricate and interesting questions which would be presented if a mere forwarding agent was attempting to enforce a pledge under the circumstances disclosed by this record.

The second point urged is that the return of the shipping receipts was a symbolical redelivery of the grain, or at least a refusal to accept it. We do not think it had any such effect. At the time such receipts were returned the grain had been delivered to the consignee, through its agent, to whom it was shipped. Most of it had been unloaded and stored, and the remainder was in a car which had been delivered by placing it on the private tracks, in the private yard of the respondent. It was, through such delivery, in the possession of the consignee whose property it became beyond power of recall by the seller. If it be admitted that the mere return of the receipts issued by the carrier to the shipper can in any case operate as a symbolical redilivery of or a refusal to accept the goods shipped, it certainly could not have such effect under the circumstances disclosed by the record before us. The legal status of the property had been fixed by its delivery to the respondent as agent of the consignee, and no act of the latter could change or vary the legal effect of such delivery. Waiving all other considerations, the consignee, after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, was absolutely without power to restore to appellant the property interest in the grain which had previously been delivered. The legal effect of filing such petition was to place the grain and other property of A. B. Costigan & Co. in custodia legis for the benefit of all creditors of the bankrupt firm. For this, if for no other, reason, the consignee was powerless to make a symbolical redelivery of the grain thus revesting the legal title thereto in appellant, and was equally powerless to repudiate the act of its agent in accepting possession of the same. Bankruptcy Act U. S. July 1, 1898, c. 541, §§ 1, 3, 18, subd. "g," and sections 29, 70, 30 Stat. 544, 546, 551, 554, 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3418, 3422, 3429, 3433, 3451]. Nothing the bankrupt consignee should do at that late hour would or could vest the legal beneficial interest or title to the grain in the shipper, who had completely parted with possession of the property, and had lost his right of recaption. There is another view of the case thus far unnoticed which is fatal to appellant's claim. The course of business between the buyer and seller, the conduct of the latter, and every circumstance attending the sale of the grain, indicates an intention on the part of appellant to transfer the title to the grain at the time of shipment. Under the express provisions of the Code this vested the title to the property sold in the buyer. Civ. Code, §§ 1140, 1141; Lassing v. James, 107 Cal. 356, 40 Pac. 534; Greenbaum v. Martinez, 86 Cal. 463, 25 Pac. 12; Blackwood v. Cutting P. Co., 76 Cal. 216, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; Crocker v. Field, 93 Cal. 534, 29 Pac. 225; Habenicht v. Lissak, 77 Cal. 144, 19 Pac. 260.

It results from the foregoing that, as plaintiff's case necessarily rested on its ownership and right to the possession of the grain, the findings and judgment to the contrary are fully supported by the evidence, and therefore the judgment and order are affirmed.

MASCAREL v. MASCAREL'S EX'RS et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 14, 1906.)

1. ESTOPPEL—BY DEED—PASSAGE OF TITLE—INTENTION OF GRANTOR—CONCLUSIVENESS.
A deed executed and delivered is conclusive as to the intention of the grantor to convey the property.
[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Estoppel, §§ 19, 20, 63, 64.]

2. GIFTS—DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS.
The doctrine of donatio causa mortis applies only to personal property, as provided by Civ. Code, §§ 1146, 1149, et seq.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by Jesus Felis Mascarel, for whom was substituted her executor after her death, against Jose Mascarel's executors and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel and Haas & Garrett, for appellants. H. G. Weyse and Friend E. Lacey, for respondent.

SMITH, J. In the complaint the plaintiff's title is deraigned under a deed of conveyance of Jose Mascarel, deceased, of date December 26, 1895, which it is alleged was duly delivered by him to the plaintiff; and it is also alleged (besides other necessary allegations) that the plaintiff is, and ever since the date of said deed has been, the owner of the property. These allegations are denied by the appellant defendants, who are heirs of Jose Mascarel; and it is further alleged that at the death of Jose Mascarel he was still the owner of the property in controversy. The other heirs disclaim. The court finds all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and judgment was entered accordingly for the plaintiff, from which the appellant defendants appeal.

The points urged by the appellants, or such as need be considered, are: (1) That the deed in question was never delivered to her; (2) that it was not intended by him that the title should pass; and (3) that, the deed being made in view of impending death, the grantor had the right to revoke the deed during his lifetime. But the first point is disposed of by the finding, which is fully sustained by the evidence; and, assuming the facts to be as stated, the deed itself is conclusive as to the intention of the grantor. As to the third point, the doctrine of donatio causa mortis applies only to personal property (Civ. Code, §§ 1146, 1149, et seq.); and here no facts are pleaded or found tending to raise a trust in favor of the grantor of the deed, nor are any such facts shown by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

MATTERN et al. v. CANAVAN et ux.

1. PARTNERS—AGENTS FOR FIRM—PERSONAL PROFITS.

Each partner is the agent of the others as to all partnership transactions, as provided by Civ. Code, § 2429, and hence cannot make a personal profit at the expense of his partners by deception as to the price paid for property purchased for the firm.

2. TRUSTS—RESULTING TRUSTS—EVIDENCE.

Defendant C., having made arrangements to purchase certain mining claims, for $2,000, represented to plaintiff M. that he could buy the same for $8,000, whereupon it was agreed that the claim should be purchased, M. furnishing $2,000 and C. paying $6,000 of the price; that a corporation should be organized, to which the claims should be transferred, capitalized at $1,000,000, the shares to be divided 250,000 to M., 500,000 to C., and 250,000 to be left in the treasury. This agreement was carried out, with the exception that the entire purchase price of the claims was paid with the $2,000 furnished by M. Held, that under Civ. Code, § 2431, providing that a partner is not bound by the act of a copartner in bad faith toward him, though within the scope of the partner's powers, except in favor of persons who have in good faith parted with value in reliance upon such act, such facts operated to create a resulting trust in the entire claims, or the stock representing them, for M.'s use.

Action by Harriet O. Mattern and another against J. H. Canavan and wife. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, for appellants. J. L. Murphey, for respondents.

GRAY, P. J. In this action the plaintiffs obtained a judgment against defendants decreeing that defendants held certain stock in a mining corporation in trust for the plaintiff Harriet O. Mattern, and that said stock be assigned and delivered to said plaintiff. The defendants appeal from said judgment and from an order denying them a new trial.

The only points urged for reversal are (1) that a suit to enforce a trust was not the proper remedy in the case, and (2) that the finding of the court that the defendant J. H. Canavan was acting as the agent of Mrs. Mattern when he obtained an option on the Montana group of mines is not sustained by the evidence.

As to the second point, we think the appellants do not understand the finding. It reads as follows: "That said J. H. Canavan, in purchasing said five mining claims [the Montana group], acted as the agent for plaintiff Harriet O. Mattern, and that he obtained said title in trust for her." Of course, the defendant, having admittedly paid her money and only her money for those claims and having taken the deed in his own name, held the title in trust for her, and the finding on the undisputed evidence, could not have been otherwise than it was. It is immaterial whom he acted for when he obtained the option or contract for a sale. The sale was not made until the money was paid and the deed taken out of escrow and delivered to the grantee. The material question is, whose money paid for the property?

As to the first point, we are also satisfied that plaintiffs did not mistake their remedy. The plaintiffs are husband and wife. The defendants are also husband and wife. The defendant J. H. Canavan represented that he could purchase the "Montana Group" for $8,000, and it was agreed between him and Mrs. Mattern that such purchase should be made, she paying $2,000 and he paying $6,000 therefor, and that thereafter they should form a corporation with capital stock of $1,000,000 and 1,000,000 shares, to which the property should be transferred. It was agreed that 250,000 of these shares should be issued to Mrs. Mattern, 500,000 to Canavan, and 250,000 to be left in the treasury. This agreement was carried out, with the exception that Canavan paid only $2,000 for the "Montana Group" in accordance with his previous agreement with the owners thereof. The relation between Mrs. Mattern and Canavan was analogous to that which exists between partners, and whatever Canavan did in the premises was done as the agent of Mrs. Mattern. It has often been held that each partner is the agent of the other as to all partnership transactions. Civ. Code, § 2429. The relations of the parties were therefore confidential, and each party was by law and equity forbidden to make a profit for himself at the expense of the other by deception as to the purchase price. The acquisition of property in this way by a party standing in such a relation is an act of fraud, and subjects the guilty party, not only to an action at law, but to accountability in equity as for a trust constructively raised for the benefit of the injured party. In pursuance of this rule, the plaintiff, having paid the whole purchase price of the five mining claims known as the "Montana Group," was entitled to the establishment of a constructive trust in all that property. This equitable right extended also to the stock in the corporation to which the land had been transferred, which stock may properly be said to be the proceeds of the land, as it is the only thing of value representing said land.

All these propositions find full support in an Alabama case "on all fours" with the case at bar, entitled Johnston v. Little, 37 South. 592. In that case the interest in the property is treated as a constructive trust. It is immaterial, perhaps, whether we call it a constructive trust arising from the fraud, or a resulting trust arising from the fact that the plaintiff's money paid for the land. Civ. Code, § 853. There is good ground, I think, for treating it as a resulting trust. Section 2431 of the Civil Code provides: "A partner is not bound by any act of a copartner in bad faith toward him, though within the scope of the partner's powers, except in favor of persons who have in good faith parted with value in reliance upon such act." I think the principle of this provision should be applied to the relations existing between the parties here, and that under it the plaintiff should be permitted to repudiate the agreement which she made with the defendant in its entirety, for the reason that the same was induced by the false representations and fraud of defendant. In other words, the contract between them should be treated as if it had never been made. This would leave nothing to be considered, except the fact that the plaintiff's money paid for the property, and the deed was taken in the name of defendant—a clear case of a resulting trust. But, however this may be, it is plain that under either theory the plaintiff is entitled to the entire beneficial interest in the land, and, as this has passed to the corporation, she is equally entitled to so much of the stock of the corporation as represents that interest. That whatever interest she had in the mines attaches also to the stock does not seem to be questioned by the appellant, and therefore we deem it unnecessary to further discuss that question.

There is another view to be taken of the evidence in the case which goes to confirm the views already expressed. Stripped of its fraud and stated in substance, the contract of the parties was that Canavan should buy the property for himself and Mrs. Mattern, and that each of them should have an interest in such property equivalent to the amount that each should pay therefor. Canavan paid nothing, and Mrs. Mattern paid the entire purchase price, and was accordingly entitled to the entire property. This is the way that Canavan, by his representations, made Mrs. Mattern understand the contract. It is also found by the court upon sufficient evidence that some other property was transferred to the corporation, and that for all the property transferred to the corporation Mrs. Mattern paid the sum of $2,000, and Canavan actually contributed thereto $220, and no more. Disregarding all the contracts between the parties, for the reason that they were all tainted with the misrepresentations and frauds of Canavan, and treating the corporation as a mere agency of the parties in their business transactions, as to all of which the court was fully warranted under the facts and law in so doing, it was perfectly proper to find and decree that the parties were owners of the stock of this corporation in proportions respectively represented by these amounts of $2,000 and $220 paid by them. The court made no mistake either in law or in fact in so finding and decreeing. Nor did the plaintiff make any mistake in the remedy which she sought and obtained. The decree makes no new contracts for the parties. It simply treats all the contracts between the parties as vitiated by the fraud of one of the parties to those contracts and holds them null and void for that reason, and, having thus disposed of the contracts between the parties, applies to the case the equitable doctrine of trusts, a doctrine clearly recognized by our statutes and decisions. This doctrine is also properly applied "so as to make the payment of a part of the purchase money carry with it a proportionate equitable estate in the land purchased equal to the amount paid." S. San Bernardino Co. v. S. B. Nat. Bank, 127 Cal. 245, 59 Pac. 699.

There is no merit in the appeal, and the same seems to have been taken merely for delay.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

I concur: ALLEN, J.

SMITH, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance, but I am not satisfied that the judgment can be justified on the reasoning of the opinion. In view of the terms of the contract between the parties, I do not see how the principle of resulting trust can be held to apply to the purchase of the mines; nor, in view of the fact that stock has been issued to purchasers, do I think that doctrine can apply to the stock regarded as a fund to be divided according to the terms of the contract. Had the corporation been made a party, as it should have been, I think the issue of stock to the defendants should have been held fraudulent, and the stock canceled, or assigned to the corporation. But as the corporation was not made a party, and its nonjoinder was not objected to, it was necessary for the court to determine the controversy between the parties so far as it could be done without prejudice to the rights of others (Code Civ. Proc. § 389); and under the circumstances I do not see how this could have been done otherwise than it was. The judgment is, indeed, open to the objection that the stock in controversy, which properly belongs to the corporation, is adjudicated to the plaintiff to the exclusion of the corporation and the other stockholders; but, as these are not parties, their rights are not affected by the judgment, and may be asserted in another proceeding, and at all events the appellants are not concerned with this question and have no cause to complain.

HODGES v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

HODGES et ux. v. SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 10, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 7, 1906.)

1. JURORS—CHALLENGES—NUMBER.

Where two actions were by stipulation tried by one jury, plaintiffs were entitled to only four peremptory challenges.

2. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence in an action against a railway company for injuries to a passenger while alighting at a station on the side of the train away from the station examined, and held, that the question of her contributory negligence was for the jury.

3. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF CONDUCTOR—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action against a railway company for injuries to a passenger while alighting at a station on the side of the train away from the station, in consequence of the starting of the train, examined, and held to authorize a finding that the conductor was negligent in not observing the outer side of the train.

4. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF ADULT PASSENGER—AGE OF PASSENGER—EFFECT.

The age of an adult passenger injured while alighting from a train in consequence of the starting thereof is not a circumstance showing negligence, in the absence of any evidence as to her physical and mental condition.

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action against a railway company for injuries to a passenger while alighting, in consequence of the starting of the train, the evidence showed that the train stopped only from 20 to 25 seconds, that the passenger was standing on the lower step, about to step off, when the train started, an instruction authorizing a verdict for defendant, if the accident was the result of unreasonable delay in leaving the train, was objectionable because of the absence of evidence on which it could be based.

6. CARRIERS—TERMINATION OF RELATION OF PASSENGER AND CARRIER.

The court cannot say as a matter of law that the relation of carrier and passenger ceases after the expiration of four minutes after the arrival of the train at the point of destination.

Consolidated actions by N. W. Hodges and by Caroline Hodges against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Valentine & Newby, for appellants. J. W. McKinley, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The following are the instructions referred to in the opinion: Instructions given at the request of the defendant: "(2) If you find that the plaintiff was negligent in getting off on the side of the train away from the station, and that the proximate cause of the accident was such negligence on the part of the plaintiff in alighting upon the side of the train away from the station, then you should find for the defendant." "(4) You may take into consideration the age of the plaintiff in determining whether she was negligent in attempting to step from the train after the same was in motion, if you find that the train was in motion at the time plaintiff stepped therefrom. (5) It is the duty of a passenger upon arriving at destination to leave the train promptly after the arrival of the same, and if you find that the accident in this case was the result of unreasonable delay in leaving the train, you should find a verdict for the defendant. (6) If you believe from the evidence that the defendant had provided a safe landing place at Alhambra Station for the use of the passengers getting on and off of the cars, it was the duty of any passenger knowing this, or who in the exercise of common prudence should know it, desiring to leave the train, to get off on such landing place; and if plaintiff disregarded this duty and attempted to get off on the other side of the train where there was no such landing place, and thereby caused or contributed to the injury, an action cannot be maintained, and you must find for the defendant. But whether or not the plaintiff was negligent in getting off the train on the side away from the depot is a question of fact, which you are to determine from all the evidence in the case. (7) If you believe from the evidence that the trainmen were upon the side of the train next to the station for the purpose of ascertaining whether all passengers had alighted, and that plaintiff was aware of such fact, but disregarded the same and attempted to get off on the platform on the side where there were no trainmen, and thereby caused or contributed to the injury, you must find for the defendant." "(9) If you find that the plaintiff was acquainted with the location of the station, and the habits of the trainmen to get off on that side to ascertain by an examination of that side of the train whether the passengers had all alighted, and that the cause of the injury was the fact that the plaintiff alighted from the other side of the train, then you should find for the defendant" "(11) If the jury believes from the evidence that the train had arrived at the destination of the plaintiff, and a reasonable time had elapsed for plaintiff to alight from the cars after the arrival before the injury to plaintiff had occurred, then the relation of a common carrier between the parties had ceased, and defendant cannot be held liable as a common carrier."

Two cases are involved in this appeal: The one, by N. W. Hodges for injuries to his wife received by her in alighting from the defendant's train; the other, by his wife for the same injuries. The two cases were by stipulation tried by the one jury, who returned a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment thereon entered, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

One of the points urged by the appellant is that the court erred in holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to four peremptory challenges only. But in this there was no error. San Luis Obispo v. Simas (Cal. App.) 81 Pac. 972.

Other points urged are that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and that certain instructions were erroneous. The former point, under the view we take of the case, need not be determined; but it will be proper, with a view to a consideration of the instructions, briefly to state the case as shown by the evidence. The accident occurred at Alhambra, in the county of Los Angeles. There are three tracks running east and west in front of the station; the main track being in the center. The ground between the platform at the station and the outer rail of the outer track has been leveled and oiled. The ground beyond the outer rail is on the same level, but has not been so treated. Mrs. Hodges alighted on the outer side of the outer track. Another train was standing on the main track in the vicinity of the station. Mrs. Hodges was travelling with her husband, her daughter, and the son of the latter, six or seven years old. All these, except the boy (who was not a witness), testify that upon the arrival of the train at Alhambra they "gathered their traps" and proceeded with all haste to the rear end of the car for the purpose of alighting, that the daughter had alighted and taken the boy off, and that Mrs. Hodges was standing on the lower step and about to step off, when the train started without signal or notice, by which she was thrown to the ground and injured. This testimony is uncontradicted, except possibly by the testimony of one of the witnesses, Mrs. Morrissey, who could see the car from the window of her house, and who testified that as the child was taken off Mrs. Hodges "seemed to hesitate * * * perhaps a few seconds as to * * * whether she was going to jump or stay on," and "she seemed to jump when the train had got started. * * * I think the car remained there about 20 seconds before I saw any one come out of the door." Mr. and Mrs. Hodges and their son, Wm. L. Hodges, also testify that it was customary for passengers to alight on the north or outer side of the three tracks—the first saying that as many as one-third of the passengers did this; the second, that "the trainmen always get off on the side next to the station, but the passengers don't always"; and the third, that "there are a great many people get off the north side of the car." Nor was there any contradiction of this evidence. The evidence of the defendant—so far as necessary to refer to it—consisted of the testimony of the witness already referred to, and of Bassett, the conductor, Chambers, the locomotive engineer, and Hanscomb, the business agent of the company. Bassett testifies that on the day in question "we made the usual stop there at the station," which was "at the side track and the station altogether about four minutes," and also that he and the brakeman were on the depot side of the tracks. and looked to see whether any passengers were getting off, but that they did not look on the other side of the train. Chambers testifies that "on that day, from the time I arrived at * * * the west switch and cleared the east switch, I was there four minutes." Hanscomb testifies that the stoppage in front of the station was "20 or 25 seconds," and that the usual stoppage was "from 15 to 30 seconds." It thus appears, from the testimony of Hanscombe and that of Mrs. Morrissey, that the stoppage in front of the station upon the occasion of plaintiff's alighting was "20 or 25 seconds," or, at the utmost, 30 seconds. Nor is the testimony of Bassett and Chambers inconsistent with this fact.

The second, sixth, seventh and ninth instructions, we think, were all erroneous. We are not prepared to hold that on the evidence the jury would have been justified in finding it to be negligence for the plaintiff to alight on the side of the train away from the station. But, however this may be, it is clear from the evidence that the facilities for alighting were substantially the same on both sides of the train, and that the act of Mrs. Hodges in alighting on the outer side of the train could in no way have contributed to the accident, unless upon the theory of the defendant that she might have received warning from the conductor had she alighted on the other side. But we do not think this position can be maintained; but, rather, we are of the opinion that, upon the circumstances shown by the evidence, the jury would have been justified in finding that the conductor was guilty of negligence in not observing the outer side of the train, and that it would have been hardly justified in finding the contrary. But here the question is taken from the jury, who are instructed, in effect, that if they find in accordance with the defendant's theory they must find for the defendant.

The fourth instruction, though perhaps not sufficient to reverse the case, is objectionable. The age of the plaintiff, in the absence of any evidence as to her physical and mental condition, was hardly a circumstance tending to show negligence on her part; nor is there anything in the evidence to justify this instruction.

Instructions 5 and 11 are also objectionable. As to the former, there was no evidence in the case tending to show that there was unreasonable delay on the part of the plaintiff in leaving the train. Rather the contrary is shown by the time of the stoppage of the train, which was from 20 to 25 seconds only. Nor was there anything in the evidence to justify either of these instructions. Nor are we prepared to say, as a matter of law, that the relation of common carrier between the parties ceases upon the arrival of the train at the point of destination and the expiration of 25 or 30 seconds, or even four minutes, thereafter.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

PEOPLE v. WEBER. (Cr. 1,281.)

1. HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree.

2. JURY—SELECTION—OBJECTIONS.

On the discharge of a juror for illness while the jury was being impaneled, accused moved that the remaining 11 jurors be not discharged, but that the trial be proceeded with by calling the name of another juror, and that each side be allowed the number of peremptory challenges remaining after deducting from the original number the number already used. The court assented to the suggestion, but denied the motion concerning peremptory challenges as premature, with leave to renew the motion; but it was not renewed, and neither side exhausted its peremeptory challenges, and did not attempt to exercise any challenge upon the juror last called. Held, that the court committed no error in denying the motion as premature.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—OPENING CASE TO JURY.

Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 2, providing that the prosecution in a criminal case may open the case and state the facts on which it will rely for a conviction, is not mandatory, and hence the prosecution may open its case by the introduction of evidence, without any preliminary or opening statement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1659.]

4. SAME—SUBJECTS OF EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the physician who performed the autopsy on deceased's body testified with reference to a diagram, he was entitled to testify as to the place of entrance and exit of the bullet found in her body as a physical fact which he observed, and not as a subject for expert evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1040, 1062, 1063.]

5. SAME—APPEAL—PREJUDICE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the bullet which inflicted the wound was recovered from deceased's body, and was proved without dispute to have been a 32-caliber pistol bullet, an answer of an expert who performed an autopsy on deceased's body that he believed the wound to have been produced by a 32-caliber bullet was not prejudicial.

6. SAME—IDENTITY.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the state proved that defendant was in San Francisco during June, July, August, and September, 1904, and a pawnbroker had identified defendant as purchasing from him the pistol introduced in evidence in August, 1904, and described defendant's attire at the time of the purchase, evidence concerning the style of the clothes which defendant wore in San Francisco during those months was admissible in corroboration of the pawnbroker's identification of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 767, 768.]

7. HOMICIDE—MOTIVE—EVIDENCE.

Where accused, who was nearly 21 years of age, was claimed to have murdered his whole immediate family in order that he might acquire his father's estate, evidence of the value of the property belonging to the father and the amount of insurance thereon was admissible as bearing on the issue of motive.

8. WITNESSES—EXAMINATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LEADING QUESTIONS.

In a criminal prosecution, leading questions are permissible within the sound discretion of the court.

9. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

In a prosecution for homicide, it was error to permit a witness to testify that deceased, who was defendant's mother, stated to witness in the presence and hearing of defendant that defendant was so mean to her she was afraid to ask him to do anything for her, and that he aggravated her so; such declaration being mere hearsay.

10. Same—Prejudice.

The error in such ruling was of such a trifling character as not to justify a reversal of a conviction.

11. Same—Acts of Accused.

In a prosecution for homicide, it was pertinent to show what defendant did or did not do on the day after the tragedy as a basis for arguing that his acts were not those of an innocent person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 776–785.]

12. Same—Statements of Defendant—Preliminary Proof.

A statement made by accused to the district attorney and to the sheriff on the day after the tragedy, containing no admission or confession, is admissible against him, without preliminary proof that it was voluntary and not made under duress.

13. Witnesses—Cross-Examination of Accused.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, accused, after hearing the evidence of certain witnesses, testified to the taking of a different route after the homicide from that specified in a statement made by accused to the district attorney and the sheriff on the day after the homicide, a question whether accused had not fixed his route for the sole and single purpose of meeting the testimony of the witnesses, who testified they had seen him at a certain hotel and stable, was legitimate cross-examination.

14. Criminal Law—Trial—Argument of Attorney.

While it is improper for the prosecuting attorney to assert his personal belief as to accused's guilt, if that belief or conviction is predicated on anything other than the evidence in the case, the prosecutor is entitled to urge to the jury that the "evidence" convinces his mind of accused's guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1677.]

15. Same — Demonstrative Evidence — Exhibition of Bullets.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the bullets taken from the bodies of the persons killed were introduced in evidence in connection with other bullets fired from the same pistol, it was not error to permit the Attorney General to arrange the bullets in a particular order, placed in juxtaposition, and thus submit them to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 891.]

16. Witnesses—Cross-Examination — Character.

It is legitimate cross-examination of a character witness to ask whether he had ever heard of the person whose reputation is under investigation having been accused of committing acts inconsistent with the character which he has attributed to him.

17. Same.

A witness, having testified that C.'s reputation was good, on cross-examination was asked whether he had ever heard discussed the fact as to what business C. carried on, which he answered in the negative, when he was asked whether he had ever been told that C.'s license to carry on business had been revoked. He answered this question in the negative, when he was asked whether he had not been told that C. had a lengthy examination before the board of police commissioners and that his license was revoked, to which question an objection was sustained. Held, that such question was an illegitimate attempt to get the substance of the inquiry before the jury as an evidentiary fact, and that the objection was properly sustained.

18. Witnesses—Examination — Speculative Questions.

A subsequent question as to whether, if any of such matters had been brought to witness' mind, it would have changed his opinion concerning C.'s reputation, was incompetent as hypothetical and speculative.

19. Criminal Law—Appeal—Harmless Error—Rulings on Evidence.

Where the court by its rulings had stricken out all of the evidence of an expert with reference to his opinion that certain bullets were all fired from a particular pistol, it was immaterial that the court, when it undertook to designate specifically the evidence to be stricken, failed to designate for elimination certain evidence touching a particular exhibit which was included in the court's ruling.

20. Same—Evidence—Experiments.

After a homicide a pistol was found on the premises, concealed in a barn, and this was used by an expert with which to fire certain bullets for comparison with those from the bodies of the persons killed. On the trial it was shown that the pistol was in the same condition, except as to exterior blood marks, when the expert fired the bullets from it as it was when it was found in the barn. Held, that the bullets fired from the pistol by the expert were not objectionable, when offered for the purpose of comparison, on the ground that they were not fired under the same conditions as those existing at the time of the homicide.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 854, 891.]

21. Same—Trial—Instructions—Form.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the case was otherwise fairly tried, the fact that the court, in giving one of accused's proposed instructions, struck the concluding language, that, if the jury should find so and so, they "should find the defendant not guilty," or "should acquit him," was not ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1989.]

22. Same—Conflicting Instructions.

Instructions that if the jury, from a consideration of all the evidence, were satisfied of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, it was their duty to find him guilty, and that, as the evidence was circumstantial, each material circumstance must be proven to the jury's satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, or they should acquit, were not in conflict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1967, 1968.]

23. Same—Requests—Refusal.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the court had specifically charged that unless the jury were satisfied from all the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the presumption of innocence of the defendant was overthrown, it was their duty to find defendant not guilty, it was not error for the court to refuse to charge that unless the jury found the evidence sufficiently strong to overcome the presumption of innocence, and to satisfy their minds of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, he was entitled to an acquittal.

24. Same.

Where the court charged that the jury must not consider the evidence of all the witnesses which had been stricken out, it was proper for the court to refuse an instruction that the evidence of certain named witnesses had been stricken, and therefore must not be considered; the list of witnesses not including the names of all the witnesses whose testimony had been stricken.

25. Same—Abstract Instructions.

An instruction that the mere possession "of any article," whether it can or cannot be used in the perpetration of a crime, is not of itself sufficient to convict accused, but is merely a circumstance, etc., was abstract, and properly refused.

26. Same — Request to Charge — Modification.

Where accused requested that the jury be told that he was entitled to the independent judgment of every juryman, it was proper for the court to modify the instruction so as to read that each side was entitled to the independent judgment, etc.

27. Same.

An objection to an instruction in a criminal case that it is not sufficiently full is unavailable, unless a fuller instruction is requested.

28. Same—New Trial—Grounds—Theory of Prosecution.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, accused was advised of the nature of the circumstantial evidence on which the state relied for a conviction, and it did not appear that on a new trial any new evidence would have successfully controverted the Attorney General's theory adopted at the trial, the fact that such officer, in finally arguing the case to the jury, adopted a theory different from that advanced at the preliminary examination, etc., was not ground for new trial.

29. Same—Newly Discovered Evidence—Impeachng Testimony.

In a prosecution for homicide, it was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to refuse a new trial because of newly discovered evidence tending to impeach the testimony of a witness, not upon the principal fact of his testimony, but merely as to one of the reasons which he gave for his identification of the weapon by which the state claimed the homicide was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2331–2332.]

30. Same.

Affiant testified in an affidavit in support of a new trial for newly discovered evidence that he had purchased the pistol with which the crime was committed from a man whom he designated as "the Sailor." He knew nothing more concerning him, and testified that shortly thereafter he (affiant) went to the beach with several companions and tried the pistol, and that they were all surprised at the way in which the pistol shot, yet the affiant gave the name of no one of his companions. He testified that he sold the pistol to a man employed in a repair shop in Oakland, but did not state the name of the man nor of the shop, and, while he was unable to remember such names, he was able to identify the pistol by description and number, and also the day of the month on which he sold the pistol He also testified that he wrote defendant's attorneys concerning what he knew, but this statement was not corroborated, and the affidavit failed to give any evidence of the witness' location or whereabouts. Held, that the refusal of the trial court to credit such affidavit was not an abuse of discretion.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Adolph Julius Weber was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Grove L. Johnson, Ben P. Tabor, F. P. Tuttle, and Sam. J. Cullen, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., A. K. Robinson, Dist. Atty., and George W. Hamilton, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. On November 10, 1904, Julius Weber with his family resided in Auburn, Placer county. His family consisted of his wife, Mary Weber, his daughter, Bertha Weber, aged 18, a son, Earl Weber, aged 9, and a second son, Adolph Julius Weber, aged 20, the defendant herein. The home was a two-story frame building situated within its own grounds, some little distance away from the house of any neighbor. At about 6 o'clock of the evening of November 10th, the family was seen alive in the house by passers-by. At 7:35 of the same evening the house was discovered to be on fire, and at 7:42 the fire alarm bell was rung. The first people to arrive saw no living person within or about the buildings. A number of people, firemen and citizens, were soon upon the ground. A front room upon the ground floor was entered by them through the window. This room contained a piano and is designated "the piano room." It was full of thick, heavy, smoke, but no fire was detected. From this room three bodies were carried; Mary Weber, Bertha Weber, and Earl Weber. Mary Weber and Bertha Weber were both dead, and had been frightfully burned after death. The little boy was not burned at all. He was alive, though unconscious, when removed from the room to the yard, but died almost immediately after. He was in his night clothes. They were moist with blood. An autopsy disclosed that Mary Weber and Bertha Weber came to their death by gunshot wounds. Mary Weber was shot twice; Bertha Weber, once. In each case the wounds were almost immediately fatal. Neither could have survived the wounds more than five minutes. The bullets were recovered, and were pistol bullets of 32 caliber. The burns were inflicted upon the bodies after death. The little boy had not been shot. His death was caused by blows upon the head, inflicted with some blunt instrument, and subsequent suffocation. The house burned to the ground. The following day the body of Julius Weber was found in the bathroom of the dwelling. It had been subjected to great heat and was frightfully burned. An autopsy disclosed that the cause of his death was a bullet wound caused by a bullet of like caliber to those which killed the others. Upon November 22, 1904, there was found in the basement of the Weber barn, about 250 feet from the dwelling, a revolver described as an "Iver-Johnson 32-caliber revolver, old style." When found, there was dry blood upon it and one or two light-colored hairs, and the pistol contained the shells of five discharged cartridges. The defendant was in a clothing store in Auburn about five minutes to 7 on the evening of the tragedy. He there purchased a pair of trousers. He took off his old trousers in the store. They were rolled in a bundle by himself, and afterwards more compactly by the storekeeper, who wrapped them in a paper and returned them to the defendant. The defendant's manner at this time was not such as to excite attention. He comported himself as usual. Prior to that he had been seen on Brewer Lane, going from his house to Auburn at about 6:30 p. m. He was seen in the washroom of the American Hotel at 6:40 or 6:43 p. m., where he washed his hands, and hurriedly left the place. He was seen on the street going toward Cohn's store, where he purchased the trousers at about 6:45. He was on the streets of Auburn after this time until the alarm of fire, and his appearance and conduct during that time was natural. Upon hearing the alarm, he ran to the Weber house in company with a friend, carrying the bundle which contained his old trousers. These trousers he used to break in a window to gain access to the house. He did enter the house, and testifies that he assisted in removing the body of his little brother. His testimony as to this was contradicted. The bundle containing the trousers was burned in the house. Upon November 11th he was examined by the district attorney and the sheriff as to his knowledge of the fire and the homicide, and his answers were reduced to writing. On the evening of the same day he testified as a witness at the coroner's inquest. Upon the following day he was arrested and charged with the murder of his family. Upon preliminary examination he was held for murder. An information was filed against him by the district attorney upon November 29th, charging him with the murder of Mary Weber, his mother. Upon this charge he was brought to trial in January, 1905. The trial consumed about a month, the jury returning a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. His motion for a new trial was denied, and he was sentenced to be hung. From that judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

The prosecution contended, and to this their evidence was addressed, that the defendant had killed his parents, sister, and brother, in the manner indicated; that the father was killed in the bathroom; the mother and daughter in the piano room; the little boy beaten while in his night clothes, and brought to the piano room; that the murderer then saturated the clothing of Mrs. Weber and the daughter with inflammable oil and set fire to it; that he likewise set fire to the house; then, hiding the pistol in the barn, hurried to Auburn to establish an alibi; that the heavy, black smoke from the piano room came from the burning oil and burning flesh, and the room being inclosed, the oxygen was soon exhausted and the flames thus smothered, in support of which it was shown that when the burned bodies were carried to the open air the fire revived, and sparks were seen upon the clothing. The people's contention was, further, that defendant hurried to the washroom of the American Hotel to remove the blood and other traces of crime; that the trousers which he wore were blood stained, which necessitated the purchase of a new pair, and that he deliberately threw the old pair into the burning building in order that this evidence of his crime might be destroyed. Stress also is laid upon the asserted unnatural conduct of the defendant during and after the fire, that he did not approach the bodies of his mother and sister after they had been taken from the house nor inquire about them. It was shown that Julius Weber was worth about $50,000. Upon the death of the other members of the family, this defendant would succeed to property of this value. Herein the prosecution imputed the motive for the crimes. Upon leaving the fire, the defendant went to the home of a friend, and, on account of his excited condition, a doctor was called. The doctor dressed a cut upon the young man's hand, which probably he had received in forcing a window of the burning house. The defendant wanted to know if his mother were alive. The doctor replied that his mother was in the care of friends with a physician in attendance, and that he could not see her, nor could he see any member of the family that night. The defendant said: "I want to know if my mother is alive. I know she is dead. They told me she is alive, but I know she is dead." The doctor gave him a composing draft, and the young man said that if he was permitted to go out for a time he would come back and remain quietly all night. To this the doctor consented, and the defendant went out with his friend, and at his own suggestion visited an ice cream parlor, where they had an ice cream soda, and after that called at the Amercian Hotel to visit some young ladies; the defendant making the suggestion, saying: "Let's go see the girls in the hotel." The foregoing is instanced merely as an example of the unnatural conduct which it is insisted by the prosecution the defendant displayed after the frigntful tragedy. Further, the prosecution produced a pawnbroker of San Francisco, who identified the Iver-Johnson pistol as one which had been owned by him, and which in turn he had sold to defendant, positively identifying the defendant, and describing with some particularity the clothing which he wore at the time of the purchase. All of the evidence was wholly circumstantial, and the defense contends that it was likewise wholly insufficient to uphold a judgment of conviction. This is based upon the inconsistency and irreconcilability of the evidence. Thus, it is said that the defendant must have left his home before 6:30 p. m., since he was seen upon Brewery Lane walking to Auburn at that hour, and was afterwards, and up to the time of the alarm of fire, seen so frequently in the town of Auburn as to render a surreptitious return to the house impossible; yet that Bertha Weber was heard by a disinterested witness playing upon the piano at 6:40 or 6:45 p. m., and another disinterested witness heard the scream of a woman from the house between 6:40 and 7 p. m., and that the fire was first discovered in the house at about 6:30 or 6:45. From this it is argued that as Bertha Weber was heard playing the piano somewhere between 6:30 and 6:45, her brother, who was at that time absent from the house, could not have been the murderer; and, moreover, that it would have been impossible for him to shoot three people, all adults, haul the bodies of two of them in the piano room, where there was no fire, and set fire to them, go upstairs and beat his little brother upon the head, and carry his body down to the piano room in the length of time established by the evidence. But to this it must be answered that the witnesses who fixed the time do not pretend to do so with positiveness and exactness. They fix it as "about" such an hour and even if it be conceded that an irreconcilable conflict in the evidence arises, it must be noted that the testimony of the piano playing and of the woman's scream was offered by the defense, and it was the province of the jury to weigh and decide and to reconcile the testimony if they could, and, if the conflict was irreconcilable, to affix their own value to the offered evidence. And it must be added that, when allowance is thus made for inaccuracies as to time, there is nothing in the whole case to show that the defendant could not have committed these horrible deeds, with all their attendant circumstances, and still have made his appearance upon the streets of Auburn at the time shown. Upon this subject, therefore, it must be concluded that the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict.

To the rulings of the court in the impanelment of the jury, and upon the admission and rejection of evidence, appellant's counsel reserved very numerous exceptions. The same is true of the court's rulings in giving, in refusing to give, and in modifying instructions. No one of these rulings has failed to receive the careful investigation which the gravity of the case warrants, and we pass to a consideration of those which call for particular mention and discussion. After 12 jurors had been sworn to try the cause, but before the information had been read or the plea of the defendant stated, or the opening statement of the prosecution made, one of the 12 was excused because of illness. A special venire was issued and a twelfth juror accepted and sworn, without any challenge interposed. At the time of the final completion of the jury, the defendant had 9 peremptory challenges unused. Upon the discharge of the sick juryman, defendant moved the court that the remaining 11 jurors be not discharged, and that the trial be proceeded with by calling from the box the name of another juror, and that each side be allowed the number of peremptory challenges remaining after deducting from the original number the number already used. The court assented to the suggestion, but reserved its ruling concerning the number of peremptory challenges to which each side would be entitled, denying the motion as premature, with leave to renew it at any time. In this state of the case no question arises as to the number of peremptory challenges, since neither side had exhausted the number to which it was clearly entitled under the law, and since neither side exercised or attempted to exercise any challenge upon the juror last called to the box. The ruling of the court in this matter was correct, and is supported by People v. Brady, 72 Cal. 491; 14 Pac. 202; People v. Van Horn, 119 Cal. 332, 51 Pac. 538.

The Attorney General made an opening statement to the jury, at the conclusion of which the defense moved that the prosecution be required and directed by the court to state to the jury what the other facts referred to by the Attorney General were, and what they expected to prove, and on what a reliance for a conviction of the defendant was placed. The court denied the motion. It is asserted that Penal Code, § 1093, subd. 2, is mandatory, that the prosecution must open the case, and that in so doing it must state what it expects to prove. Such, however, is not the meaning of the law. A prosecution may open its case by the introduction of evidence without any preliminary or opening statement. The purpose of such statement is merely to outline the testimony about to be offered, to the end that the jury may more clearly sift and digest it. People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 691, 77 Pac. 818; People v. Ellsworth, 92 Cal. 595, 28 Pac. 604.

The physician who performed the autopsy upon the body of Mary Weber was permitted to testify as to the place of entrance and of exit of the bullet found in her body. It is said that special skill will not entitle a witness to give an opinion, where the jury is capable of forming its own conclusions from facts susceptible of proof in the common form. This is undoubtedly true, and it may be conceded that the observation even of the unprofessional eye could determine which was the point of entrance and which the point of exit, and if the body had been exhibited to the jury they could have formed their own conclusions from their own observations. But they had not this opportunity, and the physician was merely illustrating upon a diagram and testifying to a matter which had come under his own observation, so that even if it be conceded that the question did not call for expert evidence, the answer was none the less admissible as being direct testimony to a physical fact which the witness had observed and the jury had no opportunity of seeing. The same witness was allowed to answer a question as to the size of the wounds on the body referred to as bullet wounds and answered: "I believe them to have been produced by a 32-caliber bullet." A motion to strike out the answer was denied. It is sufficient here to say that as the bullet which inflicted the wound was recovered from the body, and was proved without dispute to have been a 32-caliber pistol bullet, the answer could not have been injurious.

It was shown by the prosecution that the defendant was in San Francisco during the months of June, July, August, and September, of 1904. The pawnbroker, Henry Carr, had identified the defendant as purchasing from him the pistol introduced in evidence in August, 1904, and this witness described the attire of the defendant at the time of the purchase. Through the testimony of the witnesses Mrs. Muston, Mrs. Hilliker and others, the prosecution showed the style of clothes which the defendant wore in San Francisco during those months. The effort was directed to establishing that the clothes which the defendant actually wore during that time were such clothes as Henry Carr described the defendant as wearing at the time of the purchase of the pistol. This evidence was admissible in corroboration of Carr's identification.

Proof of the value of the property belonging to Julius Weber was objected to upon the ground that it was not shown that the defendant, a mere youth, knew the value of the property of his father, or the amount of insurance upon it, and unless he did so know, the testimony had no pertinency upon the question of motive. But, in the absence of such a direct showing, it was established that the young man, nearly 21 years of age, had been living with his family upon the property, and was continually surrounded by evidence of his father's possessions, and it would be no strained, but a natural, inference for the jury to say that he had at least some knowledge of the matter.

Touching the conduct of the defendant upon the morning after the fire, a witness was asked and permitted to answer the following questions: "Did he, during any of that time (about three minutes) say anything about his mother being dead? Did he speak about any of the members of his family being dead? During these three minutes that you were in his presence, did he tell you that any members of his family were dead?" The only objections to these questions are that they are leading. But even leading questions are permissible within the sound discretion of the court. The answers were in no sense injurious, the witness replying, "He said something, or Adrian Wells said something to him; I didn't understand, and he said, "I don't see why they could not get out of the house.'"

Mrs. Snowden was allowed to testify that Mrs. Weber said to her in the presence and hearing of defendant: "Dolphy is so mean to me I am almost afraid to ask him to do anything for me. He does aggravate me so." Defendant moved to strike out this statement, and the motion was denied. It should have been granted. It is not every statement made in the presence and hearing of a person which is admissible in evidence against him. Nor is the statement, so far as its contents are concerned, admissible as evidence at all. It is merely the conduct of the person in connection with the declaration, his failure to act as it might reasonably be expected that an innocent person would act, which is the evidence, and the declaration is received merely to illustrate the person's conduct under the particular circumstances. Jones on Evidence, § 291; People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 544, 66 Pac. 798; People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650. Nothing is disclosed as to the conduct of the defendant at the time the statement was made, so that it stands upon the record as a naked hearsay declaration of the mother of the defendant. But even so, it is of such trifling character as not to justify a reversal of the cause.

Many questions were asked of different witnesses concerning the actions and statements of the defendant upon the day after the tragedy. They were all offered in proof of the alleged unnatural and thus guilty conduct of the accused. It was pertinent to show what the defendant did or did not do under those trying circumstances. It was permissible to argue that he did or did not act as an innocent person would have acted. The weight of all this testimony was for the jury, but it was not error to admit it.

Objection is made to the introduction of the statement made by defendant to the district attorney and to the sheriff upon the day after the tragedy. It is said that it appears that it was not a voluntary statement, but one made under duress. A reading of the statement, however, discloses that it contained no admission or confession of guilt, and it is only as to the latter class of statements that the rule requiring preliminary proof of their free and voluntary making has application. So, in People v. Jan John, 144 Cal. 286, 77 Pac. 950, it is said: "But this rule applies only to confession of guilt, and does not forbid proof of other admissions of the defendant, though these, taken in connection with other proofs, may tend to prove him guilty." See, also, People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 32, 50 Pac. 15; People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 86, 45 Pac. 175. In the statement which the defendant made to the district attorney and sheriff upon the day after the homicide, and also in the testimony which he gave before the coroner's jury, he described the course which he took in leaving his father's house and going into town. This course carried him directly across Brewery Lane, and by a roundabout and circuitous way, to a point on College Lane where three routes were open to him to go to Cohn's store. In both of these statements he declared that he did not know, could not recall what route he had taken from College Lane to Cohn's store. This circuitous route, if actually taken by the defendant, would have consumed some 15 to 20 minutes of time, and would have rendered it improbable that he could have been at his home at the time the murders were committed. Another route was open to him, much shorter and more direct, from his house to Cohn's store. This was down Brewery Lane. This latter route would have carried him past the American Hotel, where it was in evidence that he was seen washing his hands, and hurriedly departing, past Crosby's Livery Stable, which he was seen passing, coming from the direction of the American Hotel, and so to Cohn's store. From College Lane, no one of the three routes, readily accessible to defendant, would have carried him past these places where the witnesses saw him. Upon the trial he heard the testimony of these witnesses, and when, in turn, he took the stand, he described with minute circumstance, the route which he had taken from College Lane. That route involved a divergence from the direct course to Cohn's store, and the witness testified that he did diverge in his course and walk down Sacramento street, upon which was the American Hotel and Crosby's stable, that he passed these places upon the opposite side of the street, crossed over and came back to Cohn's store, passing in front of the American Hotel, though not stopping there. Upon cross-examination the witness was asked if he had not fixed his route for the sole and single purpose of meeting the testimony of those who had seen him at the American Hotel and Crosby's stable. This question was, in the condition of the case as shown, within the limits of legitimate cross-examination, since it was at least within the scope of fair argument before the jury to urge that the defendant's recollection as to his route had been stimulated by the necessities of his case.

In the course of his argument to the jury the Attorney General said: "We believe, gentlemen, and I say so not without a feeling of pity, not without a feeling of sadness, not without a feeling of pathos, but with a feeling that the evidence in this case as it stands to-night recorded in the notes of this trial, points unerringly, points accurately, beyond the possibility of mistake, to this defendant as the murderer of Mary Weber." Objection was made to this language. It was urged upon the trial court that it was improper for a prosecuting officer to express his belief in the matter of the guilt or innocence of an accused, and that he could with propriety argue only upon the facts in evidence. To this objection the court ruled in the following language: "The court does not feel it incumbent upon itself to determine the sufficiency of the point as a legal proposition, because the observation of the Attorney General was that he believes that the evidence points to that conclusion. The objection is overruled." It is, of course, improper for a prosecuting officer to assert his personal belief or personal conviction as to the guilt of an accused, if that belief or conviction is predicated upon anything other than the evidence in the case. But, upon the other hand, such prosecuting officer has the indisputable right to urge that the evidence convinces his mind of the accused's guilt. Indeed, it would be mere stultification if it were contended that the prosecuting attorney could argue to the jury that the evidence should convince their minds, although it did not convince his. A prosecuting officer, therefore, has the right to state his views, his beliefs, his conviction as to what the evidence establishes. People v. Romero, 143 Cal. 460, 77 Pac. 163. Nor can we perceive the slightest impropriety, nor just cause of exception in the remarks which the court made in ruling upon this matter.

The bullets taken from the body of Mary Weber and of Bertha Weber, as to which evidence has been introduced that they had been fired from the Iver-Johnson pistol also in evidence, were with certain other bullets fired from the same pistol, some by the prosecution and some by the defense, all arranged by the Attorney General in a certain order and so exhibited to the jury, the bullets themselves, of course, having been duly admitted in evidence. Objection was made to the exhibition of the bullets to the jury as arranged. It is said that this should not have been permitted; that the jurors could take the bullets and examine them as they chose, not having one bullet placed in juxtaposition with other bullets. The objection was overruled. It cannot be perceived wherein lay the error in permitting the Attorney General to place these exhibits in any order or in any sequence, to point out similarities or dissimilarities, or for any other legitimate purpose connected with his argument. Such, in effect, was the ruling of the trial court. To that ruling it was added that the jury might and doubtless would at their convenience rearrange them in any other order which they saw fit.

The reputation of Henry Carr, the pawnbroker who testified that he had sold the pistol to the defendant, having been attacked by the defense, affirmative evidence to meet it was offered by the prosecution in rebuttal. The witness Abrahams, having testified that Carr's reputation was good, upon cross-examination, without objection, was asked and answered the following questions: "Q. Have you ever heard discussed the fact as to what business he carried on? A. No, sir. Q. Have you ever been told that his license to carry on business has been revoked? A. I am not aware of the fact." And then followed this language: "Q. Have you ever been told that he had a lengthy examination before the board of police commissioners and that his license was revoked?" To this objection was made and sustained. It is, of course, legitimate cross-examination of a character witness to ask whether he has ever heard of the person whose reputation is under investigation having been accused of committing acts inconsistent with the character which he has attributed to him. People v. Gordon, 103 Cal. 568, 37 Pac. 534; People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 77 Pac. 777. In this case the witness had been asked and had answered that he had not heard that Carr's license to carry on business in San Francisco had been revoked. It is nowhere contended by astute counsel for the appellant, either in the record, which is full upon the question, nor in their briefs, that the first answer was evasive, and that therefore they had the right to pursue the inquiry further. It is not to be believed that if counsel had considered the answer evasive or had considered it other than as a direct answer they would not have insisted upon their right to ask the second question upon this ground. They did not do so in the trial court, they did not do so in this court, and the only fair inference to be derived from this state of the record and of the briefs is that this answer was accepted as positive and direct both by court and by counsel. So accepting it, the ruling of the court upon the subsequent question was perfectly proper, and the remarks of the court in pronouncing its rulings were equally unobjectionable. It is apparent that the succeeding question would have elicited another negative answer, and that the purport of the question was not to obtain the witness' answer, but to get the substance of the inquiry before the jury as an evidentiary fact, to the detriment of the witness Carr. This obvious purport of the question justified the court's ruling in excluding it. The court's ruling excluding the subsequent question of the witness was likewise proper. That question was: "If any of those matters had been brought to your mind would it change your opinion?" The question itself was hypothetical and speculative, and, moreover, was but another veiled attempt to present to the jury the excluded matter.

Howard Carr, an expert in small arms, had been permitted to testify that the bullet taken from the body of Mary Weber (Exhibit G), and the bullet taken from the body of Bertha Weber (Exhibit H) had both been fired from the Iver-Johnson pistol (Exhibit Q). Upon the next day, in doubt of the soundness of its ruling, in view of testimony subsequently given by Carr that his opinion was that the bullets had been fired from that pistol because he had compared the markings on the bullets taken from the bodies with the markings on the bullets which he had fired from the pistol, the court concluded to strike out the testimony in these words: "In other words, I hold that the comparison of the two bullets on the one hand with the two bullets on the other is not a matter of expert testimony, but one within the ordinary capacities of the average juror or citizen. Now this being so, I wish to strike out the statement of the expert, that in his opinion the two bullets taken from the bodies were fired from this pistol, leaving that as a question for the jury to determine by an inspection of the bullets themselves. Accordingly, Mr. Reporter, near the top of page 529 note this question: 'Just holding this bullet, plaintiff's Exhibit G, I now ask you if you are able to say whether or not that bullet was fired from the pistol, plaintiff's Exhibit Q., which you now hold in your hand, the answer being: A. I should say it was. Q. You are so able to state? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was it fired from that pistol that you hold? A. I say, yes, it was fired from this pistol.' Those questions and answers are stricken out, or rather the answers are stricken out." The record discloses that defendant made no specific motion based upon this ruling of the court to strike out also the testimony as to Exhibit H, nor did he call the court's attention to the omission to strike it out, but throughout all subsequent proceedings the matter was treated as though the testimony to both Exhibits G and H had in fact been stricken out. The court had by its rulings stricken out all of this evidence. When it undertook to designate specifically the evidence, by oversight, it failed to note the evidence touching Exhibit H. The original ruling, however, covered the matter: the evidence was subsequently treated as eliminated from the case, and no injury could have resulted to defendant.

It is insisted that it was error to admit in evidence two bullets which the expert testified he had fired from the Iver-Johnson pistol, upon the ground that they were not fired "under the same conditions as those existing at the time of the homicide." The objection is untenable. It was shown that the pistol was in the same condition, except as to exterior blood marks upon the surface when Carr fired the bullets from it, as it was when found in the Weber barn, and it is very apparent that, as tending to fix the identity of the weapon from which the fatal shots were fired, the similarity or dissimilarity of the bullets which Carr fired to those which were found in the body was pertinent and important evidence.

We have thus considered the alleged errors of the rulings of the court in the trial of the cause. Those which have not been specifically noted have not been overlooked. They have been omitted only because they belong to one or another of the classes and kinds of questions of which particular discussion has been had, and a more detailed analysis of them, therefore, becomes unnecessary.

In the rulings of the court upon the instructions, some 28 errors are asserted. It would extend this consideration without profit to set forth all of these instructions at length. It must suffice in most instances to state the result of the examination which has been made of them.

First, as to reasonable doubt. Upon this question the court instructed with elaborate fullness and care, avoiding any novel language of its own, and abiding by the definitions well tested and long approved by this court. Certain proposed instructions upon reasonable doubt, as well as upon other subjects, the court refused to give, as having elsewhere been embodied in its charge. Complaint is made of this in many instances, but the complaint is not well founded. Complaint is also made of the court's action in certain instances in striking out the concluding language of defendant's proposed instruction, that if the jury shall find so and so, they "should find the defendant not guilty," or "should acquit him." It is true that the court did this in certain instances, but in many others it presented the instructions without even this modification. No single individual instance of this would warrant the reversal of a cause otherwise fairly tried. Only by taking the instructions as a whole would a court be enabled to say whether or not the defendant had received fair treatment in this regard, and so reading the instructions in this case the conclusion is irresistible that the jury was fairly and impartially charged. The court had instructed the jury that if they should, from a consideration of all the evidence in the case, be satisfied of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, it would be their duty to find him guilty. It also instructed the jury that the evidence of defendant's guilt was circumstantial, and that each material circumstance must be proven to their satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt, or they should acquit. It is urged that these instructions are in conflict, the one nullifying the other. But this conflict and nullification we are unable to perceive.

The court instructed the jury: "The defendant's plea on this trial is 'not guilty.' Upon that plea a presumption of his innocence arises. That presumption accompanies him throughout the trial. It goes with you in your retirement to consider your verdict. It will avail to acquit the defendant, unless it be overcome by sufficient proof of guilt. You must examine the evidence by the light of that presumption." This instruction was proposed by the defendant and was given by the court. The complaint is made that the court in giving it, modified it by striking out an accompanying statement to the effect that unless upon their examination they found the evidence sufficiently strong to overcome the presumption of innocence, and to satisfy the jury of defendant's guilt beyond all reasonable doubt, he was entitled to an acquittal at their hands. The portion stricken out was unobjectionable, and might well have been given, but the substance had been given so frequently in other instructions that it was no abuse of the discretion of the court to refuse to give it upon the ground that it was mere repetition. In this regard it is to be noted that the court had already specifically charged the jury that unless they "are satisfied from all of the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the presumption of innocence of the defendant which the law gives him is overthrown, it is their duty to render a verdict of not guilty."

The court's modification of instruction No. 7 was not objectionable. It would have been justified in refusing to give the instruction as a whole. Instead of so doing, it eliminated certain portions of the instruction as being argumentative, and other portions as having already been covered by the charge, and gave the remainder.

It was not error to refuse to give an instruction to the effect that the evidence of certain named witnesses had been stricken out, and, therefore, must not be considered. The court had given an instruction covering this matter as to the testimony of all witnesses which had been stricken out. The naming of these particular witnesses could but have served to confuse the jury, since from the list were omitted the names of other witnesses whose testimony was likewise stricken out.

The court refused to give an instruction as follows: "I instruct you that the mere possession of any article, whether it can or cannot be used in the perpetration of crime, is not of itself sufficient to convict the defendant, but is merely a circumstance, which may or may not tend to prove the charge against the defendant." We cannot perceive wherein the refusal to give this instruction was error at all much less prejudicial error, for as was said in People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 390, 77 Pac. 169, under like circumstances: "It may be that as mere abstract propositions of law they are correct, but as mere abstract propositions of law they apparently bear no direct relation to the particular charge contained in the information." The defendant, it was shown, possessed numerous articles. Some of these, like the clothing which he wore, were not used in the perpetration of any crime. The common knowledge of the jurors would tell them that as to any article the mere possession is insufficient to convict. If the defendant had a desire to have specific instruction to the effect that mere proof of ownership of the pistol, even if it were shown that the fatal shots were fired from the pistol, was not in and of itself alone sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction, he should have requested such an instruction. But the instruction as proposed, going to the possession of "any article, whether it can or cannot be used in the perpetration of a crime" was of academic significance merely.

Defendant asked that the jury be told that he was entitled to the independent judgment of every juryman. The court gave the instruction, modifying it so as to read that "each side is entitled to the independent judgment," etc. This assuredly was not error.

The court, at the request of the prosecution, instructed the jury that "an alibi simply means that the accused was at another place at the time of the commission of the crime, and, therefore, could not have committed it." It is not contended that this instruction is erroneous in point of law, but it is urged that the court should have instructed the jury more fully upon the subject. But had the counsel for the defendant so desired, it was their duty to have requested such instruction. People v. McNutt, 93 Cal. 658, 29 Pac. 243; People v. Oliveria, 127 Cal. 381, 59 Pac. 772; People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 264, 76 Pac. 1017.

Upon his motion for a new trial defendant urged two propositions: First, that at the preliminary examination the prosecuting attorney advanced the theory that Mary Weber and Bertha Weber were shot, then burned, and their bodies then dragged into the front room, where they were found; that nothing occurred upon the trial of the cause, nor in the opening argument of the prosecution before the jury, to lead defendant to believe that this theory had in any wise been changed or abandoned; that only upon the final argument of the Attorney General was it disclosed that the people were contending that Mary Weber and Bertha Weber were shot in the room where the bodies were found, and their clothes were there saturated with some inflammable oil and ignited. The contention of appellant is that this conduct upon the part of the prosecution was unfair, and, moreover, that the theory advanced by the Attorney General came at so late a time as to preclude the defense from offering evidence to countervail against it. But to this it must be answered that no deception was practiced by the prosecution; that it was not incumbent upon the prosecution to offer any particular theory as to the manner in which the crime was committed, and that, upon the other hand, it was perfectly proper to argue that the crime was committed in any manner which the evidence showed reasonably possible. Furthermore, as to the nature of the circumstantial evidence the defendant was advised. It is not made to appear by the affidavit that upon a new trial any new evidence would have successfully controverted the Attorney General's theory.

But the point upon which principal stress is laid is that a new trial should have been granted because of newly discovered evidence impeaching the testimony of the witness Henry Carr. Carr, it will be remembered, had testified that he had sold this particular revolver, Iver-Johnson old style No. 19,554. Upon cross-examination he testified that he remembered it and identified it because it was a peculiar make, and that it was the only one of that make that he had ever owned since he had been in business. J. G. Applegate makes affidavit, giving his place of residence and occupation; that he was in the company of Edward Harrington on the 29th of July, 1904 (which is the month Carr fixes as the month of the purchase of the pistol by defendant); that they visited Henry Carr's place of business, and Harrington there bought with a lot of cartridges, an Iver-Johnson pistol, old style, and that he believes Harrington has the pistol still in his possession. Edward Harrington makes affidavit, giving his address and occupation, that he did on the 29th of July buy from Henry Carr, at his pawnbroker shop in San Francisco, an old style Iver-Johnson pistol. Accepting these affidavits as being absolutely true, they serve to contradict the witness, not upon the principal fact of his testimony, but merely as to one of the reasons which he gave for his identification of the weapon. To that extent, and no more, they serve to discredit the witness. But it cannot be said that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to reopen the case because of this impeaching testimony.

But of more consequence, however, is the affidavit of one Nathan C. Beard. Beard's affidavit is that he purchased a pistol on a railroad train from a man who was not known to him other than by the name of "the Sailor." That upon the 4th of July, 1904, wishing to celebrate, he took the pistol out of his valise, and with several companions took it to the beach, and fired it several times. Being surprised at the way it shot, he examined it carefully to see what make it was, and found it to be an Iver-Johnson, old model, 32-caliber short, No. 19,554. "We spoke then of the number and wondered if that many pistols of that make had been made. When the testimony of Henry Carr was published in the newspaper I saw that he swore he had sold this pistol to Adolph Weber. After I heard of this I wrote to Weber's attorneys and told them what I knew of this pistol. I kept this pistol in my possession until the 30th day of September, 1904, when I sold it to a man who was employed in a repair shop in Oakland, Cal. for a dollar and a half. On the 24th day of March, 1905, at the request of the attorneys for Weber, I came to Auburn and * * * there carefully examined the pistol which had been introduced in evidence in the murder case against Weber. * * * I recognized in this pistol so marked and shown to me as aforesaid, the pistol which I bought from the sailor and which I sold to the man in Oakland on the 30th day of September, 1904." As to this affidavit the brief of the people states that, "if the trial court had been convinced of the truth of this affidavit, a new trial would have resulted. More than this, it is probable that if the trial court had not been fully satisfied that the statements in this affidavit were absolutely false, a new trial would have been granted."

Considering that this affidavit was prepared by counsel eminent in the law on behalf of a client convicted of the most horrible crime of matricide, it is certain that the affidavit contains everything pertinent to the case which the affiant was willing to have appear. Yet, this affidavit is open to grave suspicion as well from the statements which it contains, as from the absence of statements which it should contain. Affiant knows nothing of the sailor from whom he bought the pistol; he went to the beach with several companions who were all surprised at the way in which the pistol shot, yet the name of no one of these companions is given; he sold it to a man employed in a repair shop in Oakland, but neither the name of the man nor of the shop is stated. Yet, while he cannot remember the sailor's name nor state the name of his companions, nor the name of the man to whom he sold the pistol, nor the shop in which he worked, he is not only able to remember that the pistol in question was an Iver-Johnson old model, 32-caliber short, but that its number was 19,554. He can remember also the very day of the month—September 30, 1904—upon which he sold the pistol. He swears that he wrote to Weber's attorneys and told them what he knew. No corroboration even of this is offered by the attorneys. But a circumstance of even greater suspicion is that his affidavit failed absolutely to give any evidence of his location or whereabouts. It is to be remembered that a wise discretion is vested in the trial court in determining the weight to be given to the statements contained in affidavits upon motion for new trial. This discretion is to be exercised in determining the diligence shown, the truth of the matter stated, and the materiality and probability of the effect of them, if believed to be true. Moreover, it is to be remembered that a trial court is justified in regarding with distrust affidavits of newly discovered evidence in motions for new trial. People v. Howard, 74 Cal. 547, 16 Pac. 394; People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 243, 15 Pac. 86; People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 359, 28 Pac. 261; People v. Gonzales, 143 Cal. 605, 77 Pac. 448; Oberlander v. Fixen, 129 Cal. 690, 62 Pac. 254; People v. Russing, 130 Cal. 449, 62 Pac. 742, 80 Am. St. Rep. 141; People v. Warren, 130 Cal. 683, 63 Pac. 86; People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 Pac. 169; People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 2, 78 Pac. 235. Potent as this affidavit might have been, if believed, it may not be said that the trial court did not exercise a sound discretion in discrediting it, and so in denying the motion in support of which it was brought forward.

We have thus disposed of all the legal questions which in our view demand detailed consideration. That the verdict was the result of passion and prejudice upon the part of the jury cannot be affirmed from the record before us. The community in which the defendant and his family resided was doubtless shocked at the atrocity of the crime, and was doubtless intensely interested in the arrest and conviction of the perpetrator. But when the hand of the law fell upon the son as the criminal, the very horror of the charge must have caused a suspension of judgment in the mind of every right-thinking person. It was almost unbelievable that a son and brother could have done so foul a deed, and that the trial was had and concluded in such a condition of arrested public judgment, seems to be borne out by the fact that defendant scarcely exhausted one-half of the peremptory challenges allowed him by law before obtaining a jury of his fellow-citizens before whom he was put upon his trial.

There was for this court naught to do but to affirm the judgment and order appealed from; and it is so ordered.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). The murder of the Weber family was one of those atrocious crimes which always arouse an intense desire to discover the perpetrator, and bring him to justice. Such a state of feeling pervading a whole community increases the danger that one upon whom suspicion first happens to fall may be convicted upon evidence which, in cases of a less aggravated character would not be deemed thoroughly satisfactory proof of guilt. This fact makes it peculiarly the duty of the courts in such a case to enforce with scrupulous care every right which the law accords to persons accused of crime—rights accorded not for the purpose of screening the guilty, though capable at times of being perverted to that end, but solely in order to guard, as far as may be consistent with the practical administration of justice, against the danger of convicting the innocent. I cannot persuade myself that on the trial this defendant's rights were duly preserved. The evidence against him was wholly circumstantial, and aside from the testimony of the witness Henry Carr (who swore that during the month of August preceding the murder he had sold to the defendant at his shop in San Francisco the identical pistol which was found in the Weber barn 12 days after the murder) was utterly inconclusive. It showed, it is true, that the defendant had an opportunity to commit the murders and set fire to the house before he left the premises at about 6.30 p. m. on November 10th. But it showed, also, that there was ample time for some other person to have entered the house, to have committed the murders and kindled the fire between the time of his departure and the first signs of the fire. It showed, also, that he had a possible motive for the murder of the whole family in his supposed desire to succeed to his father's whole estate, and there was proof of one or two circumstances justifying a suspicion of his guilt. But altogether this evidence was insufficient to make out the case against him beyond a reasonable doubt. With the addition of Carr's testimony, however, if true, the proof was complete. The only defense, therefore, which he could make was to meet the testimony of Carr either by direct rebuttal or by impeachment of his character. Deprived of a fair opportunity to do this, he was in effect deprived of his whole defense. In view of the capital importance of this item of evidence, I think the interests of justice demanded that he should have been given the fullest and fairest opportunity to meet it. He was, on the contrary, studiously and purposely deprived of such opportunity. Extraordinary precautions were taken prior to the trial to keep from him all knowledge of this witness, and of the testimony he was expected to give, and in opening the case in a speech an hour and a quarter in length, counsel for the prosecution made no allusion to this essential link in their chain of evidence, so that the first knowledge the defendant had of the name or existence of Henry Carr, or of his residence or business, was derived from his testimony as a witness in the midst of the trial. This course of procedure is justified upon the ground that there is no law which obliges the prosecution in a criminal case to make an opening statement to the jury, or if one is made, to disclose any more of the case than they deem sufficient. It is true that there is no violation of the letter of any law in concealing from the prisoner and his counsel the name and the expected testimony of a witness who has not testified before a grand jury, but there is a violation of the spirit and policy of our law which has always required the names of all witnesses examined before a grand jury to be indorsed upon the indictment, and which, since prosecutions by information have been authorized, requires the testimony produced before the committing magistrate to be reduced to writing and filed as a public record. The policy of these laws is evident, and they are in the interests of justice. It does not accord with our ideas of justice, and has no tendency to promote its ends, to keep the most important witness against a prisoner in ambush until the moment when he is called upon to make his defense. If a witness that is to be called to support a criminal charge bears a good reputation, and can be depended on to tell the truth when placed upon the stand, there is no occasion to keep him in hiding, and if, on the other hand, he is a person of doubtful antecedents, engaged in unlawful business in an unsavory locality, there is all the more reason that the accused should not be deprived of any legitimate means of exhibiting him in his true character before the jury which is to weigh his testimony.

The argument upon which the course of the prosecution in this particular is defended is, in substance, this: We knew that the defendant was guilty, and if he had been informed of what we expected to prove by Henry Carr, he was capable of resorting to any illegitimate means of preventing or rebutting his testimony, which means, I suppose, that he would have suborned him to keep away from the trial, or would have suborned witnesses to impeach or contradict him. This is an argument which begs the whole question which it is the sole purpose of a trial to determine; the question, that is to say, whether the defendant is guilty. It assumes his guilt in advance as a justification for depriving him of a fair opportunity to show that the evidence against him is false or untrustworthy, and it ignores the fundamental principle upon which our entire system of criminal procedure is based, viz., that the defendant in every criminal action is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty.

But, after all, it cannot be said that in the matters so far considered there is any ground for reversing the judgment and order of the superior court. The prosecution did not transgress the letter of any law and there was no ruling of the court in this connection which can be pronounced erroneous. The preceding discussion, however, will be seen to have a material bearing upon an erroneous ruling made during the cross-examination of a witness called to sustain the reputation of Henry Carr at a later stage of the proceedings. The cross-examination of Henry Carr showed that he kept a second-hand store on Dupont street, San Francisco, between Pine and California; that under the pretext of buying articles and agreeing to sell them back to the vendor at an advance, he was really doing a pawnbroker's business without a license, that among other articles in which he dealt were black-jacks and brass knuckles. Several witnesses, including a former police judge and officers of the police, testified that his reputation for truth, honesty and integrity was bad, and that they would not believe him under oath. The defendant also offered to prove by a certified copy of the proceedings of the police commissioners of San Francisco that the license of the defendant to deal in second-hand goods had been revoked after a hearing of charges of receiving stolen goods and soliciting a thief to steal. This evidence was excluded on an objection by the prosecution. The objection, of course, was valid upon technical grounds, but there is no doubt that the evidence of the police commissioners themselves, if they had been placed upon the stand, would have been admissible as to his reputation. The defense also offered to prove by a certified copy of a San Francisco ordinance that the selling or keeping for sale of black-jacks and brass knuckles (the weapons of thugs and assassins) was a misdemeanor. This evidence was also excluded on objection by the prosecution, and the ruling was erroneous. The offer was not to prove specific instances of misconduct on the part of Carr, which would have been inadmissible, but only to show that the business which he had admitted that he was carrying on both by his direct and cross examination was a contraband and disreputable business. It was clearly competent and relevant to the question of his character.

A more important error was committed by the court in ruling upon an objection to a question asked the witness Abrams, who had testified to the good reputation of Carr. The cross-examination of this witness developed the fact that his favorable testimony was based solely upon reports that Carr was in the habit of making prompt payments to the wholesale dealers who supplied him with goods. The following questions, answers, rulings and exceptions then ensued: "Q. Have you ever heard discussed the fact as to what business he carried on? A. No sir. Q. Have you ever been told that his license to carry on business has been revoked? A. I am not aware of that fact. Q. Have you ever been told that he had a lengthy examination before the board of police commissioners and that his license was revoked? (The prosecution objected to the question as being wholly irrelevant, immaterial and incompetent.) The Court: The court is certainly of the opinion that the questions are asked for the purpose of the question, not the answers. I don't think you can change the mind of the court upon it. These matters the court ruled out as being grossly immaterial, and the court cannot help but hold and rule that they are asked for the purpose of questions and not the answers, and the court must sustain the objection. (The defendant excepted to the remarks of the court and to the ruling of the court.)" This ruling was clearly erroneous, and the error was aggravated by the unmerited rebuke administered to counsel in sustaining the objection.

I entirely dissent from the view of this question taken in the opinion of the court. The witness had not answered the first question asked him, in what is conceded to have been a proper line of cross-examination. He had evaded it. He was not asked whether he knew that Carr's license had been revoked, but whether he had heard the matter discussed. His answer that he was not aware of the fact might have been literally true, although he had heard the matter discussed. Counsel then, as he had a perfect right to do, asked him the same question in a more specific form, and had a right to an answer. It is a peculiarity of the rule of evidence relating to the impeachment of witnesses that you cannot prove by direct evidence specific instances of improper or criminal conduct for the purpose of discrediting them, but if a witness is called to rebut evidence of bad reputation, he may be asked on cross-examination if he has not heard of such specific instances of misconduct. The cases cited in the opinion of the court sustain this proposition, and it is sustained by abundant authority elsewhere. The first branch of the rule was invoked successfully against the defendant when he offered to prove by the record of the board of police commissioners that they had revoked Carr's license after an investigation of charges of receiving stolen goods, etc. But when he endeavored in a perfectly legitimate manner to avail himself of the other branch of the rule, not only was his right to do so denied him, but his counsel was censured by the court in the presence of the jury, in language clearly implying that he was seeking in bad faith to get before the jury matters which they were forbidden to consider. Suppose that, instead of sustaining the objection of the district attorney, with a plain intimation that nothing more would be heard from the defense, the court had overruled the objection and compelled the witness to give direct answer to the question, and suppose, as is not improbable, that he had admitted having heard of the action of the police commissioners, of what value would the testimony of this witness have been? Instead of rebutting he would have confirmed the evidence offered on the part of the defense. It may be said that this was a small matter not of sufficient importance to justify an order for a new trial, but in my estimation it was not a small matter. Carr was the most important witness for the state, and if it can be supposed that uncontradicted proof of his bad reputation for honesty and integrity would have induced one or more jurors to reject his testimony the defendant would not have been convicted of a most horrible and unnatural crime, and sentenced to an ignominious death. Evidently the prosecution did not consider it a trifling matter, and neither they nor the court had any reason to suppose the question was asked in bad faith. If they expected it to be answered in the negative, the answer could have been given in far less time than it took to interpose the objection, and that would have ended the matter to their advantage.

There are other minor errors disclosed by the record which I do not care to discuss. It is enough to say that the defendant was denied his substantial rights in respect to the testimony of a witness of doubtful reputation, upon the vital point in the case.

For these errors, the judgment and order of the superior court should be reversed.

PEOPLE v. TREBILCOX. (Cr. 1,291.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1906.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—VOLUNTARY INTOXICATION —INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for murder, an instruction on voluntary intoxication as furnishing no excuse for crime should contain the phrase "when sane and responsible."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1830; vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 605.]

2. SAME—DEFENSES—UNCONTROLLABLE OR IRRESISTIBLE IMPULSE—EMOTIONAL INSANITY.

Uncontrollable or irresistible impulse, or emotional insanity, beginning on the eve of the criminal act and ending with its consummation, is no legal defense to the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 64; vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 44.]

3. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

Requests to charge in a criminal case, based on a supposititious state of facts, to the existence of which there was no evidence, were properly refused.

4. HOMICIDE—DEGREES OF OFFENSE.

Where deceased placed herself between defendant and A., or for any reason got in range, and defendant fired, intending to strike A., and not then intending nor expecting to strike deceased, but killed deceased, defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree, and not manslaughter.

5. CRIMINAL LAW—ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for homicide, instructions which are purely argumentative in asking the jury to pay particular attention to particular circumstances, as tending to show the irresponsibility or insanity of the defendant, were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1959, 1960.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilon, Judge.

William J. Trebilcox was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Kitts and John Mulroy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Geo. L. Jones, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and the death penalty was imposed. Upon his appeal the only complaint which he makes is of errors of the court in giving and refusing to give instructions. In general it may be said that the jury was instructed with great care and clearness. The instruction upon voluntary intoxication of which complaint is made omits the phrase "when sane and responsible." This is an important qualification and should always be given; but its omission in this case is covered by other qualifying instructions. People v. Methever, 132 Cal. 332, 64 Pac. 481.

Instructions 5 and 6, given at the plaintiff's request, were to the effect that "uncontrollable or irresistible impulse" or "emotional insanity," beginning on the eve of the criminal act and ending with its consummation, had no legal standing in this state as a defense to crime. In this the court adopted the rule and language of People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120, 45 Am. Rep. 651, and People v. Kernaghan, 72 Cal. 622, 14 Pac. 566, a rule which ever since, without wavering or hesitation, has been adopted by this court. The murder was committed in the presence of an eyewitness. The defendant shot and killed his own wife. The testimony for the prosecution showed that at 9 or 10 o'clock of the morning of the homicide he was seen and appeared sober and rational. He then went to a gun store and purchased a pistol, which was loaded for him. About 11 o'clock he went to a saloon, where he drank beer and appeared to be intoxicated, saying: "There will be three funerals before night." From the saloon he went to the residence of his wife, knocked at the front door, which was opened for him, and said to the witness William Allen: "Here I am. You get out." He drew the pistol from his pocket, pointed it at Allen and said: "I have a good mind to kill you." Defendant's wife appeared and asked what was the matter. She stepped to one side. He said to his wife: "You son of a bitch; I will kill you" — and fired and she fell. Within the hour he returned to the saloon, saying to its proprietor: "Hello, Dick! I done it. I have shot my wife." To the city marshal, who arrested him, he said: "I surrender, Dan. I have killed my wife. I was drove to it." The marshal said to him that she might not be dead, and he replied: "If she ain't, I intended she should be."

Some of the instructions which the court refused to give at the request of the defendant were properly refused as being wholly outside of the evidence in the case, or as being based upon a supposititious state of facts to the existence of which there was not the slightest testimony. For example may be quoted defendant's proposed instruction 2: "If it be a fact that Mrs. Trebilcox placed herself between Charles Allen and the defendant, or for any reason got in range and the defendant fired intending to strike Allen, and not then intending nor expecting to strike Mrs. Trebilcox, then the defendant cannot be convicted of murder in either the first or second degree, and can be convicted of no crime higher than manslaughter." This instruction is quoted as an example of those which were presented to the court and which were properly refused. In the first place, as to the facts there was not the slightest testimony that the homicide occurred under these circumstances, and, in the second place, the law of the instruction is as erroneous as the facts, since the homicide by one who kills another under such circumstances is not manslaughter, but murder in the first degree. People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 365, 75 Pac. 1093. Other instructions were properly rejected as being purely argumentative in their character in asking the jury to pay particular attention to this or that or the other circumstance as tending to show the irresponsibility or insanity of the defendant.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

(S. F. 3,465.)

1. Master and Servant—Injuries to Servant—Latent Defects — Extraordinary Dangers—Warning.

It is the duty of the master to inform his servant of latent defects, or extraordinary dangers or risks connected with the service, of which the master has knowledge, but which are unknown to the servant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 297–316½.]

2. Same—Action—Pleading—Issues.

Where, in an action for injuries to a servant, the complaint alleged that the injury resulted from the master's failure to inform plaintiff of an unexploded shot in a mine, the explosion of which caused the injury, and of which the master had knowledge, but which was unknown to plaintiff, and the answer contained no denial of such knowledge, but averred that plaintiff was fully advised and informed of the danger before he went to work, whether defendants' foreman and watchman, who had knowledge of the danger, were plaintiff's fellow servants, was not in issue.

3. Appeal—Verdict—Conflicting Evidence.

Where the evidence on the sole issue in the case is conflicting, the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by William H. Bone against the Ophir Silver Mining Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Deal & Tauszky, for appellants. Milton S. Eisner and Charles S. Wheeler, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. In the decision of this case in department it was said: "Plaintiff sued defendants to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him while he was a miner in their employ. The gravamen of his complaint is that he was employed by defendants and put to work excavating rock and soil from a winze in their mine, in which winze there were certain unexploded charges of blasting powder; that these unexploded charges of blasting powder made the place of his labor to a high degree unsafe and dangerous; that defendants knew these facts, but carelessly and negligently put him to work at that place without informing him of them; that while so at work one of these charges exploded and inflicted upon him serious injuries. Trial was had before a jury, and the plaintiff recovered. From the judgment in his favor, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Plaintiff's testimony showed that he had followed mining for some 38 or 39 years, and was thoroughly familiar with the work and with the use of giant powder. He testified that there would have been no danger in his place of work if he had known of the unexploded charges, but that, being in ignorance of this fact, he was liable at any time to strike one of them with his pick and cause it to explode. This was, in fact, what happened. He further testified that it was the rule in the mine that when a shot failed to explode during a shift the miners coming off reported to the foreman or watchman, who, in turn, would notify the men of the oncoming shift, so that they could guard against any possible danger. In this particular case there was a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the plaintiff had been informed. The jury, however, accepted his testimony, and it must be taken as proved to their satisfaction that plaintiff was put to work in the winze in which there were unexploded charges of giant powder without being informed of that fact. Were the defendants responsible in law for this failure so to inform him? The rule is unquestioned that the duty of informing a servant of latent or extraordinary dangers or risks connected with the service of which the master has knowledge is not only a duty, but is a primary duty, such that the delegation of it to another cannot relieve the master from responsibility, if that other, in turn, shall fail to give the necessary information. Baxter v. Roberts, 44 Cal. 192, 13 Am. Rep. 160; Rodgers v. C. P. R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 607, 8 Pac. 377; Berg v. Mining Co., 12 Mont. 217, 29 Pac. 545; Elledge v. Railway Co., 100 Cal. 287, 34 Pac. 720, 38 Am. St. Rep. 290; Gibson v. Sterling Furniture Co., 113 Cal. 6, 45 Pac. 5; Higgins v. Williams, 114 Cal. 182, 45 Pac. 1041; Tedford v. Los Angeles Electric Co., 134 Cal. 80, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85; Simone v. Kirk (N. Y.) 65 N. E. 741; Woods' Master and Servant (2d Ed.) §§ 354–448; 4 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 60, note. It is to be noted, however, that this rule applies to latent and extraneous dangers of which the master himself has knowledge, or of which, with the exercise of ordinary care, he should have had knowledge. This is, of course, a just limitation upon the rule; for otherwise the law would be exacting impossibilities if it attempted to compel the master to inform the servant of dangers as to which the master himself knew nothing, and concerning which he could have acquired no information. The question, therefore, to be resolved in this case, is that presented as an issue by the pleadings, namely, did the defendants have knowledge of these unexploded blasts, and yet put the plaintiff to work in the winze where they were without giving him any information concerning them?"

The opinion in department then proceeded to show that the only persons having knowledge of the unexploded shots were the foreman and the watchman, and the case was disposed of under an instruction which it was thought that the court had given to the effect that the foreman and watchman were fellow servants of plaintiff, and their failure to inform plaintiff was the negligence of a fellow servant, for which defendants were not responsible. Upon petition for rehearing it was pressed upon the attention of the court, first, that the court was in error in supposing that the quoted instruction had been given. In fact, it was a proposed instruction which had not been given. Second, it was strenuously insisted that the question which in department was said to be presented as an issue, namely, "Did the defendants have knowledge of these unexploded blasts, and yet put the plaintiff to work in the winze where they were, without giving him any information concerning them?" was not a question in the case, and that no issue whatever had been joined by defendants' answer as to the knowledge of the defendants which was charged against them in the complaint.

The complaint was framed under the rule above set forth in the quotation from the department opinion, namely, that it is the master's duty to inform his servant of latent or extraordinary dangers or risks connected with the service, of which the master has knowledge and the servant has not. The complaint charged that the defendants did have this knowledge, that the plaintiff did not have it, and that the defendants put plaintiff to work without informing him of this latent danger. Under the most liberal construction of defendants' answer it cannot be said that issue is joined upon the allegation of their knowledge. First, there is no denial whatsoever of the knowledge. Second, the answer, admitting knowledge of the unexploded charges, rests its defense upon the averment that plaintiff was fully advised and informed of the danger before he went to work. This admission in the pleading necessarily eliminates from the case all question as to whether or not the foreman and the watchman were fellow servants, and as to whether or not, in the operation of a mine, there was, under circumstances such as here disclosed, any primary duty cast upon the defendants to inform the oncoming shift of unexploded blasts, or whether a failure of an outgoing shift so to do was merely the negligent failure of a fellow servant. All this is eliminated we repeat, because the case as presented by the pleadings is a case where the employer admits that at the place where his employé was put to work there were latent and extraordinary dangers, and that he (the employer) knew of these dangers. There is left in the case the sole issue as to whether or not, so knowing, he advised his employé of this concealed hazard. Upon this point, as has been stated, the evidence is conflicting and the verdict of the jury may not be disturbed.

For these reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HUNT v. JONES et al. (S. F. 3,578.)

1. PLEADING—INDEFINITENESS—DEMURRER.

That a complaint is indefinite or uncertain can be raised only by a special, and not by a general, demurrer.

2. COVENANTS — PERSONAL COVENANTS — ENFORCEMENT—PURCHASER WITH NOTICE.

Personal covenants or agreements, bestowing benefits and imposing restrictions on the use of land, may be enforced in equity against a subsequent purchaser from the covenantor with notice of the existing equitable claim in favor of another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Covenants, § 30.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION COMPANIES — SALE OF WATER RIGHTS — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

Complainant contracted to purchase certain land from a colony association, and as a part of the contract the association sold to complainant a sufficient amount of water from its water supply to irrigate the land, to be delivered as plaintiff might need the same, at a rate not to exceed 10 cents per miners' inch. The water right was the main inducement to the purchase of the land, and the land without the water was worth only a small part of the consideration paid. Thereafter the association sold all of its land and water rights to defendant company, which purchased with knowledge of complainant's contract, but later refused to furnish water to irrigate complainant's land, after he had expended large sums in planting an orchard thereon, unless complainant would pay $100 a year. Held, that defendant water company purchased the land from the association with notice of its covenant to furnish complainant water as agreed, and that complainant was entitled to restrain defendant from turning off the water in violation of such contract.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco.

Action by A. B. Hunt against A. F. Jones and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. B. Hunt, in pro. per. Corbett & Goodwin, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment, and involves the validity of an order sustaining a general demurrer interposed to an amended complaint by the defendant Oroville Water Company. The complaint (it is quite lengthy, and we give such a synopsis of it as we deem pertinent on this appeal) alleged that in 1887 an association known as the "Thermalito Colony Company" was the owner of 2,000 or 3,000 acres of land near Oroville, Butte county, and was the owner at the same time of a large supply of water; that it had surveyed said land into lots and blocks for a colony site, and had laid mains and water pipes along the avenues of said tract, and was running water through them for the purpose of irrigating said lots and blocks, so as to enable the production thereon of citrus fruits; that thereafter, and prior to 1889, plaintiff entered into a written contract with said company to purchase, and did purchase, a block of land consisting of 20 acres; that as part of said contract and sale said company sold to plaintiff a sufficient amount of water from its said water supply to irrigate said 20 acres of land so that it would grow citrus fruits thereon, which water was to be delivered by said company upon said 20 acres in such quantities as plaintiff might need, plaintiff to pay said company not to exceed 10 cents per inch, miners' measurement, for each 24 hours the said water was run and used by him; that the covenant selling said water and agreeing to furnish the same was made a covenant running with the land then owned by said company, and also with the water supply, mains, ditches, and water pipes owned and used by it; that plaintiff paid to said company for said 20 acres of land and said water the sum of $2,000 cash; that the main and only inducement for the purchase of the said land was the sale of said water as aforesaid, and that the land without the water was not of the value of $5 an acre; that thereafter said company not having conveyed said land and water to plaintiff, and the legal title being in defendant A. F. Jones, at the request of the company, Jones conveyed to plaintiff said land and water, which conveyance in 1894 plaintiff caused to be recorded in Butte county. At the time of his purchase of the land and water the company had laid down mains and pipes for carrying it to the tract purchased by him; that relying on the promises, covenants, and agreements of said company to furnish said water at the price agreed, said plaintiff set out said 20 acres in olive and orange trees, and said company furnished plaintiff with water from said pipes and mains according to the terms of the agreement for many years thereafter; that in 1898 the defendant Oroville Water Company purchased from said Thermalito Colony Company its entire water supply, water ditches, water rights, pipe lines, and mains, and its right to run water in said pipes and deliver and sell the same to persons who had purchased land from said colony company in said tract, and ever since said date has been selling and furnishing water to said persons by means of said water supply and mains aforesaid; that at the time of the purchase by said water company it knew that plaintiff had purchased said 20 acres of land from the Thermalito Colony Company, and a sufficient amount of water to irrigate the same, according to the terms herein referred to, and had for many years been in the actual use and possession of said land, growing citrus fruits thereon, and irrigating the same from said water supply purchased by him from the colony company; that the said Oroville Water Company after its purchase and up to 1902 furnished water to irrigate said piece of land according to said terms; that in said year it notified plaintiff that he would have to pay $100 a year for water rights to irrigate said lot, and if half thereof was not paid by the 1st of April of that year the water would be shut off from use by him; that if said water is shut off as threatened by defendant, and the said orange and olive trees not irrigated each month they will die; that said land without said water to irrigate said trees would be worthless; that there is no means or way by which said land can be irrigated except by said water supply, water pipes and mains of defendant, and that to shut off said water would cause him irreparable damage and injury; that the plaintiff had already expended in the care and growing of said trees more than $4,000. The prayer of the complaint was for a perpetual injunction restraining defendant corporation from shutting off the waters threatened, and for a decree determining his right to said water as contracted for and conveyed by the Thermalito Colony Company to him.

As we have said, the demurrer which was sustained to the complaint was a general one. Much of the brief of respondents is devoted to the point that the allegations of the complaint are indefinite in several respects, particularly as to whether plaintiff purchased his land and water rights from the Thermalito Colony Company, an association, or the Thermalito Colony Company, a corporation, which latter corporation, while we have not mentioned it heretofore in our statement, was composed of the same persons who had constituted the association and by the allegations of the complaint, it appears therefrom, succeeded to all the rights of the association to the water supply, water mains, and right to furnish water to said colony, and subsequently transferred them to the defendant Oroville Water Company. We think a fair consideration of the complaint shows that the plaintiff alleged that he purchased his land and water from the Thermalito Colony Company, the association. But if the complaint were indefinite or uncertain in this respect, it was subject to a special and not a general demurrer. Amestoy v. Electric R. P. Co., 95 Cal. 311, 30 Pac. 550; Lawrence Nat. Bank v. Kowalsky, 105 Cal. 41, 38 Pac. 517; Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568.

It is further insisted that the contract with reference to the water supply for the benefit of plaintiff's land made by the association was not a covenant running with the land, but, at most, a personal covenant, which was not binding upon the water company defendant, as assignee of the Thermalito Colony Association. We do not discuss the point as to whether the covenant here in question was one running with the land so as to bind the assignee of the water company as grantee of plaintiff's covenantor, the Thermalito Colony Company, association, because we think that, treated simply as a personal covenant or agreement under the allegations of the complaint, a court of equity would be warranted in enforcing it against the defendant. There can be no doubt of the proposition that personal covenants or agreements bestowing benefits and imposing restrictions upon the use of land may be enforced in equity, where a subsequent purchaser from the covenantor takes with notice of an existing equitable claim or interest in favor of another. The general rule is stated in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) §§ 688 and 689: "The third and, in its practical effects, by far the most important rule is that a party taking with notice of an equity takes subject to that equity. The full meaning of this most just rule is that the purchaser of an estate or interest, legal or equitable, even for a valuable consideration, with notice of an existing estate, interest, claim, or right, or to some subject-matter, held by a third person, is liable in equity to the same extent and in the same manner as the person from whom he made the purchase; his conscience is equally bound with that of his vendor, and he acquires only what his vendor can honestly transfer. * * * A purchaser with notice of a prior contract to sell or lease takes subject to such contract, and is bound in the same manner as his vendor to carry it into execution. * * * On the same principle, if the owner of land enters into a covenant concerning the land, concerning its uses, subjecting it to easements, or personal servitudes, and the like, and the land is afterwards conveyed or sold to one who has notice of the covenants, the grantee or purchaser will take the premises bound by the covenant, and will be compelled in equity either to specifically execute it, or will be restrained from violating it; and it makes no difference whatever with respect to this liability in equity whether the covenant is or is not one which 'in law runs with the land.'" In Whitney v. Union Railway Company, 11 Gray (Mass.) 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, it is said: "The precise form of the nature of the covenant or agreement is quite immaterial. It is not essential that it should run with the land. A personal covenant or agreement will be held valid and binding in equity on a purchaser taking the estate with notice. It is not binding upon him merely because he stands as an assignee of the party who makes the agreement, but because he has taken the estate with notice of a valid agreement concerning it which he cannot equitably refuse to perform.

These authorities undoubtedly sustain the proposition that where a proper case is presented, equity will enforce a personal covenant or agreement relative to land as effectually as would a court of law had the covenant been one clearly running with the land. And we think there can be no question but that the facts alleged in the complaint show a proper case for the application of the rule in the case at bar. There is every equitable reason for its application, and none to be suggested why it should not be applied. The Oroville Water Company acquired its title to the water works and right to distribute water throughout the colony tract, from the company from which plaintiff had purchased his land and right to the water, with full knowledge of the interest that plaintiff had acquired under his deed. It undoubtedly was advised of the situation and surroundings, and knew that the land on which this water was being distributed was only valuable by reason of the fact that water to irrigate it could be provided. The sole inducement to the purchaser of the tract acquired by plaintiff was that he could acquire a water right in connection with it, that without it the land was practically worthless, and he did acquire this right practically for a cash consideration of $1,900, the right to have water distributed on his land at certain fixed rates, and on the faith of such purchase and contract set out his orchard and expended thousands of dollars in caring for it; that without the use of this water his orchard would perish and his investment become a total loss. All these facts must, in the nature of things, have been known to the defendant corporation when it purchased from the association, and it particularly knew, so it is alleged, that plaintiff had purchased his land and accompanying water right from its grantor. Taking all these facts into consideration it would be clearly inequitable after plaintiff had paid a full consideration of $1,900 for the water right, which he was enjoying at the time that the defendant made its purchase from the association, to say that the association could transfer all its interest in the water supply to the defendant, and that though the latter knew of plaintiff's purchase and right thereunder, it, nevertheless, acquired the property from the association free from any claim or interest in favor of plaintiff as to the particular water right which he had previously purchased, and likewise free from any obligation the association had incurred or assumed relative to it in his favor. If this were true, it would follow that defendant would be under no obligation to furnish plaintiff with any water for irrigation at all, with the inevitable result, if it did not, that his orchard would perish and his property become worthless. The facts recited in the complaint, we think, set forth a proper case in which equity should interfere to prevent this result, and that the order sustaining the demurrer was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer, and allow the defendant to answer.

PEOPLE v. FALLON. (Cr. 1,284.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Admissions — Homicide—Corpus Delicti—Proof.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence of the corpus delicti held sufficient to warrant the admission of defendant's statements, made immediately after the shooting, that he had shot his wife.

2. Homicide—Malice Aforethought.

An instruction in a prosecution for homicide that malice aforethought is manifested by the doing of an unlawful or felonious act intentionally and without legal cause or excuse, not necessarily implying a pre-existing hatred or enmity towards the individual injured, was a correct statement of the law.

3. Same—Insanity—Declarations—Instructions.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the jury were fully instructed on the subject of insanity and of defendant's right to an acquittal in case the jury should find that at the time of the homicide he was insane from any cause and was unable to distinguish between right and wrong as to the act charged, defendant was not prejudiced by the court's refusal to charge that if the jury found him insane, they should disregard declarations made by him at the time of the homicide.

4. Same—Form of Instruction.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, declarations of defendant, made immediately after the shooting, that he had shot his wife, together with accompanying statements assigning his reasons for so doing, were admitted in evidence, a request to charge that if the jury were satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant, at the time of the fatality, was in such a state of mind that he could not distinguish between right and wrong as to the act charged, the jury should disregard, as a circumstance tending to convict him, any and all statements alleged to have been made by him at the time, for the reason that if he was insane he was not responsible and could not be bound by his statements was properly refused, as ignoring the jury's right to consider defendant's statements in determining the question of his sanity.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Thomas P. Fallon was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Guilfoyle, Jr., and Frank V. Cornish, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. Defendant was prosecuted for the murder of his wife, Agnes Fallon, in San Francisco, April 1, 1904, convicted, sentenced to be executed, and appeals. Several grounds are urged for a reversal.

It is insisted that the court erred in admitting evidence of statements, made by defendant immediately after the shooting, that he had shot his wife, on the ground that at the time such evidence was admitted the corpus deliciti had not been proven. When these admissions were received the evidence showed that about 6 o'clock on the evening of April 1, 1904, the defendant and his wife entered her room at 949 Mission street (they were living apart, she having commenced an action for divorce from him a couple of days previously); that shortly thereafter pistol shots, fired in rapid succession in the room, were heard; that defendant immediately came out of the room with a smoking pistol in his hand, which he placed in his pocket, and when it was taken from him it was warm; that this pistol had been in the possession of defendant for several days previously and when taken from him at the time of the shooting contained four exploded cartridge shells; that immediately after the shooting his wife was found lying on the floor of the room under a table with four bullet wounds in different part of her body—one in the throat another in the heart—from the effects of which she immediately died. This evidence was sufficient proof of the corpus delicti or of the elements of crime—the death of deceased as the result of criminal means or agency—to warrant the admissions of defendant that he killed her; admissions which the evidence complained of shows he made as he came out of the door with the pistol in his hand and which he subsequently reiterated. This proof of the corpus delicti, existing at the time these particular objections to the admissions of defendant were offered, was further supplemented by additional evidence on that subject, which makes the further complaint of defendant that the court erred in refusing to advise the jury to acquit for failure of such proof entirely without merit.

Complaint is made relative to instructions. The court instructed the jury fully on the different degrees of murder, and upon the subject of "malice aforethought," express and implied, in its relation to the crime of murder. The court defined these different kinds of malice aforethought as they are defined in the Code itself, and continuing, used this language: "Malice aforethought, of either kind, is manifested by the doing of an unlawful or felonious act intentionally and without legal cause or excuse. It does not imply a pre-existing hatred or enmity towards the individual injured." It is of this quoted portion that complaint is made. We perceive no valid ground for criticism of it. An exactly similar instruction was complained of, but was approved, in People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 263, 76 Pac. 1017, as being a correct statement of the law.

The only defense interposed on behalf of defendant at the trial was that at the time of the homicide he was insane. Among other instructions on the matter of insanity requested by counsel for defendant was the following: "If you are satisfied by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant at the time of the fatality was in such a state of mind that he could not distinguish between right and wrong as to the act charged, you should disregard, as a circumstance tending to convict him, any and all statements alleged to have been made by him at that time for the reason that if then insane he was not responsible for and cannot be bound by any statement or statements made by him at that time." This instruction the court refused to give, and counsel now insists that the refusal was error. We cannot agree with him. The jury were fully instructed under other proffered instructions of the defendant given by the court, and in the instructions given by the court of its own motion, upon the subject of insanity and of the right of defendant to an acquittal should they find that at the time of the homicide he was insane from any cause—unable to distinguish between right and wrong as to the act charged. The jury were particularly instructed at the request of defendant that if, at the very time of the commission of the act alleged against him he was mentally unconscious of the nature of the act in which he was engaged, he was legally irresponsible for it and should be acquitted. It cannot be said that the defendant was prejudiced in refusing to give an instruction telling the jury that, if they found him insane, then to disregard declarations made by him at the time of the homicide when they were repeatedly told that a finding of insanity itself entitled him to an acquittal.

But, aside from this, the instruction as requested was misleading. The statements made by defendant, which his counsel sought by this instruction to have the jury informed that they should disregard if they were satisfied defendant was insane, were his declarations made immediately after the shooting that he had shot his wife and certain accompanying statements assigning his reasons for doing so. The instruction as tendered is open to the objection that it leaves the jury to infer that they may only take into consideration the statements of defendant accordingly as they find from the other evidence upon the subject whether at the time of the killing he was sane or insane; that, if from such evidence they find him sane the statements may be considered as a circumstance tending to convict; if they find him insane the statements must be disregarded as a circumstance tending to that end. The instruction ignores entirely the right of the jury to take these statements into consideration in determining the question of sanity itself, or rather leaves an inference that they are only to be considered after sanity is otherwise established. Of course, no such limitation on the right of the jury to consider such statements is warranted. When the sanity or insanity of a defendant at a given time is involved, it is always important and proper that his acts and declarations at such time should be considered by the jury in determining that question, and any instruction which even inferentially limits or restrains that right is improper. There may be cases (although the evidence in the case at bar does not bring it within the class) where peculiar circumstances might call for an instruction to the jury to disregard incriminating admissions made by a defendant should the jury find him insane when they were made—an instruction in addition to general instructions to be applied in determining the question of sanity, but such special instructions should at least be framed so that the jury would not be left under the erroneous impression that the admissions referred to were not to be considered by them as bearing on the question of sanity but only to be disregarded as a "circumstance tending to convict" should the other evidence in the case show that the defendant was insane when he made them.

It is true, as asserted by counsel for defendant, that, in the case of People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 396, it was held, among other errors warranting a reversal, that the lower court should have given an instruction tendered by the defendant in that case that "'if, at the time of the making of the alleged statements,' the jury were 'satisfied that the defendant was insane,' they 'should disregard them entirely, no matter what caused the insanity.'" This, as we have quoted it, is the entire instruction as it appears to have been there requested. The opinion in that case does not disclose the facts or circumstances under which the statements of the defendant referred to were made, or indicate the statements themselves to which the instruction was intended to apply. It is probable that peculiar facts in that case, which did not exist in the case at bar, may have made the instruction a proper one to have been given, independent of other general instructions as to the law to be applied in determining the question of sanity. But whether they did or not it will be noticed that the instruction in the Wreden Case is very different from the one under consideration here. The giving of it would be in entire harmony and consonant with the right of the jury to take such statements into consideration in determining the question of sanity. The instruction there was open to no objection that it entirely limited the jury to a consideration only of the statements of the defendant as a circumstance tending to convict, ignoring them as a proper element to be taken into consideration in determining the question of sanity or insanity, while this apparent limitation and restriction on the right of the jury to consider it for that purpose is the particular vice of the instruction requested at bar.

This disposes of all the points made on appeal, and finding no error in the record, the judgment and order denying a new trial, which are appealed from, are affirmed.

JERSEY ISLAND DREDGING CO. v. WHITNEY. (S. F. 3,127.)

1. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTING RECEIPT.

Where defendant claimed that a receipt was given in full satisfaction of all work done and to be done under a contract, while plaintiff contended, in accordance with the true construction of the receipt, that it only included plaintiff's claim for work done up to and including the day on which the receipt was executed, parol evidence as to the circumstances under which the receipt was given was admissible to prove defendant's contention.

2. APPEAL—PREJUDICE.

Where answers of a witness, objectionable as stating the witness' conclusions, constituted no more than a mere summary, in the form of a conclusion or opinion, of the previous testimony of the witness, and could have added nothing to the effect thereof in the mind of the trial judge, the admission of such conclusions was harmless.

3. RELEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a bill for services was dated September 17, 1900, and contained a claim for $721.35, purporting to be for work to and including September 13th, and across the face of the bill was written a statement that $650 was received in full satisfaction of all claims, such writing, though treated as a release, instead of a mere receipt, was prima facie effective only as a discharge of the services itemized in the bill.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by the Jersey Island Dredging Company against Arthur L. Whitney. Judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial were reversed by Court of Appeal. 86 Pac. 509. Affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $550.45, alleged to be due it from defendant, for certain dredging work done by it on defendant's ranch at the head of San Pablo Bay, between the 19th and 30th days of September, 1900, at the agreed price of $70 per day of 22 hours. Plaintiff had judgment for the full amount claimed, and defendant appeals from such judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Among other defenses, the defendant alleged that all claims of plaintiff on account of any dredging work had been fully compromised, satisfied, and discharged. The trial court found against defendant upon this issue. The principal point made here is as to the rulings of the trial court in admitting certain evidence upon this issue. To a proper understanding of these rulings, a brief statement of facts is essential. According to the contract between the parties, the dredger was hired by defendant at a certain rate per diem of 22 hours, viz., $70, the dredging work to be done under the direction of defendant, and to continue during his pleasure; the contract not specifying, describing, or limiting the work to be done. On September 1, 1900, a bill had been presented by plaintiff to defendant for work done prior to that date, amounting at the prescribed rate to $1,097.75. This bill itemized the days and hours of work. Upon this bill, defendant had paid $1,000. On or about September 17, 1900, plaintiff presented to defendant a bill, bearing date September 17, 1900, for $721.35, purporting to be for work to and including September 13th. Upon this bill the charges were itemized as follows, viz.: "Bal. due on bill Sept. 1st, $97.75; 143 hour's work, $455.00; 53 hours aground, $168.60." Attached thereto was an itemized statement of the hours of actual work each day. At this time the dredger was still engaged in the service of defendant, and continued so to be to and including the 1st day of October, and between September 17th and October 1st the work for which recovery is here sought was done. Upon the presentation of the bill of September 17th, some dispute arose between plaintiff's president, Mr.

Wright, and defendant, as to the precise nature of which there is a conflict of evidence, which continued over a period of several days, until, on September 25th, defendant paid Wright $650, and wrote across the face of the bill the following, viz.: "Sept. 25, 1900. Paid $650 in full satisfaction of all claims and guaranteed against liens." This was signed by Wright as follows: "Jersey Island Dredging Co., per W. H. Wright, Pres't." At this time no bill for any work done subsequent to September 13th had been presented. It is this statement, written across the face of the bill of September 17th, that is claimed by defendant to constitute a written contract of compromise and release of all claims on account of dredging work, not only for such work as was done prior to September 17th and embraced in said bill, and that done between September 17th and September 25th, but also for that done subsequent to September 25th.

It is apparent that, construing this writing most favorably to defendant, it could not include any claim for work done subsequent to September 25th, the day it was executed, and that defendant was compelled to resort to parol testimony to substantiate the claim made by him, viz., that the $650 was paid and received in full satisfaction of all work done and to be done. This he was allowed to do, and he testified that there was a dispute both as to the character and manner of work and the charges therefor, and that he and Wright agreed that Wright would go on and finish such dredging work as remained to be done, and that he would pay Wright $650, with the understanding that such payment ended the matter, and with the $1,000, already paid, constituted full payment for all services rendered and to be rendered under the contract. This was the only claim made by defendant, and there was no pretense that the writing was made to cover, in addition to the charges specified in the bill, merely amounts due at its date, September 25th. As we have said, defendant was allowed to give this evidence to support a claim at variance with the terms of the writing. In rebuttal, Wright was allowed to testify that the only item in the bill of September 17th that was ever disputed was the charge of $168.60 for 53 hours while the dredger was aground; Wright claiming that such charge was entirely proper and customary, and that, after several interviews, he agreed to make a slight reduction, and accept $650, if Whitney would pay that sum at once. He further testified that there was no discussion or consideration as to any other bill or claim than the one presented, and no discussion as to the payment of $650 being in full as to anything except that bill, and that at the time of the payment he did not know what work had been done since the making of the bill. Thus far, he certainly did no more than to testify, in reply to the testimony of defendant, as to the circumstances under which the payment was made and the writing signed, and to contradict the testimony of defendant as to a parol agreement at variance with the terms of the writing. He was then asked: "When you accepted this $650 and signed this paper, what were you settling?" and answered: "That bill," referring to the bill of September 17th. He was then asked: "Were you settling anything else?" and answered: "No sir." The questions were each objected to on the sole ground that they constituted efforts to contradict a writing by parol evidence, and the objections were overruled. These are the only rulings relative to the admission of evidence which are assigned as error and discussed in defendant's brief.

The questions were objectionable as calling for the mere opinion or conclusion of the witness, but no such objection was made. And even if error was committed in the admission of such testimony, we would not be justified in holding it to be prejudicial, for the answers of the witness did no more than to give the conclusion which would necessarily follow his testimony as to the circumstances under which the alleged release was signed. The answers to the questions under consideration constituted no more than a mere summary, in the form of a conclusion or opinion, of the previous testimony of the witness, and could have added nothing to the effect thereof in the mind of the trial judge. There was certainly no error in the admission of such previous testimony. Assuming that the writing relied on constituted a valid contract or release, instead of a mere receipt, the question still remained as to what was released thereby. It is true the writing stated that the $650 was "in full satisfaction of all claims"; but, taking into consideration the fact that this was written across the face of the itemized bill of September 17th and that the amount named and paid was less than the total amount of such bill, it cannot reasonably be claimed that it clearly and explicitly shows a release and satisfaction of all claims, of whatever nature, from the beginning of the world to the date thereof. Taking the whole writing together, which includes, not only the statement as to payment, but also the bill on which the statement is written, one might reasonably conclude therefrom that the whole subject-matter of the release was the bill upon which it was written and the claims evidenced thereby, and, in the absence of any evidence at all as to the surrounding circumstances, there would be strong ground for holding this to be the proper construction of the writing. Under these circumstances, parol evidence as to the surrounding circumstances was admissible, in order that the trial judge might be placed in the position of those whose language he was to interpret. Civ. Code, § 1647; Code Civ. Proc. § 1860. Taking as true the evidence of Wright as to these circumstances, which for the purposes of this appeal must be done, there can be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conclusion of the trial court that the instrument relied on by defendant was a release only of such claims as were evidenced by the bill of September 17th. As has been said, none of these claims are involved in this action.

We cannot see that the additional words "and guaranteed against liens" are at all material in the determination of the question as to the subject-matter of the alleged release. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court to the effect that no part of the amount claimed had been paid. Some point is made as to $250 shown to have been advanced by a tenant of defendant to plaintiff, but the evidence entirely fails to show that this payment was made for or on account of the defendant, or that it was intended as a payment at all. No other point is made for reversal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

MORSE v. STEELE (S. F. 3,584.)

EXECUTORS—ACTIONS EX CONTRACTU—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS.

Plaintiff delivered certain animals to defendant's testator under the latter's agreement to care for them as carefully as he did his own stock and to breed them for four years, at the end of which time the young were to be sold for the mutual benefit of plaintiff and testator; the agreement further providing that it should come to an end at the expiration of four years, and that testator should have no ownership of the original stock delivered into his custody. Testator died before the expiration of the contract. Plaintiff sued the executrix under a complaint, alleging performance of the contract on plaintiff's part, but that testator in his lifetime, and the executrix thereafter, failed to properly care for the animals, by reason of which they were lost and destroyed and never returned to plaintiff, to his damage, etc. Held, that the complaint alleged a cause of action ex contractu, and not for tort, and was therefore demurrable for failure to charge that the claim was presented to the executrix, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1500.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Henry N. Morse against E. S. M. Steele, as executrix of E. L. G. Steele, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Noble Hamilton, R. M. F. Soto, and J. W. Dorsey, for appellant. Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler and J. F. Bowie, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In September, 1892, E. L. G. Steele, the owner of a ranch in El Dorado county, entered into a written contract with plaintiff with reference to the care and proceeds of certain live stock, which were to be and were delivered by plaintiff to Steele. By the terms of the contract plaintiff was to deliver about 100 jacks, jennies, and mares to Steele upon his ranch. Steele was to receive the animals and care for them "as carefully as he did for his own stock." They were to be bred for four years, and at the end of four years the colts were to be sold for the mutual benefit of the parties to the contract, provided that by the consent of both parties a portion of the colts might be sooner disposed of. It was provided that the agreement should come to an end at the expiration of four years, and that Steele should have no ownership in the original stock delivered to his custody. About two years after the execution of the contract Steele died, and the defendant and respondent herein became executrix under his will. After she had qualified as such executrix plaintiff presented the contract in question to her as a contingent claim against the estate. The claim was rejected, and plaintiff then commenced suit in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment passed for the executrix upon the pleadings; it being shown on the face of the complaint that the action was prematurely brought and that the claim was not due when the complaint was filed. Upon appeal the judgment of the lower court was affirmed by this court in Morse v. Steele, 132 Cal. 456, 64 Pac. 690. The present action was brought on September 28, 1898, while the appeal in the former action was pending. The two months allowed by section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure after the claim became due within which to commence suit thereon had elapsed; the present action, in fact, having been brought nearly two years after the claim upon which it was founded had become due. Respondent herein is sued as executrix only, and it is asked that judgment be rendered against her "as executrix payable in due course of administration." The defendant demurred to plaintiff's complaint. The demurrer was sustained by the court, without leave to amend, upon the ground that the complaint did not show that the claim, which was the foundation of the suit, had been presented to the executrix of Steele's estate, which presentation is, under the provisions of section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a prerequisite to a suit thereon, if the claim be founded on contract. It is undisputed that a complaint which does not allege presentation of the claim, if presentation of a claim is necessary, fails to state a cause of action, since by section 1500 presentation of a claim is a condition precedent to suit. Ellissen v. Halleck, 6 Cal. 393; Morrow v. Barker, 119 Cal. 65, 51 Pac. 12; Humboldt

To meet this, appellant contends that the cause of action set forth in the complaint is not for breach of contract, but is for tort, pure and simple, and that the presentation of a claim is, therefore, not necessary. This position is untenable. The complaint sets up the contract, alleges performance upon the part of plaintiff, and avers that Steele in his lifetime, and afterwards defendant as executrix, failed and neglected to take care of the animals, and that by reason of such failure and neglect they were lost or destroyed, and that they had never been returned to him, to his damage in the sum of $8,000. Though not expressed, it was the implied duty of Steele in his lifetime, and of the executrix, to have returned the stock at the expiration of the bailment, and this duty itself arose under the contract, as explicitly as though it had been expressly provided for. The complaint avers that "immediately after said contract was executed and in pursuance thereof" plaintiff delivered the live stock to Steele, and the case is, in all its essentials, like that of Chapman v. State of California, 104 Cal. 690, 38 Pac. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158, where the harbor commissioners of San Francisco had received upon the wharves of the city coal of the plaintiff. While the coal was upon the wharf it broke, "by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, its officers, and agents, * * * in failing and neglecting to keep said wharf in good and sound condition and repair," and the coal was sunk in the bay and lost to plaintiff. The action was against the state. If it was in tort, plaintiff was not entitled to recover. This court, after so stating, declared: "But we are clearly of the opinion that the cause of action alleged in the complaint is not of this character. It is not founded upon negligence constituting a tort, pure and simple, and unrelated to any contract, but is substantially an action for damages on account of the alleged breach of a contract. * * * A wharfinger is one who for hire receives merchandise upon his wharf, either for the purpose of forwarding or for delivery to the consignee upon such wharf, and matters alleged in the complaint show a contract of the latter character, and the state is bound thereby to the same extent as a private person conducting the business of wharfinger would be under a similar contract. * * * We are entirely satisfied that plaintiff's cause of action, as alleged in the complaint, arises upon contract." In Stark v. Wellman, 96 Cal. 400, 31 Pac. 259, the first count of the complaint averred that plaintiff delivered to defendant, at his special instance and request, a package containing $650 in coin, in consideration of which defendant undertook and agreed to take due and proper care of it, and to redeliver the same to plaintiff upon demand. It charged that defendant did not take due and proper care of said package, but so carelessly conducted himself with respect thereto that it was lost through his gross carelessness, and that he failed to redeliver it upon demand. The second cause of action was for conversion of the same package. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint upon the ground that a cause of action arising upon a contract was improperly joined therein with a cause of action for tort. The plaintiff contended that the first count was for a breach of duty imposed by law and therefore was in tort. This court said: "This contention cannot be sustained. It is true the owner of property injured by the tortious act of another may sue for the injury in tort, without noticing a contract with the wrongdoer of which the wrongful act is a violation. * * * But there can be no question that he may sue for the breach of a contract, as was done in this case. The duty which the defendant is charged with having violated is expressly derived from the contract."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

VOORMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,565.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1906.)

1. PLEADING—TIME TO ANSWER—EXTENSION.

On December 29, 1905, defendants obtained an order extending their time to plead, demur, or move for 30 days, but no pleading or motion was filed within that time, and on January 29, 1906, defendants obtained a further extension for 15 days. On December 20, 1905, plaintiff's attorneys granted defendants a stipulation giving them until February 15, 1906, to answer; but on January 31, 1906, defendants not having pleaded, plaintiff demanded the entry of a default. Held that, regardless of the validity of the court's second extension of defendants' time to plead, plaintiff by her stipulation had waived her right to a default at the time of her application therefor.

2. CERTIORARI—SCOPE.

On certiorari to review an order denying a motion to vacate an order extending defendants' time to answer and for the entry of defendants' default, the only question open for consideration is the jurisdiction of the court to make the order complained of.

3. SAME.

Neither an order granting defendants' leave to demur nor the waiver of defendants' right to demur can be reviewed on certiorari.

In Bank. Application for certiorari, on petition of Mary Voorman, an insane person, by her guardian ad litem, against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and another. Dismissed.

Aitken & Skaife, for petitioners. Livingston Jenks, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. On June 13, 1904, Mary Voorman, an insane person, by John R. Aitken, her guardian ad litem, commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Among the defendants are Heber C. Tilden and Alice Amanda Tilden, his wife, who were served with summons on December 15, 1905, and on December 19, 1905, respectively. On December 29, 1905, the said defendants obtained from Hon. Thomas F. Graham, one of the respondents herein, an order extending their time to plead, demur, or move for 30 days from said 29th day of December. No pleading or motion was filed by defendants within the 30 days. On January 29, 1906, they applied for and were granted a further order extending their time to plead, demur, or move 15 days from said 29th day of January. On January 31, 1906, the plaintiff, by her attorney, demanded of the clerk that he enter the default of said defendants. This demand was refused. On February 2, 1906, the plaintiff, upon due notice, moved the court to vacate the last order extending time, and to enter the default of defendants. The motion was denied, and defendants were given leave to demur forthwith.

This proceeding seeks to review the order of January 29th extending the time after an extension of 30 days, and the order permitting defendants to demur. Plaintiff contends that, under section 1054, Code Civ. Proc., the court has no power to extend time to plead beyond 30 days, and relies upon repeated rulings of this court to the effect that an order so made is in excess of jurisdiction and void. Baker v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 583, 12 Pac. 685; Gibson v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 643, 24 Pac. 152; Kennedy v. Mulligan, 136 Cal. 556, 69 Pac. 291. But here it appears that on December 20, 1905, the plaintiff's attorneys granted to said defendants a stipulation giving them to the 15th day of February, 1906, to answer. Without regard to the order extending time, the defendants were not on the 2d day of February in default. To annul this order, in so far as it enlarges the defendants' time for answer, would not benefit plaintiff, since she was not, in view of her stipulation, entitled to their default when she moved for it. The petitioner seeks to avoid this conclusion by an affidavit in which she alleges that the stipulation extending defendants' time to February 15, 1906, to answer, was given upon the express understanding and condition that they should not demur, and that, by obtaining the extension of time to plead, demur, or move, defendants had violated their agreement, and there resulted a failure of consideration, justifying plaintiff in disregarding her stipulation. But this cannot be considered in the present proceeding, which examines only the jurisdiction of the court making the order complained of. Whether the stipulation was binding, or had lost its apparent effect by reason of oral conditions alleged by the plaintiff, was a question which the trial court had power to decide, if, indeed, it would have been justified in considering, as against a written stipulation, the claim of one party, denied by the other, that there were further conditions not expressed on the face of the writing.

Nor can any order of the lower court, in so far as it grants leave to demur, be reviewed under this writ. It is possible that defendants have waived their right to demur, but whether they have or not is likewise a question for the trial court to determine. In determining such question either way, the court is acting within its jurisdiction.

The proceeding is dismissed.

In re DOLBEER'S ESTATE.

SCHANDER v. GRAY et al. (S. F. 4,473.)

1. APPEAL—REVERSAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the result could not have been different, the Supreme Court will not reverse a judgment for errors which could not have prevented a party from making out a case, or for rulings which, had they all been in his favor, would still not have entitled him to judgment.

2. WILLS—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—INSANITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a will contest, the burden of proof that testatrix was insane at the time she made the will is on the contestant, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1312.

3. EVIDENCE—NONEXPERTS—REASONS.

A nonexpert is only permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, to testify respecting the sanity of an intimate acquaintance on giving the reasons for his opinion.

4. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

Proof of the insanity of a person carries no presumption of its past existence.

5. WITNESSES — EXAMINATION — RESPONSIVENESS OF ANSWER.

On an issue of insanity, where a witness had testified as to expression of pain on the part of the alleged insane person, and was asked as to whether there was more than one expression, and answered, "No," a further answer that the witness had said to her daughter, after such conversation with the alleged insane person, that witness would never forget the look in the alleged insane person's eyes, and that witness knew her mind was not right, was inadmissible as a voluntary declaration.

6. Wills—Testamentary Capacity—Insanity—Evidence.

On an issue of testamentary capacity, evidence held insufficient to justify a submission of the question to the jury.

7. Same—Declarations of Legatee.

On an issue of testamentary capacity, declarations of one legatee are inadmissible.

8. Coroners — Inquest — Admissibility of Verdict in Other Proceedings.

On an issue of testamentary capacity, the verdict of a coroner's inquisition on the body of testatrix's mother and on testatrix's body, both having committed suicide, was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 11, Cent. Dig. Coroners, § 28; vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, §§ 1691, 1692.]

9. Evidence—Nonexpert Opinion.

On an issue of testamentary capacity, questions calling for a nonexpert witness' opinion as to whether testatrix was of sound mind, from witness' knowledge of what she observed of testatrix on a certain day and from what the witness had learned, were objectionable.

10. Wills—Contest—Testamentary Capacity — Hereditary Insanity — Evidence in Rebuttal.

Where, on an issue of testamentary capacity, it was contended that testatrix was the victim of hereditary insanity, acquired both from her mother's and father's people, evidence that her father had never shown any trace of insanity in his lifetime, but was a man of exceptional mental vigor and business capacity, who by his own efforts amassed a large fortune, was admissible.

11. Evidence — Experts — Medical Practitioners.

A general medical practitioner, who has had experience in the various kinds of mental diseases, is as competent to testify to the sanity or insanity of a person as skilled alienists.

12. Same—Hypothetical Questions.

Hypothetical questions, involving facts not testified to by the witnesses themselves, cannot be put to nonexperts testifying on the issue of insanity.

13. Depositions—Absent Witness—Use.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, subd. 3, provides that the testimony of a witness within the state may be taken by deposition when the witness is about to leave the county where the case is to be tried and will probably continue absent when the testimony is required. Section 2032 declares that, if the deposition be taken under the preceding section, proof must be made at the trial that the witness continues absent or infirm, or is dead. Held, that section 2021 contemplates that a deposition may be taken when it is believed the witness will be absent when his testimony is "required," so that the deposition of a witness taken during the trial may be used on proof that the witness had left the state two days before and was then absent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Depositions, §§ 26, 29.]

14. Same—Depositions Taken Without the State.

It is not necessary to the taking of the deposition of a witness without the state, authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 2024, that the witness should be a nonresident.

15. Same—Use—Preliminary Proof.

Where the deposition of a witness was taken without the state, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 2024, it was not incumbent on the persons taking the deposition to show the witness' continued absence at the time her deposition was offered, under section 2032, providing that, if depositions are taken under section 2021, subds. 2–4, proof must be made at the trial that the witness continues absent or infirm, or is dead, as the latter section applies only to depositions taken within the state.

16. Evidence — Presumptions — Absence of Witness.

Where a witness was shown to have been absent when her deposition was taken, it will be presumed, in the absence of proof by the party objecting to the introduction of her deposition, that her absence continued.

17. Trial—Order of Proof—Rebuttal.

Where, in a will contest, the deposition of a legatee was taken by contestant before trial, and the witness was present under subpœna by contestant throughout the trial of the case, but was not called, contestant was not entitled to have the court open the case for the introduction of her testimony because of surprise when she was not introduced by proponent, and, failing in this, to have her deposition admitted in rebuttal.

18. Wills—Contest—Unsoundness of Mind—Instructions.

In a will contest, an instruction that the fact that testatrix committed suicide, while not of itself sufficient evidence of unsoundness of mind, was proper to be considered on the question of her mental condition, and, if the jury found that she did commit suicide, they might consider that fact in determining whether or not she was of sound mind at the time of the making of the will in question, was improperly refused.

19. Appeal—Review—Harmless Error.

The jury having been instructed that they should consider all the evidence in the case in determining the question, and there being no evidence which would have warranted the conclusion that testatrix was of unsound mind at the time she executed the will, the refusal of such instruction was harmless.

20. Trial—Argumentative Instructions.

Requests to charge, which were elaborately drawn and were in the nature of a special argument addressed to the jury under the guise of instructions of law, were properly refused.

21. APPEAL—SUBMISSION OF CAUSE—DEATH OF APPELLANT.

Where appellant died after the submission of the cause, and the judgment was affirmed, the affirmance would be entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of the submission.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Contest of the will of Bertha M. Dolbeer, deceased, by Adolph Schander against George D. Gray and others. From a judgment for defendants, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

See 82 Pac. 192.

Albert M. Johnson and Hiram W. Johnson, for appellant. E. S. Pillsbury and Garret W. McEnerney, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is a contest over the admission to probate of the last will of Bertha M. Dolbeer. The contest was instituted by a maternal uncle of deceased upon the sole ground that at the time of the making of the will Bertha Dolbeer had not testamentary capacity by reason of her insanity. The cause was tried before a jury, which jury rendered a unanimous verdict in favor of the proponents.

Contestant concedes the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury, but urges certain rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence, and in giving and refusing to give instructions to the jury as grounds for reversal. Respondents meet this with the argument that the concession of the appellants that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict does not go far enough; that, in truth, the evidence admitted in the case, even considered with all the offered and rejected evidence of contestant, would support no other verdict than that which was given. Proponents, therefore, invoke the application of the rule, well settled, that, where the result could not have been different, this court will not disturb a judgment for errors which have not prevented a party from making out a case, or for rulings which, had they all been in his favor, still would not have entitled him to a judgment. In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 449, 31 Pac. 453; Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 607, 38 Pac. 443; In re Briswalter, 72 Cal. 107, 13 Pac. 164; Chapea v. Chapman, 144 Cal. 366, 77 Pac. 990. It becomes necessary, therefore, even at some length, to consider the facts presented by the evidence actually received, and then the effect which might have been worked by the admission of rejected evidence, or by the exclusion of admitted evidence which was objected to. The burden was upon the contestant to show affirmatively, and by a preponderance of evidence, the insanity of the testatrix, and the evidence is to be considered in view of this burden which the law casts upon him. Bertha M. Dolbeer, at the time of her death, was 27 years of age. Her parents, John Dolbeer and Harriet Schander, married in 1872. Of the two children born to them Bertha alone survived. In 1879, when Bertha was 2 years of age, her mother committed suicide by shooting herself with a pistol. At the time of her death there were living two brothers and a sister of Mrs. Dolbeer. One of these brothers is the contestant in this case. From 1879 until the time of her death, July 9, 1904, the testatrix never saw and never spoke to either of these uncles, and this contestant knew her only by sight, because she had been pointed out to him. Of the two sisters of Mrs. Dolbeer, a daughter of one who is dead, Ethel Roche, is given $10,000 by Bertha's will. The other sister is Mrs. Moody, who has three daughters and one son. Mrs. Moody, her eldest daughter, and her son never spoke to John Dolbeer, father of Bertha, and he never spoke to them. They never crossed the threshold of his home while he lived, and never entered the daughter's home after her father's death. With the other two of Mrs. Moody's daughters Bertha Dolbeer was on friendly terms. They visited the Dolbeer home and made various excursions with the father and daughter. Bertha Dolbeer visited Mrs. Moody's home and was on terms of casual acquaintance with her, the son, and the daughter above mentioned. Mrs. Breeden, one of the daughters with whom she was on terms of friendship and intimacy, is dead. The other daughter is Mrs. Watson, whose husband was one of the subscribing witnesses to the will. To sum up, the next of kin of Bertha Dolbeer at the time of her death are all maternal relatives, the brothers and sister of her mother. With the brothers she had no acquaintanceship whatever. As to the sister Mrs. Moody, while Miss Dolbeer was a not infrequent visitor to her house, her friendship was wholly for the two daughters, Mrs. Breeden, now dead, and Mrs. Watson, still living. John Dolbeer had accumulated a large fortune. By his will, after numerous bequests and legacies, the major part of this fortune was given to his only child, Bertha. Her will disposes of property of a value exceeding $1,000,000.

When Bertha Dolbeer was 11 years of age there entered the Dolbeer home as her preceptress, Miss Etta Marion Warren, who from that time on until the death of Miss Dolbeer became and continued to be, not alone her preceptress, but her intimate and devoted friend and companion. John Dolbeer died in 1902. By his will he left a legacy to Miss Warren, and in his will described her as one "who has been for a number of years and is now a member of my family." John Dolbeer's family at this time, in law, consisted strictly of himself and his daughter Bertha, and this inclusion of Miss Warren as a member of his family is not without its significance. By the will of Miss Dolbeer the principal portion of her large estate is left to Miss Warren. In her will Miss Dolbeer describes Miss Warren as "my devoted friend," and the record is full of evidences of her affection, of her devotion, and of her gratitude to this lady. She had been her friend, companion, and confidante from her earliest girlhood years. She took Miss Warren's middle name, Marion, and adopted it as her own, calling herself Bertha Marion Dolbeer. She spoke of her always in the most endearing terms. "She was the best friend a girl could have." "Miss Warren had done everything for her in every possible way, and all she hoped was that she could live long enough to pay back in some small way Miss Warren for all her kindness and all her goodness to her." She "did not know what she would do without Miss Warren." "We are like two sisters in one family." "She was the best friend that I ever had in the world; that is, next to my father." "She had been mother, sister, and brother" to her. "She was the nearest of kin she had in the world." "She had been with her since she was a little girl, and she had always looked out for her." She was "more fortunate in having Miss Warren than any one will ever know." She could "never thank Miss Warren for what she had done for her." She was "the only one who was near or dear to her in all the world." Of these and like expressions the record is full. And against them is to be contrasted the position of this wealthy girl, who was, saving for Miss Warren, alone in the world. Alone, not because of any estrangement that had grown up between her and her mother's relatives, but because those relatives had always been strangers to her. I say this, that the facts may be shown as they exist, namely, that this is not the case of an "unnatural will," where dependents and those who had grown accustomed to lean upon the bounty of one are, at the death of that person, without apparent reason, deprived by his will of that bounty. Nor is it a will where relations, intimate in fact as well as in blood, who have had a reasonable basis for their "expectations," have been disappointed at the expression of the testator. Miss Dolbeer's will left her property at her death where in life she had loved, and unless it shall be said that the claims of blood dominate and control the testamentary right (in which case the laws of wills should be swept from our statute books, and all property pass under the laws of succession), the will in question was natural, in its recognition of the claims of gratitude, affection, and love. Miss Dolbeer's own statements furnish ample recognition of this. Her property had come to her from her father. There had been a complete estrangement between her father and her mother's people. She had never known or cared for these omitted relatives. Moreover, in the making of her own will she had before her a copy of her father's will, and in many of the legacies and bequests she copied the provision of her father's will with a touching fidelity to what she must have conceived would have been his wishes.

After the death of her father Miss Dolbeer lived in the paternal home with Miss Warren. For the first year after her father's death she led a reasonably secluded life; such trips and visits as she made being made quietly and with due regard for the proprieties. From August, 1903, to March, 1904, she entered actively upon the social life of one of her means and freedom from responsibilities. She attended balls, parties, places of amusement, and made many excursions with her friends into the country. She was fond of out door sports and amusements, was an accomplished golf player, and a skilled chauffeuse. There was nothing, certainly up to this time, in all her life to have suggested that in any way, or in the slightest degree, she was the victim of insanity. In the spring of 1904 she was somewhat run down in physical health, and under her physician's advice took a period of 10 days' rest, during which time she cut herself off from social functions. She was attended by a trained nurse, and her friends visited her at will. She was wholly freed from the doctor's care and supervision several days before she executed the will in question. She executed this will, as she herself states, in contemplation of her trip to Europe, which had been planned for some 5 or 6 months. Upon the face of the will, which is olographic and of considerable length, there is not the slightest evidence of derangement or of unsoundness of mind. She knew that an olographic will did not require the attestation of witnesses, but took the precaution of executing it in the presence of two subscribing witnesses with the formalities required in the case of a will not olographic. On the day the will bears date she went to the office of Douglass Watson, husband of her cousin, Mrs. Watson, above mentioned, requesting him to witness it. This was on Saturday, the 23d day of April. On Monday, the 25th day of April, she took to the office of Dolbeer & Carson, which was also her business office, a sealed envelope indorsed "last will and testament of Bertha M. Dolbeer." She then took from the office of Dolbeer & Carson a will which she had deposited there a year before. She departed for Europe with Miss Warren, and after her death, which occurred on July 9th of the same year, it was found that the document with Dolbeer & Carson was a copy of her will, at the foot of which was written in her own hand writing: "The foregoing is a copy of my last will and testament, the original of which is in the California Safe Deposit vaults." She thus not only wrote her will, but wrote a copy of it, and left that copy in her business office, with the attached memorandum showing where the original could be found. More than 30 of her intimate and disinherited friends saw her frequently in the time preceding and shortly before the execution of the will, and all testified to her absolute sanity. Twelve of the witnesses saw her on the day the will was executed, and unite in their testimony to her absolute sanity. Nearly 20 witnesses saw her between the date of the execution of the will, April 23d, and April 27th, when she departed for Europe, and they bear the same testimony to her sanity. Many witnesses saw her after she left San Francisco, in Chicago, in New York, on the steamer, in London, and in Paris, on the return voyage, and again in New York, where she met her death, and they bear like evidence to her sanity.

The internal evidence of the writing itself is of a sound and disposing mind. The reason why Miss Warren is the principal beneficiary of her bounty is convincingly shown by Miss Dolbeer's own statements, and in particular by her explanation that her money had come to her from her father and that her mother's relatives were not on speaking terms with her father. No writing before the execution of the will and down to the time of her death (and besides the will itself there were 10 or 12 of her letters introduced in evidence) bears the slightest testimony to any mental unsoundness. To the contrary, they are precisely such letters as it might be expected she would write. Moreover, it is not pretended that Miss Dolbeer was the victim of any hallucinations, that any of her friendships had changed to antipathies, or that practically to the very day of her death her life had not always run smoothly along its regular current. Where, then, is to be found the evidence that Miss Dolbeer, upon the 23d day of April, 1904, was, within the meaning of the law, insane, so as to be incapable of the testamentary act? It rests upon this: contestant endeavored to show that Mrs. Dolbeer, mother of Bertha, was insane during the period of gestation of her unborn child, and after its birth, and committed suicide by reason of this insanity; that there was insanity in her father's family (though it is not pretended that her father was insane); that Bertha Dolbeer herself committed suicide by leaping from a window in the Waldorf-Astoria hotel; and that she so committed suicide because she was insane. But, without pausing to analyze the insufficiency of the evidence to establish several of these propositions, but, to the contrary, conceding that everything which appellant contends for has been shown by this evidence, it proves nothing more, at most, than that Bertha Dolbeer, in New York, upon the 9th day of July, 1904, committed suicide because of her insanity. The presumption always is that a person is sane. Proof of insanity carries back no presumption of its past existence. It exists only from the time when it is proved to exist, and thus I say that, resolving every disputed point as to the weight of the evidence in contestant's favor, the utmost which that evidence by any stretch of liberality can be said to establish is that the deceased had a hereditary taint of insanity in her blood, which declared itself for the first time upon the day of her death and prompted her to commit suicide; that up to the day of her death she had led the sane, normal life of a girl of her wealth and station; that her last will and testament bears every evidence of sanity, and none of insanity; and that if she had died poor, instead of wealthy, no one would have dreamed of saying that up to the day of her death she had ever displayed the slightest symptom of mental derangement, much less an insanity which would deny her the legal right to make her will.

In making the foregoing statement we have not overlooked the testimony which contestant offered of certain intimate acquaintances of the deceased concerning her unsoundness of mind. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870 permits as evidence the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, but with that opinion must be given the reasons upon which it is based, and the opinion itself can have no weight other than that which the reasons bring to its support. Kinne v. Kinne, 9 Conn. 102, 21 Am. Dec. 732; Brashears v. Orme, 93 Md. 442, 49 Atl. 620; Prentis v. Bates, 93 Mich. 234, 53 N. W. 153, 17 L. R. A. 494. These witnesses were but three in number, and all of them interested witnesses—Mrs. Moody, the aunt of Miss Dolbeer and one of her next of kin in case of intestacy; Mrs. Moody's daughter, Mrs. Edna Moody Sherman, whose interest through her mother would be both pecuniary and direct; and Elizabeth C. Phillips, an elderly lady and the cousin of Bertha Dolbeer's father. Mrs. Phillips had been left a legacy of $10,000, with the amount of which she was frankly and avowedly dissatisfied. She likewise objected to the fact that in the disposition of her bounty Bertha had remembered certain people, and in particular she resented the circumstance that Mrs. Warren, mother of Miss Warren, received $25,000 by the will, while she herself received only $10,000. She denies any arrangement between herself and the contestant whereby, in the event of the will being declared invalid, she was to receive an equal sum or more; but she testifies that she haunted Mr. Gray, one of the executors under the will, "for days and weeks to beg for a compromise that I might not be placed on the stand to state what I have done." She testifies, further, that all she had gotten in the world was gone and lost, there was only her husband left, and "all she cared for was money." She says that she "did not want Mr. Brown to have $10,000 in that way. I did not want Mr. Mugan to have $20,000. I did not want Miss Warren's mother to have $25,000. I certainly ought to have had as much as that."

As to Mrs. Moody and Mrs. Edna Sherman, besides their pecuniary interest, if the will should be declared invalid, they were not remembered in it. So much for the attitude of these witnesses.

Coming to their testimony, Mrs. Phillips says she met Miss Dolbeer on April 25, 1904, and declares: "I don't think Bertha was of sound mind in April, 1904." She says: "She acted as though she was under a spell, unsettled, as if she had no opinion of her own, as though she did not know what she wanted to do. She looked very poorly and was very thin. She told me she had been subject to fits of depression." On cross-examination, when pressed for her reasons for her opinion, she says that, in talking of the sudden seizure of her father in New York, just before his death, "she showed more excitement and nervousness than she had ever displayed before. She said: 'I shall never forget it, auntie, I shall never forget it. His struggle for breath, for life. I will never forget it.' She clasped her hands together in a distressed manner." Surely the natural feelings of a daughter over the agonizing scene of her father's sufferings, to which she was a witness, will not be held evidence of insanity. It would have been more pertinent to the issue if the girl had not shown distress. The witness proceeds that "she complained of a pain in her head. She had headache, nervous sleeplessness, pain in her eyes." The pain was "in the back of her head," and her mother's pain was in the back of her head. She could not sleep, and her mother was afflicted with insomnia. When Mrs. Phillips told her that in her judgment she was not fit to go away, Bertha responded: "I have to go. I have to go." And, when pressed further on the subject, she explained that "she had already engaged her steamer apartment." Her manner was as though she did not care for anything, any pleasure. She said she thought the trip on the water might benefit her and she might be able to sleep if she was on the water. She told her aunt that "when one is not well life is not worth living. There is no pleasure in life without health"—her manner during that conversation was depressed. Again, the witness advised her to go to Mrs. Nordingham, the witness' physician, for rheumatism, "and," proceeds the witness, "she promised me she would go. She promised me really she would go. I said I would go for her. She said, 'No, I will surely go, Auntie.' Well, she did not go. It was something that she never made me a promise for anything that she did not keep." She sums up as follows: "It was various little things which impressed me that perhaps I should not worry; but I am satisfied that she was not—her physical health and the mental health would not enable her—well, say, to make that will, I thought, and I was fully satisfied from her manner that she was not responsible; that she was irresponsible." The generalities in which this witness clothes her reasons, the utter inadquacy of the reasons themselves, her naïve declaration that Miss Dolbeer's physical and mental health would not enable her "well, say, to make that will," make this witness' opinion of no probative value in the case.

Mrs. Sherman did not testify to her opinion of the mental soundness or unsoundness of Miss Dolbeer, nor did she testify to a single irrational act. Her evidence was to the effect that Miss Dolbeer was never very enthusiastic nor demonstrative: that on the Sunday before her departure, which was shortly after the making of the will, she was not in very good health; and that she was "more indifferent upon that day than she had ever seen her before." She did not display any enthusiasm when offered letters of introduction to people "who lived in an out of the way place," but to the contrary, she told the witness that she did not expect to do much traveling during her sojourn in Europe, but would remain most of the time in or about Paris. There is no word of this testimony going to the mental unsoundness of the testator, and nothing (having regard to the presumption of sanity) inconsistent with the established fact that at this time Miss Dolbeer's physical health was not good, and that she was going to Paris for the sea voyage and for rest and recuperation there. It is not only not surprising, but quite natural, that her physical ailment should have produced a certain amount of mental depression, and there is much of sound wisdom and nothing of insanity in the girl's declaration that there is no pleasure in life without health.

Mrs. Moody's testimony was to the effect that Miss Dolbeer was of somewhat phlegmatic temperament and displayed little enthusiasm over things, was never wasteful, but rather economical, and had always been accustomed to the luxuries of wealth. The acquisition of her father's estate did not seem to unbalance her in any way or make her giddy or different from what she had been. She was, like a great many daughters who are humored and spoiled, not particularly fond of study, not interested in anything very much; a person of ordinarily good education, about the average of young women; a young lady of good sense as far as the witness knew; a young lady of fastidious propriety and careful of her good name. Miss Dolbeer was at the house of the witness, on the Sunday before her departure, to say goodbye. That was April 24th, the day after the execution of the will. She did not talk much of her trip, "for she did not seem to know exactly what she intended to do. She only seemed to know she was going. She did not seem to have any plans." There was surely nothing surprising in this, in view of the fact that Miss Dolbeer was going, as has been said, for the sea voyage and for rest and recuperation in Paris. The witness testified that before this day she had not observed anything wrong in Miss Dolbeer's mental condition, except that she was very much depressed at times, and she proceeds: "There was nothing unusual in what she said that I know of. There was nothing said that could be taken as unusual. I know she was not well by a good deal, and I know that from an episode that happened at the house. I asked her to come to dinner the following Monday, and after a while she said she must go. I asked her to stay longer. She said, "No," she had some business to attend to. Before that she had exhibited signs of mental distress, which were quite visible, very plain to be seen. She was sitting there after luncheon, upstairs in the library. Suddenly she grasped herself like this [indicating by putting her arms across her stomach], in a tragic manner. I was quite startled, and I asked her if I could get her some little remedy to help her. I said, 'Perhaps you have eaten something,' and a look of great terror came over her face. She did not say she had a pain in her stomach. She said, 'Oh, my stomach.' The look in her eyes was dreadful. She looked terribly frightened, and shook all over this way [indicating by shaking herself]. She clasped herself convulsively. Her face was one of terror, perfect terror, as though something dreadful had happened. She was terribly frightened at something, and the look of terror was so great that it frightened me. I collected myself and tried to quiet her thoughts and turn them into another channel. I asked her something about her trip, and she threw herself back in her chair and let her arms fall, as though she was exhausted and had no strength. Q. How long did this expression of pain seem to last? A. I do not think it was an expression of pain. Q. Well, the expression which you have described? A. Only a very few seconds. I couldn't tell you. I simply changed the subject. Q. Was there any more than the one expression? A. No; we talked a little more about her trip. I offered to give her letters of introduction to friends in Paris. She said, 'Yes, that would be nice.' Then she started after a while to go home, and I saw her down to the front door. I stayed on the porch, and as she was going I said, 'When you get to Paris, write and tell us about the fashions,' just for something light to say. She turned around and gave me the most pitiful look I have ever seen on any one's face—a haunted look of fear, as though she had something on her mind. She turned her face and looked at me. Then she seemed to lose herself and went on down the stairs. I came in and said to my daughter: 'I shall never forget Bertha's look as she was going away. I know that her mind was not right. I am perfectly convinced of it.' * * * I offered to give her a little bicarbonate of soda. I thought, if it was her stomach, it might help a little. She seemed so terrified. When I offered it to her this dreadful look of care was on her face, and she was holding herself in that position, grasping herself in that manner, and said, 'No! No! No!' I saw that she was terrified at something, and I turned the subject of conversation." She testifies, further, that, excepting for this episode during the two hours that Miss Dolbeer was there, the conversation was upon ordinary subjects such as would interest young ladies, "matters of society—what was going on in society." The opinion of this witness is entirely inadequate, when the reasons for it are considered, to form any foundation for a judgment of insanity against this testatrix. She had neither done nor said any irrational thing. She had shown a lack of interest toward the offer of letters of introduction to people in out of the way places, which was not unnatural, considering that she had no expectation of visiting those places and was going abroad for rest. She had a pain in the stomach of such nature that the witness thought it could be relieved by bicarbonate of soda, and the expression upon the face which would naturally accompany this pain the witness describes as a look of fear. This testimony itself is of a condition existing after the making of the will; but if it were on the very day of the making of the will, and at the moment of and as a part of the testamentary act itself, it does not amount even to a scintilla of evidence in support of the appellant's contention. It is significant that in all Miss Dolbeer's life she had done nothing, said nothing, to prompt Mrs. Moody to give a thought to her mental condition (so the lady testifies) until that Sunday, which was the day after the making of the will which omitted recognition of the witness. And in this connection we have Mrs. Moody's own words: "She certainly did not make a just will. I don't think the tie of friendship was great enough— Of course, I don't know; that is just my supposition—that the tie of friendship was certainly not great enough as to leave the bulk to one person."

In the quotation from Mrs. Moody's testimony above given has been inserted, certain words in italics which, by order of the court, were stricken out. We have considered the evidence as though these words had been admitted. They were properly excluded, however, as a volunteer declaration of the witness of her statement to her daughter.

The only other witnesses to Miss Dolbeer's mental condition had but a casual acquaintance with her, which acquaintance arose some two months after the making of the will, and while she was returning upon the steamer to New York—the steward and stewardess of the ship. The steward "noticed" that Miss Dolbeer was looking a little sad. There was nothing else peculiar about her, except that she was sometimes sitting as if she was in deep thought, as if she was thinking about something. "I do not think it was anything different than what anybody else would look that was sad or deep in thought upon a thing." "I did not notice any physical ailment of Miss Dolbeer while she was under my observation, while she was on board the ship. I did not notice anything peculiar about the eyes of Miss Dolbeer, only what I have told you, the expression. She was thinking about things, looked as if she was staring out before her." "There was nothing unusual about her conduct. They [Miss Dolbeer and Miss Warren] acted the same as any other passengers on board the ship." "I could not see her in any way different from other people." "My idea was that she had lost somebody of her relatives or something; that some one had died, or something like that." "I think I only spoke to her and the passengers, just when the passengers came up stairs and came out on the deck, we say, 'It is fine weather,' or something. And in this conversation with Miss Dolbeer on deck respecting the weather and other current events, I think she acted the same as any other passenger." The stewardess testified: "There was a strange looking in Miss Dolbeer's eyes. In German, I would describe it as 'ein starblick.' Probably in English you would say staring." "She looked to me nervous, very nervous." "I have seen many other passengers, when they are about to take a trip across the great Atlantic, look nervous, especially ladies, especially on the first day. Her general appearance was about the same as a great many other lady passengers whom I have seen on the first day. There was nothing unusual about her appearance to attract my attention in any way. Q. How differently did she appear than any lady or many other ladies, to you, who had been passengers on that ship? A. She did not; but you know sometimes a person looks strange to you and you cannot tell what it is. I had never seen her before, and I don't know what her appearance was before then."

This, then, constitutes all of the direct testimony of mental unsoundness. If it stood alone, it would in no wise suffice to countervail against the presumption of sanity; but taken, as it is to be taken, with all the evidence of the girl's life and conduct and acts, from her own writings, from her own words, from the lips of dozens of intimate friends, disinterested witnesses, and medical experts, it was absolutely insufficient to raise a conflict. It was absolutely insufficient to have justified the submission of the question of her mental competency to a jury.

In addition to this direct testimony, contestant offered three physicians, no one of whom had known Miss Dolbeer in her lifetime, and to whom were given long hypothetical questions purporting to array the facts in the case—the insanity of Miss Dolbeer's mother during her pregnancy and afterwards until her suicide, two years later, the insanity upon the father's side, the facts of Miss Dolbeer's life, her mental and emotional characteristics, and her death by suicide. These three medical experts, in answer to these long hypothetical questions, replied that, upon the assumption of the truth of the facts stated, they were of the opinion that "at the time of her death" Miss Dolbeer was of unsound mind and suffering from a form of insanity known to medical science as "simple melancholia." The witnesses were skilled alienists, it may be conceded; but the evidence thus adduced of one who has never seen the person, and who bases his opinion upon the facts given in a hypothetical question, is evidence the weakest and most unsatisfactory. Such questions themselves are always framed with great particularity to meet the views of the side which presents the expert. They always eliminate from consideration the countervailing evidence, which may be of a thousandfold more strength than the evidence upon which the question is based. They are astutely drawn, and drawn for a purpose, and that purpose never is the presentation of all the evidence. It is never to present the fair and accurate view, but the purpose always is to frame a question such that the answer will announce a predetermined result. This kind of expert testimony, given under such circumstances, even the testimony of able and disinterested witnesses, as no doubt these were, is in the eye of the law of steadily decreasing value. The remedy can only come when the state shall provide that the courts, and not the litigants, shall call a disinterested body or board of experts, who shall review the whole situation, and then give their opinion, with their reasons therefor, to the court and jury, regardless of the consequences to either litigant. So, and so only, can it be hoped to remove the estimate of infirmity which attaches at the present time to this kind of evidence. In the case at bar the hypothetical question presented to these experts eliminated all the facts overwhelmingly proved in favor of Miss Dolbeer's sanity, bore with emphasis upon and threw into prominence trifling circumstances, and contained many statements not justly borne out by the evidence itself. It thus presented a portrait of Miss Dolbeer's life and mind absolutely lacking in vraisemblance. All perspective was eliminated, all proportion destroyed, and the picture was as false to the original as is a fantastic and distorted shadow cast by a flickering and uncertain light a false protrayal of the reflected object.

But, aside from all this, two other facts render this testimony of no probative value; the first that the witness testified as to the condition of mind of Miss Dolbeer "at the time of her death," and, as has previously been stated, it may be conceded that her death was self-inflicted and caused by simple melancholia, but this would show no more that that she was insane upon that date, and could not have the effect of proving her insane several months before, when she made her will. Saving in the case of one born a maniac or insane, there must always be a time when a person is rational and of sound mind before the dread disease exhibits itself, and, if Miss Dolbeer was insane upon the day of her death, the evidence fails to disclose that her mental incompetency to make a will arose before that day. Second, the testimony of the physicians is that the form of insanity from which Miss Dolbeer suffered was "simple melancholia," and the characteristics of this kind of insanity are explained at length. Some of its pronounced characteristics are an indifference to life and to worldly interests and affairs. As it developes, delusions will develop, but of a very mild nature, the victim is depressed, and the usual outcome is a suicidal tendency; but the intelligence is either unimpaired or slightly impaired, and one afflicted with simple melancholia would converse apparently rationally, would write apparently intelligently, and would converse with friends or acquaintances so that the affliction would not be noticeable. The main condition is a change in the emotions and disposition. "The desire for life which is natural to most individuals becomes a desire for death. The people that they have loved formerly they grow indifferent to. They often cling to one individual." Assuming that all these attributes and characteristics of simple melancholia were present in Miss Dolbeer at the time that she made her will (though they were not), still there is nothing in this to establish the legal incapacity to dispose of her property. This insanity and these delusions must be shown to have directly affected the testamentary act. But the truth is Miss Dolbeer had not shown any change in disposition, other than a change which might be natural because of her debilitated state of physical health. She had shown no desire for death, but, on the contrary, a very earnest desire for life and health, since she had taken a "rest cure" and was going abroad for the very purpose of building herself up. She had not grown indifferent to anybody whom she had formerly loved, and while in truth she did cling to one individual, Miss Warren, that was an individual to whom she had clung with a mixed feeling of sisterly and daughterly love since she was 11 years of age. For all these reasons, therefore, the testimony of contestants' medical experts cannot be said to raise even a conflict of the evidence upon the question of the sound and disposing mind of Bertha Dolbeer at the time she executed her will.

The Code declares that evidence is deemed satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. "Such evidence alone," it says, "will justify a verdict." Code Civ. Proc. § 1835. One would indeed be presumptuous to say that the evidence contestant offered was "satisfactory." As a result of this survey, the evidence admitted being such as to establish the fact that contestant wholly failed to make out a case, the rulings of the court are to be considered in the light of this conclusion, and such rulings only need be considered, therefore, as contestant insists either prevented him from making out a better case, or unjustly, by the admission of improper evidence, assisted the proponents.

It is contended that the court erred in refusing to admit the declarations of Etta Marion Warren, which declarations, it is asserted, would have been favorable to contestant. Upon the admissibility of such evidence there is a contrariety of opinion in the decisions of our sister states. In Estate of Arnold (Cal. Sup.) 82 Pac. 252, the question was before this court, but was not decided, but the great weight of both reason and authority is against the admission of the declaration of one legatee or devisee when mental incapacity is in issue. One of the vital reasons for this is that the interests of legatees and devisees under a will are several, and not joint. Each claims independently of the other, and it would be unjust under these circumstances to allow the interest of one to be affected by the acts and declarations of another with whom he is not in privity. And for very obvious reasons the declarations cannot be admitted against the individual legatee or devisee who makes them, where the mental incapacity of the testator is the question in issue. If the testator did not have mental capacity to devise or bequeath as to one, he had no more capacity to do so as to another, and it has been held in this state, as of course it must be held, that the statute not only makes no provision by which a portion of a will can be admitted to probate, and probate denied to the remainder (Estate of Pforr, 144 Cal. 121, 77 Pac. 825), but further, that a will cannot be annulled in part; it must be annulled in its entirety or not at all (Estate of Freud, 73 Cal. 555, 15 Pac. 135). The industry of counsel discloses that in 17 of our states such declarations are held inadmissible, and in only 3 states, Georgia, Kentucky, and South Carolina, are they held admissible, while in 2 states, South Carolina and Tennessee, there are conflicting decisions. The most recent case is Fethergill v. Feathergill (Iowa) 105 N. W. 377, and upon the same subject may be cited Roberts v. Trawick, 13 Ala. 68; Appeal of Dale, 57 Conn. 127, 17 Atl. 757; Campbell v. Campbell, 138 Ill. 612, 28 N. E. 1080; Phelps v. Hartwell, 1 Mass. 71; McConnell v. Wildes, 153 Mass. 487, 26 N. E. 1114; Hayes v. Burkam, 67 Ind. 359; In re Ames' Will, 51 Iowa, 596, 2 N. W. 408; O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183, 57 N. W. 105; Prewett v. Coopwood, 30 Miss. 369; Schierbaum v. Schemme, 157 Mo. 1, 57 S. W.

526, 80 Am. St. Rep. 604; Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 N. H. 573, 15 Atl. 219; In re Van Dawalker's Will (Sup.) 71 N. Y. Supp. 705; Matter of Baird, 47 Hun, 77; Stull v. Stull (Neb.) 96 N. W. 196; Thompson v. Thompson, 13 Ohio St. 356; Nussear v. Arnold, 13 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 323; Mullins v. Lyles, 1 Swan. (Tenn.) 337; Whitelaw's Adm'r v. Whitelaw's Adm'r, 96 Va. 712, 32 S. E. 458; Forney v. Ferrell, 4 W. Va. 729. The ruling was therefore proper.

The court was correct in excluding the verdict of the coroner's inquisition upon the body of Mrs. Dolbeer in California, and also upon the body of Miss Dolbeer in New York; but, even had the rulings been error, the result, for reasons already stated, could not have been affected. It has been expressly decided in this state that a verdict of a coroner's jury is not admissible in such a case as this. Hollister v. Cordero, 76 Cal. 649, 18 Pac. 855; Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 576, 66 Pac. 862, 67 Pac. 760; Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 Pac. 899. And, indeed, the great weight of authority elsewhere supports this view. Germania Ins. Co. v. Ross-Lewin (Colo. Sup.) 51 Pac. 488, 65 Am. St. Rep. 215; Railroad Co. v. Moore, 61 Ga. 151; State v. Commissioners, 54 Md. 426; Goldschmidt v. Ins. Co., 102 N. Y. 486, 7 N. E. 408; Ins. Co. v. Milward (Ky.) 82 S. W. 364, 68 L. R. A. 285; Wasey v. Ins. Co., 126 Mich. 119, 85 N. W. 459; Kane v. Maccabees (Mo. App.) 87 S. W. 547; Life Ins. Co. v. Schmidt, 40 Ohio St. 112; Cox v. Royal Tribe, 42 Or. 365, 71 Pac. 73, 60 L. R. A. 620, 95 Am. St. Rep. 752; Chambers v. Woodmen (S. D.) 99 N. W. 1107; Whitehurst v. Commonwealth, 79 Va. 556.

The court sustained an objection to questions asked by contestant of Mrs. Moody. These questions were: "Taking all the facts you have learned in respect to Miss Dolbeer, together with the events of the Sunday just before she went East, and from your knowledge of what you observed of her on that day, your opinion is that on that day she was not of sound mind?" The second question, framed along similar lines, was: "Now, Mrs. Moody, from what you observed on the Sunday before her departure, and what you had learned and what you knew of Miss Dolbeer, and what you had observed, her actions and conduct and language, all taken together, massing all that knowledge in your mind, was she of sound mind the day she visited you?" Both questions are subject to the same objection—that they permit the witness to testify upon hearsay information, "from what she had learned." There can be no difference in principle between this question and one which calls for the opinion of the witness based upon what he may have heard. And it has been repeatedly held that to allow a witness to testify upon knowledge or information thus received is error. People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392; Xenia Bank v. Stewart, 114 U. S. 224, 5 Sup. Ct. 845, 29 L. Ed. 101; Flanagan v. State, 106 Ga. 109, 32 S. E. 80; Kehrig v. Peters, 41 Mich. 475, 2 N. W. 801.

Evidence was offered, and admitted over objection, showing that John Dolbeer, father of Bertha, not only never showed any trace of insanity in his lifetime, but was a man of somewhat exceptional mental vigor and business capacity, who by his own efforts amassed a large fortune. This evidence was properly admitted. The contention of contestant was that Bertha Dolbeer was the victim of hereditary insanity, and that the taint was in the blood of Bertha, from her mother's and her father's people. Even though no effort was made upon the part of contestant to show that her father had been insane, it was perfectly proper to put before the jury the fact that her immediate paternal progenitor was not only not insane, but was of exceptional mental power, and had borne a prominent part in the active affairs of business life. As said in Estate of Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794, it will not be presumed that a child inherits the insane, and not the sane, tendencies of her family.

Dr. Hertzstien, a skilled medical man, had met Miss Dolbeer in Paris upon her last visit there. He had met her socially at a dinner party. He qualified as an expert, his experience covering all classes of diseases, mental and physical, requiring medicinal or surgical aid. He was asked the opinion whether, upon the occasion when he met Miss Dolbeer, she was of sound mind, and answered, over objection, that she was. A general practitioner who has had experience in the various kinds of mental cases is as competent to testify to the sanity or insanity of a person as the skilled expert who devotes his entire time to the study of mental diseases. Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 569, 687; Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 515, 35 Am. Rep. 83; Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 497, 9 Am. Rep. 760; Phelps v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 32 S. W. 470; Abbott v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 55 S. W. 196. Without multiplying authorities upon this proposition, it is sufficient to refer to 12 Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 452, which shows this to be the rule, not only in the courts of the United States, but in 20 and more state courts whose cases are there cited.

Hypothetical questions, involving facts not testified to by the witnesses themselves, were put by contestant to certain nonexpert witnesses, familiar friends of the deceased, and by the court were ruled out. These rulings were proper. No case has been cited which allows such a line of inquiry, even upon cross-examination, and as to the impropriety of such questions reference may be made to Rambler v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 90, 10 Am. Dec. 444; Hogmire's Appeal, 108 Mich. 410, 66 N. W. 327; Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192; Pittard v. Foster, 12 Ill. App. 132; Ragland v. State, 125 Ala. 12, 27 South. 983; Appleby v. Brock, 76 Mo. 314; Bell v. McMaster, 29

It is not perceived that the contestant suffered in any of his rights by the alleged improper limitation upon the cross-examination of certain of proponents' witnesses. To the contrary, it affirmatively appears that every reasonable latitude, and in some instances even a most liberal latitude, was allowed in this regard.

The exclusion of the deposition of Theodore Rumney under proponents' objection was not error, and from no point of view, if error, could the ruling have been injurious to contestant. Mr. Rumney was a New York banker. In his deposition he testified that Miss Dolbeer and Miss Warren called at his office on July 9, 1904, the day of Miss Dolbeer's death; that she drew some money on a letter of credit which she had with her, and handed the money to Miss Warren. Mr. Rumney testified repeatedly that on that occasion Miss Dolbeer's appearance was rational, and that she acted in a rational manner, and that "it never entered his head to think she was other than rational." On cross-examination, when asked whether at any subsequent time he had any suspicion of the fact that Miss Dolbeer was irrational, he answered: "Not that she was irrational; that did not. * * * She was rational; but after I had read the evening paper [containing an account of her death], it seemed to me, in thinking it over, that she was in a tense mood, never irrational."

The court did not err in receiving in evidence the deposition of Fred A. Greenwood. The appellant's objection to this was that the deposition was taken on November 11, 1904, during the trial which commenced on November 2, 1904. It was read in evidence on December 7th and 8th, on proof that the witness had left the state two days before, namely, December 5, 1904, and was then absent. The proposition urged by counsel is that the proponents should have called the witness, because he was in the state during the progress of the trial. The sections of the Code covering the subject are as follows: "The testimony of a witness in this state may be taken by a deposition: * * * (3) When the witness is about to leave the county where the case is to be tried and will probably continue absent when the testimony is required." Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, subd. 3. "* * * If the deposition be taken under subdivisions 2, 3 and 4 of section 2021, proof must be made at the trial that the witness continues absent or infirm or is dead." Code Civ. Proc. § 2032. This section contemplates that a deposition may be taken when it is believed that the witness will be absent, not during any part of the trial, but when his testimony is "required," and the only additional requirement of the Code is that the witness shall be absent when the deposition is used. It was not even shown that proponents had knowledge that deponent Greenwood was in the county during the progress of the trial, and, as said in Abless v. Miller, 12 Tex. 111, 62 Am. Dec. 520, if the deposition is legally taken it is admissible, and "it would be unreasonable to require a party to keep an eye on the witness after his testimony had been taken, and to make it his duty to put the witness under subpœna should he move into the county."

Nor was it error for the court to admit in evidence the deposition of Miss Ethel Postley. This deposition was taken in New York on the 28th day of October under the provisions of section 2024 of the Code of Civil Procedure. To permit its introduction in evidence no preliminary proof was required to be made under the provisions of section 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure, since that section applies only to depositions taken in the state. To take a deposition under section 2024 it is not necessary that the witness be a nonresident. The question of the witness' residence is not involved. All that is required is that the witness be out of the state. It was, therefore, not incumbent upon the proponents to show her continued absence at the time her deposition was offered. The presumption existed that, the witness having been shown to have been absent, her absence continued; and it was upon the party objecting to prove the contrary. Randolph v. Woodstock, 35 Vt. 291; Hennessy v. Ins. Co., 8 Wash. 91, 35 Pac. 585, 40 Am. St. Rep. 892; Gaul v. Wenger, 19 Mo. 541; Brewer v. Beckwith, 35 Miss. 467. This proof was not made by the contestant. The only testimony upon the subject was that by Mr. McEnerney, who stated merely that he had been informed that the witness was in San Francisco, but had been unable to subpœna her. Mr. McEnerney's information upon this matter is not the measure of the proof contemplated by the law.

The deposition of Miss Warren had been taken by the contestants, and she had been examined at great length and with much particularity. She was under subpœna by contestant throughout the trial of the cause. Contestant did not call her to the witness-stand, nor did proponents. At the conclusion of the taking of proponents' evidence contestant sought to have the court open the case for the taking of Miss Warren's testimony, upon the ground of surprise; their expectation being that proponents would call her as a witness, and failing in this they sought to have her deposition admitted as rebuttal evidence. His motions addressed to these ends were denied by the court, and there was no error in these rulings. The sole issue in the case was the mental incompetency of the deceased. Upon this contestant had the burden and was required first to introduce his evidence. What Miss Warren would testify to was known to him from the deposition which he had taken, and she was present in the courtroom in obedience to his subpœna. If he failed to present the testimony of a witness, which testimony would have been valuable to his cause, under these circumstances, the responsibility for this failure must rest with him; for it cannot be said that there was any abuse of the discretion of the court in refusing to allow the case to be reopened for this purpose. As to the proffer of the deposition by way of rebuttal testimony, it was properly excluded as being in no sense rebuttal.

Exception is taken to the rulings of the court in giving and refusing to give instructions. It may be said that generally the complaint is, not that the instructions actually given were erroneous, but that the instructions proposed by the contestant, being unimpeachable in point of law, should have been given. In some instances there is merit in this contention of appellant. This is true of the proposed instruction as follows: "The jury are instructed that the fact that the testatrix committed suicide, if the jury shall find that she did commit suicide, is not of itself sufficient evidence of unsoundness of mind; but this is proper to be considered upon the question of the mental condition of the testatrix, and if the jury find that Bertha M. Dolbeer did commit suicide, they may take that fact into consideration in determining whether or not she was of sound mind at the time of the making of the will in question." Nevertheless, it cannot be said that the refusal of the court to give this instruction and others which may be considered to stand in like position affords substantial ground for reversal of the case. In the first place, it certainly may be presumed that, when the court admitted evidence tending to show that Miss Dolbeer committed suicide, the jury understood that it was to be considered by them as evidence bearing upon the question of her mental capacity at the time of the making of the will. Moreover, the jury was instructed that they were to consider all the evidence in the case in determining this question; and, finally, since, as has been said, the evidence in the case would not have warranted any other conclusion than that which the jury reached, the refusal to give these instructions becomes unimportant, and the objections entirely lack the significance which would attach if the case had been in any sense a close or doubtful one.

The court, at the request of the proponents, instructed the jury as follows: "A hypothetical question is a question which assumes a certain condition of things to be true, a certain number of facts proved or to be proved, and calls upon the witness to assume all the material facts stated to be true and express his opinion as to a certain condition. The witness to whom the hypothetical question is addressed assumes them to be true, and bases his answer upon the assumed case. The opinion of the witness must, therefore, be brought to the test of the facts in order that you may judge what weight the opinion is entitled to." Appellant concedes that his instruction "may be true as an abstract proposition of law," but insists that its tendency was to discredit the testimony of the expert physicians whom he had called. This objection is untenable, and the reasons which have been already given answer contestant's exception to the court's refusal to give certain instructions proposed by him upon the subject of expert testimony.

Contestant's instructions, which embodied their "theory of the case," were properly refused. The same objection obtains to these instructions that obtains to the hypothetical questions which they propounded—that the evidence did not in vital respects tend to substantiate their theory. Again, these instructions were elaborately drawn and were in their nature a special argument addressed to the jury under the guise of instructions of law, and for this reason also were properly refused.

No other matters seem to call for particular consideration, though it may be added that, upon a review of all the instructions, the conclusion is irresistible that the jury was fairly and impartially advised.

Application for a writ of supersedeas pending the decision of this cause has been asked for. This decision renders more formal consideration of that application unnecessary. It is denied.

Appellant having died since the submission of this cause, it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed nunc pro tunc as of the date of submission.

WEBER v. McCLEVERTY. (S. F. 3,143.)

1. Executors and Administrators — Claims —Presentation—Deed of Trust.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1475, declares that, if there be subsisting liens or incumbrances on the homestead, the claims secured thereby must be presented and allowed as other claims against the estate of the deceased owner, and provides the manner in which the funds of the estate shall be applied. Civ. Code, § 1114, declares that the term "incumbrances" shall include taxes, assessments, and all liens on real property, and section 2872 provides that a "lien" is a charge, imposed in some mode other than by a transfer in trust, upon specific property, by which it is made security for the performance of an act. Code Civ. Proc. § 1180, defines a "lien" as a charge imposed on specific property, by which it is made security for the performance of an act. Held, that a deed of trust of a homestead, given to secure a debt, by which the title was transferred to the trustee, was neither a lien nor incumbrance on the property within section 1475, and hence the holder of the debt secured by the deed was under no obligation to present the same for allowance against the estate of the grantor as a condition of the creditor's right to foreclose the deed.

2. MORTGAGES—DEED OF TRUST—EFFECT.

A deed of trust vests in the trustee, for the purposes of the trust, the absolute and legal title to the entire estate held by the grantor immediately prior to its execution, which estate remains in the trustee for that purpose until the trust is either executed or ceases to exist by reason of payment of the debt.

3. SAME—VALIDITY OF SALE.

Where a deed of trust included a homestead and other property, a sale of the entire property in disregard of the demand of the widow of the trustor that the property other than the homestead should be first sold was voidable only at the election of the widow.

4. SAME—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

Where a deed of trust of a homestead and other property authorized the trustees to sell the property as a whole or in parcels, and the property was all sold in bulk to a purchaser who was not shown to have had notice of a demand by the widow of the trustor that the property other than the homestead should be first sold, and in an action by the purchaser to recover possession, the widow filed no cross-complaint and did not ask that the sale be vacated, she was not entitled to such relief, though the sale was voidable at her election for violation of such demand.

5. SAME—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

Where a deed of trust was executed on property on which a homestead was subsequently declared and on other property, the possession of defendant as executrix and as widow of the trustor was consistent with the right of the trustees to sell the property for nonpayment of the debt, and was not of itself notice to a purchaser at the foreclosure sale of any homestead claim.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Adolph C. Weber against Mary E. McCleverty. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. E. Hatch and Alexander D. Keyes, for appellant. R. M. Fitzgerald and Campbell, Fitzgerald, Abbott & Fowler, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover possession of a certain tract of land. Judgment was given for the defendant in the court below, and the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions containing the evidence.

The main defense is that the title of the plaintiff was acquired solely by purchase and conveyance to him from certain trustees at a sale of this and other tracts of land, made by them under a deed of trust of the lands executed to them by Charles McCleverty, the husband of plaintiff, giving them power to sell the lands, in default of the payment of a debt owing to the Humboldt Savings & Loan Society, and apply the proceeds in payment upon the debt; that after the execution of the deed of trust, and while she and her said husband were residing on the tract sued for, she recorded a duly executed declaration of homestead thereon, it being community property; that thereafter, and before the trustees' sale, her said husband died, she became executrix of his estate, and was duly appointed and qualified; and that no claim against the estate of said deceased for the debt secured by said deed of trust was ever presented to the executrix of the estate. It is claimed that, under the provisions of section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the power of sale given by the deed of trust cannot be enforced against the homestead thus created, except for the deficiency that may remain unpaid on the debt after it has been presented and allowed against the estate and the funds of the estate applied as far as they will go upon its payment, and hence that a sale to enforce a trust deed of this character, made without presenting a claim against the estate for the debt, is void.

1. It has not been generally supposed, hitherto, that this section required the presentation for allowance, against the general assets of an estate, of a claim secured by a deed of trust executed by the deceased in his lifetime, as a prerequisite to the execution of the power of sale created by the deed of trust, as against a homestead selected after the making and recording of the trust deed. It may be assumed that such powers have heretofore been exercised, in like cases, without the presentation of any claim, and that some titles to real estate will be unsettled if such prior presentation is now held to be essential. A decision to that effect should not be made unless the terms of the statute clearly require it. Section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as it applies to the present question, is as follows: "If there be subsisting liens or incumbrances on the homestead, the claims secured thereby must be presented and allowed as other claims against the estate. If the funds of the estate be adequate to pay all claims against the estate, the claims so secured must be paid out of such funds. If the funds of the estate be not sufficient for that purpose, the claims so secured shall be paid proportionately with the other claims allowed, and the liens or incumbrances on the homestead shall only be enforced against the homestead for any deficiency remaining after such payment." The application of this section to the estate of a trustee, holding under a trust deed, made to provide for the payment of a debt of the deceased due to a third person, by virtue of a power of sale for that purpose conferred upon the trustee by the terms of the deed, primarily depends upon the question whether or not the trust deed, or the estate and power thereby vested in the trustee, can be considered a "lien or incumbrance" on the land conveyed to the trustee by the deed, in the sense in which those words are used in the section. If it is neither a lien nor an incumbrance, then that statute has no application to this case. It is not contended that it comes within the technical definition of a lien, but it is earnestly argued that it constitutes an incumbrance.

There can be no doubt that often in contracts, and sometimes perhaps in statutes, the word "incumbrance" is used in a connection, or under such extraneous circumstances, that it is very properly given a meaning broad enough to include such a qualified estate or interest as that vested by a deed of trust, or, indeed, any outstanding estate or right in the land, or its attributes, that would limit or qualify an otherwise absolute estate in fee. Equitable considerations frequently require that these or similar terms shall be allowed a wider significance than their technical or natural meaning would permit. We do not think the present instance is of this character. It is true that it is the policy of the law to favor homesteads, to a certain extent, for the protection and preservation of homes and families. But there is a limit beyond which this policy should not be allowed to control. It should not be invoked for the purpose of establishing a new application and interpretation of a statute, contrary to its true meaning and in the face of a long-established understanding and usage based on its true meaning. The different Codes are to be harmonized and construed together as parts of the same statute, as far as may be reasonably possible. (Political Code, § 4480.) Language in one Code is often used with reference to similar language, or definitions thereof, contained in another one of the Codes. The present case is an instance of this use. The Code of Civil Procedure nowhere defines the term "incumbrance." In the Civil Code, however, we find its meaning clearly stated. Section 114 of that Code, following a section concerning the effect of covenants against incumbrances on land, declares that "the term 'incumbrances' includes taxes, assessments and all liens upon real property." In section 2872 of the Civil Code, in the chapter relating to liens, a lien is defined as follows: "A lien is a charge, imposed in some mode other than by a transfer in trust, upon specific property, by which it is made security for the performance of an act." A deed of trust is not a tax or an assessment, and being, by the terms of the definition, excluded from classification as a "lien," it follows from the language of section 1114 that it is not an incumbrance. Section 1180 of the Code of Civil Procedure defines the term "lien" thus: "A lien is a charge imposed upon specific property, by which it is made security for the performance of an act." The language is the same as in the Civil Code, except that the words "in some mode other than by a transfer in trust" are omitted in the Code of Civil Procedure. If this language could be given a meaning broad enough to include a transfer in trust, which is doubtful, it would have no effect in this case. In that event it would be inconsistent with section 2872 of the Civil Code, which was amended in 1878, six years after the enactment of section 1180 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1180, being the earlier enactment, would be repealed by the later statute, so far as the two were inconsistent. Furthermore, as section 1180 of the Code of Civil Procedure constitutes the introductory part of title 4 of that Code, which title relates to the subject "Of the Enforcement of Liens," its scope should be limited to the liens provided for in that title, and it should not be held to refer to deeds of trust, the foreclosure of which is not there provided for.

In legal effect a deed of trust does not create a lien or incumbrance on the land, but conveys the legal title to the trustee. In order to execute the trust he must be by the deed so far invested with the absolute title to the land as is necessary to enable him to convey it to the purchaser at the trustees' sale free of all right, title, interest or estate of the trustor, or of any one claiming under or through the trustor by virtue of any transaction occurring after the making of the trust deed. The deed of trust, therefore, vests in the trustee, for the purposes of the trust, the absolute legal title to the entire estate held by the trustor, immediately prior to its execution, and that estate must remain in the trustee for that purpose until the trust is either executed, or ceases to exist by reason of payment of the debt. It is consequently legally impossible for the trustee in his fiduciary capacity to hold a lien or incumbrance on the land which is the subject of his trust. The existence of a lien or incumbrance vested in one person necessarily implies that the title to the property, interest, or estate covered by the lien or incumbrance is vested in some other person. One cannot at the same time hold an estate in real property and a lien or incumbrance upon that particular estate. The trustee holds title to the entire estate for the purpose of conveying it when required in execution of the trust, and he cannot at the same time hold as trustee a lien on the same estate, for that would necessarily imply that the title to the estate was not vested in him. The estate of the trustee in the land is consequently not a lien thereon, even as that term is defined in section 1180 of the Code of Civil Procedure, conceding it to be in force. It is not a charge on the land, but the very land itself. A mortgage or other incumbrance on land does not transfer the title, but leaves it vested in the mortgagor or owner. A homestead attaches to whatever estate in the land may be vested in one or both of the spouses. Consequently, when declared on land previously mortgaged or incumbered, it attaches to the legal title which then becomes the homestead interest, and the mortgage or incumbrance may properly be said to be a subsisting lien or incumbrance on the homestead, and as such it would be governed by section 1475. But it is not so with a deed of trust. It transfers the legal title to the trustee, and, as the homestead applies only to the title vested in one or both of the spouses, and does not affect titles vested in third persons, it follows that the legal title thus vested in the trustee forms no part of a subsequently declared homestead and that the deed of trust, or the title of the trustee is not a subsisting lien or incumbrance on the homestead interest.

The decisions of this court, with one exception, are in harmony with these views. In Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379, 53 Pac. 813, speaking of the character of a deed of trust, the court says: "Under the decisions, it is practically, though not in legal effect, little more than a mortgage with power to convey. The legal title passes, but it conveys no right of possession and the trustor may remain in possession, and, until the execution of the trust, may maintain an action to recover possession. * * * The trustor may file his declaration of homestead and hold the premises as such against his creditors who are not secured by the trust deed. * * * While we must say that the title passes, none of the incidents of ownership attach, except that the trustees are deemed to have such an estate as will enable them to convey." Similar expressions are found in Tyler v. Currier, 147 Cal. 36, 81 Pac. 319. In Hodgkins v. Wright, 127 Cal. 688, 60 Pac. 431, in speaking of such deeds, and evidently intending to epitomize the above passage from Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, to which reference is made, the court says: "In effect they are mortgages with power to sell." The statement that they are in effect, or practically, mortgages with power to sell, means only that the practical result of the enforcement of either is the same; that is, the estate held by the mortgagor at the time of the execution of the mortgage, in one case, and that of the trustor at the time of the execution of the deed of trust, in the other case, are by the respective conveyances of the sheriff on foreclosure sale, and of the trustee on trustee's sale, transferred to the respective purchasers at such sales, and that in the meantime the mortgagor and trustor, respectively, have the use and enjoyment of the property. All this is true, and yet the entire estate of the trustor, for the purposes of the trust, must, during the intervening period, be vested, as an estate, and not as a lien, in the trustee; otherwise, he could not legally convey it in execution of the trust. The case which seems to hold that a deed of trust is an incumbrance and not an interest in the land is Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, 66 Cal. 200, 5 Pac. 85. The question there arose whether section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring any person "claiming an interest" in land upon which a building was being erected to give notice that he will not be responsible for the same in order to avoid the enforcement of a lien for the cost of the building against such interest, was applicable to a deed of trust. The court in effect held that, so far as that section is concerned, the estate created by the trust deed should not be deemed an interest in the land, so as to require the trustee to give such notice, and said that the deed should be "treated" as an incumbrance, and that, the deed having been recorded before the building was begun, it was exempt from the lien by the provisions of section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court merely says that in the application of sections 1186 and 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a deed of trust should be "treated" as an incumbrance. This is far from deciding that it is, in legal effect, an incumbrance; indeed, the context implies an admission that it has no such legal character, and is to be so considered only when, in a court of equity, the ultimate results are to be considered, rather than legal forms and rules. The point received no thorough treatment in the opinion, the Code definitions were not mentioned, and although we do not in the least impugn the authority of the decision as a construction of the section of the Code there involved, we do not consider ourselves bound to adopt the doctrine as a general principle, and, in the face of the provisions of the Civil Code above given, apply it also to section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The claim or interest of the trustees, not being either a lien or incumbrance on the homestead, and the homestead right being subsequent to the deed in point of time and subordinate to it in all respects, it follows that the conveyance of the trustee related back to the estate of the trustor at the time he executed the trust deed, and transferred to the purchaser the entire right, title, interest and estate in the land then vested in the trustor, thereby completely extinguishing the homestead.

2. Another defense urged to the action is that, after the death of Charles McCleverty, the trustor, and before the sale, the defendant made a demand upon the trustees and also upon the creditor, the Humboldt Saving & Loan Society, that upon a sale by the trustees to enforce the trust the property described in the trust deed, other than the homestead, should be sold to satisfy the debt before resorting to the homestead, and that said demand was refused and said property sold as a whole. It may be conceded that the widow had the right to make this demand, and, if disregarded to her injury, to maintain an action or cross-action to vacate the sale. But a sale so made would not be absolutely void. It would be, at most, only voidable at her option. She could waive her right to set it aside, and, if she took no action to vacate it, the sale would stand. She has filed no cross-complaint, and the answer does not ask that the sale be vacated. Nor does it allege facts which would warrant a decree against the plaintiff declaring it void. It does not show that the value of the property, including the homestead, exceeded the debt, nor that a separate sale would have saved her homestead, nor anything to indicate that a sale in parcels would have been more beneficial to her than the sale as an entirety. The deed of trust authorized the trustees to sell the property as a whole, or in parcels, as they saw fit. The purchaser was not the creditor, but, so far as appears from the pleadings and evidence, a mere stranger, buying without notice of any facts except such as would be imputed to him from the contents of the trust deed. It does not appear that he had notice of the demand for a separate sale, nor that he knew of the declaration of homestead. The possession of the defendant as executrix and as widow of the testator, was entirely consistent with the right of the trustees to sell, and was not of itself notice of any homestead claim.

The court below erred in its conclusion of law that on the facts alleged and found the plaintiff was not entitled to possession, and in giving judgment for the defendant.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, and with leave to the defendant to file amended or additional pleadings as she may be advised.

FITTS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(S. F. 3,596.)

1. Jury—Qualifications of Jurors—Bias.

In an action against a railroad for injuries sustained at a crossing, a juror who had formerly been a railroad purchasing agent and had dealings with defendant testified that he had a feeling in favor of the defendant for many years and a prejudice against damage suits, because in his opinion in a good many cases the damage was due to the negligence of the party himself. He also testified that he would vote for a verdict for plaintiff if the proof was strong enough, but that it would require "strong and positive testimony," "ample proof," and "good proof," in order to induce him so to do. Held, that he was disqualified on the ground of bias; plaintiff being entitled to recover on proof sufficient to establish a prima facie case.

2. Trial — Instructions — Misleading Expressions.

In an action for personal injuries, the use of the phrase "in a case like this" in one of the instructions was objectionable, as misleading the jury to suppose that reference was being made to the case at bar, rather than to the class of cases to which that of plaintiff belonged.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by W. L. G. Fitts against the Southern Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Wm. J. Herron, for appellant. P. F. Dunne, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff was injured in a collision with one of the trains of defendant while driving across the railroad tracks on Treat avenue, in the city of San Francisco, and brought this action to recover damages. The verdict was for defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

Several grounds are urged for a reversal, only one of which is of sufficient importance to merit particular consideration. It is insisted that the court erred in disallowing the challenge of plaintiff to a juror— C. G. Young —interposed on the ground (subdivision 7, § 602, Code Civ. Proc.) that his examination disclosed the existence of a state of mind evidencing bias against the plaintiff. The testimony of the juror given upon his voir dire showed that, while then employed as a hardware manufacturing agent, he had in former years been a purchasing agent for a railroad company in Arizona—the Arizona & Southwest Railroad Company—and as such had then some dealings with defendant; that he had probably read of the facts of the case in the papers, but had no present recollection of them; that he was acquainted with some of the officials of the defendant corporation, just a casual acquaintance. His examination from this point then proceeded: "Q. Would your acquaintance have any influence with you as a juror in this case? A. I think not, if the proof was strong enough. Q. When you say, 'If the proof was strong enough,' what do you mean by that? A. I mean that there are a good many of these accidents probably caused by the negligence of the parties injured. Q. Would you go into the jury box with a bias in favor of the defendant in a case of this kind? A. Without any testimony, yes, sir. Q. And it would take testimony to remove that feeling? A. I would not render a verdict without strong and positive testimony. Q. Would you not go into the jury box here with that feeling in favor of the defendant? A. Without proof; yes, sir. Q. And you have that feeling now? A. I have had it for many years." Here counsel for the plaintiff interposed his challenge. On examination by the attorney for the defendant the juror continued: "Q. If there was no evidence introduced in this case at all, you would give a verdict for defendant? A. Yes, sir. Q. The plaintiff has to prove his case? A. Yes, sir. Q. You say you have some views upon the question of damage suits? You think that in a good many cases the damage is due to the negligence of the party himself? A. I have no doubt of it. Q. That is a general impression or deduction which you have from your experience? A. Yes, sir." The attorney for the plaintiff here renewed his challenge on account of a feeling of bias and prejudice on the part of the juror, whereupon the court inquired: "Does he say he has a bias? Attorney for Plaintiff: A bias in favor of the defendant. The Juror: No, sir. I believe a great many cases of that kind are through the negligence of the parties injured. Q. Are you in that frame of mind that you would be willing to change places here with the plaintiff and be willing to accept him upon a jury in a case in which you yourself were the plaintiff, provided he was in the same frame of mind as yourself? A. I don't know whether I want to answer that question or not. Q. That is what I want to know. We are entitled to have a fair and impartial jury, and if you should in any way feel that you could not sit upon this case impartially, we want to know it. You are in that frame of mind that the plaintiff would have to make out an exceedingly strong case? A. Yes, sir; the proof would have to be ample. Q. Would you be willing, if he was in the same frame of mind you are, to have him try your case? A. Possibly not. Q. Why not? A. From my remarks you can judge, probably. Q. Have you ever expressed yourself as prejudiced against this class of cases? A. Yes, sir; I think I have. As I remarked to you before, that is all the prejudice I have. Railroad accidents, I believe, a great many of them, are through their own carelessness. Q. You say you cannot answer that question as to whether you would be willing to change places with the plaintiff and have him try a case of yours, provided he was in the same frame of mind that you are? A. In answer to that I will say that I would be perfectly honest in the case, and if the proof was ample he would get my vote for a verdict. But I should require good proof. Q. What do you mean by good proof? A. Proof that satisfied me that he ought to have a verdict. Q. You say that you have expressed a bias or prejudice against this class of cases? A. I have spoken about them a great many times. Q. And you entertain that opinion still? A. I do."

We have produced the entire examination of the juror, because it is not very lengthy, and upon a fair consideration of it we are of the opinion that the challenge interposed should have been allowed. While the law does not guaranty to a litigant on the trial of the cause any particular kind of juror, it does guaranty to him a jury composed of persons who are wholly impartial as far as the particular merits of the suit they are required to try is concerned, and the juror Young was clearly not of the class so guarantied. It is true that a general abstract bias which a juror may entertain to a class of litigation will not of itself disqualify him from trying a cause, when it appears that, notwithstanding he entertains that feeling, he can set it aside, and can and will fairly and impartially decide the particular case solely upon the evidence and the instructions of the court. Baker v. Borello, 136 Cal. 166, 68 Pac. 591; Graybill v. De Young, 146 Cal. 422, 80 Pac. 618. This, however, is not the situation disclosed here. The prejudice the juror held against the class of actions in which that of the defendant fell was a fixed and abiding one. He entertained it as the result of personal observation and experience, had so entertained it for years, frequently expressed it, and still adhered to it. While the juror did not in express terms declare that, by reason of his general feeling of prejudice, his judgment in the particular case would be colored, still we think it is apparent, from the consideration of his entire examination that, in weighing the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, his judgment would be prejudicially affected against him by reason of his bias against the class of actions to which his belonged. In effect this is what his testimony shows would be his mental attitude towards plaintiff's cause. He declared that he would go into the jury box with a feeling of prejudice in favor of the defendant; that in the case at bar that prejudice would operate in favor of defendant, and it would take strong and positive testimony to remove it. In the face of these declarations, it would seem to be idle to claim that the juror was a fair and impartial one. No juror can be said to be so who enters upon the trial of a cause prejudiced against a class of actions to the extent that a litigant is required in a particular case falling within the class to overcome his prejudice by strong and positive evidence, or any other kind of evidence. The constitutional right to a trial of a case before an unbiased and unprejudiced jury is not afforded a party, when, over his protest, a juror is retained whose prejudice requires such litigant to support his cause, not simply by a preponderance of evidence, but by evidence which must preponderate to an extent so as to overcome the antecedent prejudice with which the juror enters upon the trial of the cause.

Aside from this, when asked if he would be willing to have a case in which he was plaintiff tried by a juror in the same frame of mind as himself, he was uncertain as to whether he wanted to answer the question or not, that "possibly not," and when asked why, told counsel for plaintiff that he could probably judge from his remarks why not. Of course, the only judgment which could be satisfactorily arrived at from his remarks was that he would not want his case tried by a juror entertaining the same prejudice with which he previously declared he would go into the jury box to try the cause of plaintiff. As we have said, it has been held that a juror is not disqualified by reason of general bias entertained against a class of actions, when it appears from his testimony that he can lay aside that prejudice, and uninfluenced by it, try the cause at issue solely upon the evidence and the instructions of the court as to the law. In the case at bar Mr. Young stated on his examination that he would be perfectly honest in the case, and if the proof were ample would vote for a verdict; and it is insisted this was the equivalent of stating that he would try the cause fairly upon the evidence and under the law as declared by the court. Whether this was the meaning he intended to convey is simply matter of conjecture. He nowhere definitely declared any such intention. That the juror was honest and candid in all his answers is beyond question, and that he honestly entertained a prejudice to the extent, and in the manner, that he declared it would influence him in considering the case of plaintiff, is also beyond question. No doubt such a juror would, to the best of his ability, try the cause upon the evidence and instructions of the court. In fact, there would be nothing else upon which he could try it. But he would still try it under the influence of the prejudice he honestly entertained, and which he nowhere announced either his ability or intention to divest himself of.

It is to be observed, too, that in stating that he would be perfectly honest in the case he at the same time declared that he meant thereby that if the proof was ample he would vote for a verdict. Several times during his examination he referred to the degree of proof which he would require before he would return a verdict for plaintiff. He would require "strong and positive testimony," "ample proof," "good proof." These answers as to the amount of proof he would require, considered in connection with the questions to which they were responsive, and in view of the prejudice he entertained, clearly showed that he would require, in the class of actions to which plaintiff belonged, stronger proof than he would consider necessary were the action of another character. While generally no exception could be taken to the answer of the juror that he would require ample proof, yet what this particular juror meant by ample proof is apparent from his answer to the interrogatory: "You are in that frame of mind that the plaintiff would have to make an exceedingly strong case? A. Yes, sir; the proof would have to be ample." While his answer to this particular question of itself clearly indicated what the juror considered would be the ample proof under which he would return a verdict—that it would have to be proof making out an exceedingly strong case—it is, as we say, quite apparent, from all the rest of his examination on this subject, that he would, on account of his prejudice, require stronger proof in the case he was about to try than if it were an action of another kind. This requirement on his part of stronger proof was, of course, perfectly consonant with his declared prejudice against such actions; but the law recognizes no such requirement, and a juror who demands it cannot be classed as a fair and impartial juror. Aside from the fact that a plaintiff may recover upon a prima facie case made, yet, taking for the purpose of illustration the ordinary action for damages where the evidence is conflicting, it goes without saying that if jurors could be deemed fair and impartial who entertain the prejudice and thereby require the degree of proof that the juror Young required, verdicts for plaintiff would be extremely rare. The mental attitude of this juror, we think, was so apparently affected by bias against actions brought to recover from railroad companies for personal injuries as to influence his judgment prejudicially in the consideration of the cause of plaintiff, and for that reason the challenge to him should have been allowed, and it was error not to have granted it.

The other grounds urged for reversal, consisting of alleged erroneous rulings of the court as to the admissibility of evidence, are without force.

Complaint is made as to two of the instructions given. They announce correct principles of law, but in view of a new trial we are inclined to think that the use of the expression, "in a case like this," found in one of them, is open to the criticism that the jury might imply from its use that reference was being made to the case at bar, rather than to the class of damage cases to which that of plaintiff belongs, as that term was doubtless intended to be used. This objection can, however, readily be obviated should the same instruction be again asked.

For the reasons indicated relative to the error of the court in disallowing the challenge to the juror Young, the order denying the motion of plaintiff for a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded, that a new trial may be had.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.

PEDERSEN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Cr. 1,356.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1906.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—APPEARANCE OF ATTORNEY PENDING APPEAL FROM CONVICTION.

Pending appeal by an admitted attorney from a conviction of a felony, without bail, but with a certificate of probable cause staying proceedings on the judgment, the trial court has inherent power to refuse to allow him to appear as attorney for another; he, under Pen. Code, §§ 1244, 1600, being required to be confined in the county jail pending his appeal.

In Bank. Application by H. N. Pedersen for writ of mandate to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and Hon. Frank H. Dunne, judge thereof. Petition denied.

George D. Collins, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner is charged by information in the superior court with a public offense, and by this petition he seeks a writ of mandate to compel that court to allow one George D. Collins to appear as attorney for the petitioner in said court and there to defend him against the said charge. Collins has been regularly admitted to practice as an attorney in all the courts of the state, and has never been disbarred or suspended; but he has been convicted of a felony in the said courts, and has been duly sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison therefor. He has taken an appeal from the judgment of conviction, and has secured from the judge of said court a certificate of probable cause, which stays proceedings on the judgment pending the appeal. Bail has not been allowed to Collins, and in the meantime he is in the custody of the county sheriff awaiting the prosecution and determination of the appeal. The petition avers that, notwithstanding these conditions, Collins can and will appear in the said superior court at all times when necessary to attend to the defense of the petitioner on said charge. This is, of course, a mere opinion of the petitioner, and not an allegation of fact. In truth, he cannot lawfully appear in said court for that purpose.

Section 1244 of the Penal Code provides that when a certificate of probable cause has been issued, the sheriff must, if the defendant be in his custody, upon being served with a copy thereof, keep the defendant in his custody without executing the judgment, and detain him to abide the judgment on appeal. Section 1600 of the Penal Code is as follows: "A prisoner committed to the county jail for trial or for examination, or upon conviction for a public offense, must be actually confined in the county jail until he is legally discharged; and if he is permitted to go at large out of the jail, except by virtue of a legal order or process, it is an escape." In the sense in which the words are used in these sections, Collins is at present in custody either "upon conviction" or awaiting trial; that is to say, the trial of his appeal, and, if the judgment of conviction is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, then for the subsequent trial of the charge. He is therefore to be confined in the county jail, and the sheriff can have no authority, of his own motion, to permit him to appear in court or elsewhere, or to allow him to go outside of the jail for any purpose. If the sheriff does voluntarily permit him to go outside, either with or without an escort, the sheriff himself is guilty of permitting an escape. There is no express authority for the superior court to enlarge him without bail, except for the purpose of allowing him to appear in court to make his defense to the charge pending against him, and possibly to appear for the prosecution of his appeal. The superior court has inherent power, under such circumstances, to refuse to allow an admitted attorney to appear on behalf of another person charged with crime, or to appear as an attorney for any purpose that would involve a subsequent appearance in the same matter for the regular and orderly disposition of the case.

The petition is denied.

1. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—POSSESSION.

For one to inclose land by fences and a natural barrier is a sufficient appropriation of it to his notorious use and control as to constitute actual possession, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1172, providing that on a trial for forcible entry it shall be enough for plaintiff to show, in addition to the forcible entry, that he was peaceably in the actual possession at the time of such entry.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forcible Entry and Detainer, §§ 37–47.]

2. SAME—FORCIBLE ENTRY.

For one to enter on land in the actual peaceable possession of another, with a number of men acting under his direction and control, with such a display of force and accompanied by such acts as are calculated to intimidate the occupant from resisting this intrusion and maintaining his possession, is sufficient to constitute a forcible entry, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1159, declaring one guilty of a forcible entry who by violence or circumstances of terror enters real property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forcible Entry and Detainer, §§ 5–16.]

3. SAME—RETAINING POSSESSION.

If retention of possession by defendant of land which he forcibly entered is necessary to authorize an action for forcible entry, it is enough that his destruction of the fence about it put an end to plaintiff's exclusive control and dominion over it, and threw it into defendant's larger tract, about which was a fence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Frank S. Knowles against the Crocker Estate Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Morrison & Cope and W. I. Brobeck (Geo. C. Ross, of counsel), for appellants. Edwd. F. Fitzpatrick and B. B. Newman, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was for forcible entry. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for a restitution of the land described in the complaint, and for treble the amount of damages awarded by the jury, and from such judgment and an order denying the motion of defendants for a new trial, this appeal has been taken.

The evidence shows that the land described in the complaint is a portion of a larger tract of about 33 acres in extent in San Mateo county, with a fence on the outside and with cross-fences thereon, which at the dates hereafter mentioned was in the occupancy of one Daly as tenant of the defendant Crocker Estate Company. The defendant Leigh was the agent of said company. In August, 1896, plaintiff brought an action against the Crocker Estate Company to quiet title to about 7 acres of such tract, and the next month entered upon such larger tract, while it was in the occupancy of Daly, and built a fence along the eastern line of the tract described in the complaint and along its southerly line to a point where there was already standing a fence which extended in a northerly direction along all but a small portion of said west line, where there was a bluff. This bluff and these fences—the ones on the south, west, and east—formed an inclosure containing the land described in the action to quiet title and in the complaint in this action, and upon which it was claimed the forcible entry by the defendants was made. The east and south lines of fencing built by plaintiff amounted to about 1,850 feet in length, occupied some 20 or 25 days' work in building them, and no one interfered with plaintiff while he was having them constructed. The tract inclosed, except the extreme northern portion thereof, where there was an old quarry of about an acre in extent, was fertile soil, capable of being used, as it had been many years before, for agricultural purposes. Immediately after building the fences, plaintiff, who lived about a quarter of a mile from the tract, commenced gathering and hauling away the loose rocks scattered about the land, which it was necessary to do in order to thoroughly prepare it for cultivation or for farming purposes. For that purpose he went upon the land every few days, and was so employed up to November 16, 1896. The rock taken off was used by him in filling a ditch near where he lived, but which had no connection with the land inclosed by him, and in repairing the road running down to the property. After the construction of the fences above referred to, Daly had no further occupancy or possession of the property described in the complaint in this action, and did not enter thereon except by permission of the plaintiff to drive his cattle through gates left in the fences constructed by plaintiff so as to reach property of the Crocker Estate Company rented by him and located beyond the tract claimed by plaintiff. About two months after the fences were built by the plaintiff, the defendant Leigh, acting on behalf of the Crocker Estate Company, having been informed of their erection, employed a carpenter named Murray, and directed him to go to the tract and tear down the fences erected by plaintiff, and on the morning of November 16, 1906, Murray left San Francisco for that purpose. Murray had engaged 7 men to assist him, and they, together with the defendant Leigh, met him on that day at a place appointed near the tract. They entered it from the northern end thereof, driving in with a light wagon with a single horse, without, as Murray, the driver, says, being under the necessity of opening any gate or breaking any fence (counsel for appellants state in their brief on this hearing that they entered through an open gate) or meeting with any obstruction or opposition. They carried with them pickaxes, shovels, crowbars, and hatchets, reached the ground about noon, distributed themselves along the fences constructed by plaintiff, and immediately, commenced with these appliances pulling them up and knocking them apart, the materials of which they were composed being thrown into the highway. In the forenoon of that day the plaintiff and his brother had been engaged in hauling some rock from the land, and at the time Murray and his men, with the defendant Leigh, arrived they had gone home to dinner. While the fences were being demolished, the father of plaintiff, passing the premises on his way to town and hearing the noise, went over to where the men were at work, and asked Leigh by what authority he was destroying them. Leigh answered that he was advised by the attorneys for the Crocker Estate Company to do so; to tear the fences down and take possession. The plaintiff and his brother returned about 1 o'clock, and at that time the whole fence built by plaintiff on the eastern and southern lines, except a small portion on the southern line, had been removed. They were then engaged in tearing down this latter portion. Plaintiff also demanded of Leigh by what authority he was doing it, and was also informed that he was doing it at the instance of the Crocker Estate Company. An Italian, who was passing by when the fence was being thrown into the highway, and who had asked permission of Leigh to take away the lumber, and had been granted it, was proceeding to carry it away when plaintiff came up. Plaintiff told the Italian not to take the lumber, when Leigh addressed the man, saying: "You take that lumber away. If you don't I will have it burned." Plaintiff told Leigh he wanted it to replace the fence, to which Leigh responded: "If you build the fence there, I will tear down all the fences you put up." Plaintiff remonstrated against the destruction of the fence, but no attention was paid to him, and the work of demolition continued until all the fence was destroyed. The plaintiff testified that Leigh's manner at that time was very impressive, and that when he told him he would tear down any fence that plaintiff might erect he was very firm in doing so, and the latter took him as though he meant what he said. When leaving, after the fence was destroyed, Leigh stated to plaintiff that if he built the fence again he would probably be instructed to come out and again tear it down. There was no quarrel between the plaintiff and Leigh. Neither Leigh nor the men made any hostile demonstration towards plaintiff, and the latter invited none. The interview between Leigh and himself was gentlemanly and courteous. No attempt was made by plaintiff by force to prevent the destruction of the fences. He protested against their being taken down; that is, such portion of the south fence as was left when he arrived. Leigh ignored the protest, and the destruction of the remainder of the fence by his men went on, with an express declaration on Leigh's part of his intention to destroy any of the fence which might be built. Plaintiff testified that he did not rebuild the fences because he thought it was useless to do so; that Leigh would have torn them down as fast as he rebuilt them; that his attorney told him not to rebuild them because of Leigh's threat to tear them down, and that upon the advice of his attorney he did not rebuild them; that as he had no fence to inclose the land there was no use in going on any further with his preparations of the land for farming purposes. The conversation between Leigh and the plaintiff appears to have been without the hearing of Murray and the other men, and took place at some distance from where they were at work, during which time Murray and they were engaged in removing the remainder of the fence, and upon its accomplishment Leigh and they left the scene.

The sections of the Code of Civil Procedure under which this action is maintained provide: Section 1159. "Every person is guilty of a forcible entry who either: 1. By breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, or by any kind of violence or circumstance of terror, enters into any real property. * * *" Section 1172. "On the trial of any proceeding for any forcible entry the plaintiff shall only be required to show in addition to the forcible entry complained of, that he was peaceably in the actual possession at the time of the forcible entry. * * *"

In order to entitle plaintiff to recover it was essential that the evidence should show that when the alleged entry was made he was in the peaceable and actual possession of the land described in the complaint, and that the entry complained of was made by defendants accompanied by violence or circumstances of terror. It is insisted by defendants that the evidence does not show the existence of either of these conditions, which are essential to a recovery. As far, however, as the peaceable and actual possession of the plaintiff on November 16, 1900, is concerned, we think that the evidence, considered as the law requires it to be on this appeal, in a way most favorable to support the verdict, sufficiently establishes that it was. The evidence shows that the fences built by plaintiff with the fences then existing, and the natural barrier on the north made a substantial enclosure which placed the premises described in the complaint in the exclusive possession of plaintiff. Thereafter he alone exercised acts of ownership and dominion over the tract so enclosed to the exclusion of both the Crocker Estate Company and its tenant Daly. This was sufficient to constitute actual possession within the terms of the statute. It was not indispensable to actual possession that the plaintiff should have resided on the premises, or that he should have cultivated or improved them. Actual occupancy or cultivation or improvement is not requisite. An inclosure of land by fences or substantial barriers, or a combination of both, constitute an actual possession of the premises without any other act being done indicating dominion. Such an inclosure is of itself a sufficient appropriation of the land to the visible and notorious use and control of the person making the inclosure, so as to constitute actual possession, and to protect such possession against the intrusion or interference of others. Our attention is not called to any case which holds that such an inclosure does not establish actual possession, while the authorities in this state (referring to such only as discuss the subject in its relations to actions of forcible entry) are uniformly to the effect that it does. Minturn v. Burr, 16 Cal. 110; Shelby v. Houston, 38 Cal. 410; Brumagim v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 24; Gray v. Collins, 42 Cal. 152; Goodrich v. Van Landigham, 46 Cal. 601. The possession of the plaintiff being thus actual within the contemplation of the statute, there can be no doubt from the evidence but that such possession was entirely peaceable until it was disturbed by the entry of the defendants on November 16, 1900.

Nor is there any force in the other claim of defendants that the evidence shows that the entry upon the premises was accompanied by no such violence or circumstances of terror and ouster of the plaintiff from the possession of the land inclosed by him as warranted the maintenance of, and the judgment for damages and restitution of the premises in this summary action of forcible entry; that at most the evidence shows but a simple trespass by defendants.

We are at a loss to perceive anything in the evidence upon which the idea that the conduct of defendants amounted to but a simple trespass can be predicated. The avowed purpose of the agent Leigh in entering upon the inclosure was to break down plaintiff's fences and take possession of the land which they inclosed. That is what he declared he was instructed to do, and which he did, and he entered directly upon the premises as inclosed by the plaintiff to do so. He entered at an hour when plaintiff was absent at dinner, with the strength of combined numbers and with implements as equally available for repelling any resistance as for destroying the fences. He came in force with sufficient men to work rapidly, and when plaintiff, coming on the scene after most of the fence had been removed, protested against further destruction, his protest was ignored, and in a way which plaintiff declares impressed him that Leigh meant what he said, the latter declaring that any fence which plaintiff might further erect he would also destroy. It is true that plaintiff made no physical effort to prevent the destruction of the fence. There was no personal collision, and no threats made save as above stated. But it was not necessary that the plaintiff should have resisted their destruction of his property to the extent that some act in breach of the peace should have been committed. He was not required to offer resistance to their actions in order to demonstrate by possible physical injuries inflicted upon him the forcible character of their entry upon the premises. It must have been obvious to plaintiff as a reasonable man that to have offered resistance against such a force as confronted him would have only precipitated a conflict which would have resulted in a breach of the peace, the very thing the forcible entry act was intended to prevent. The natural impulse of one who finds his property being invaded or destroyed is to endeavor to prevent it, and this he will naturally do unless awed by the manner of invasion or apprehension of violence in the attempt to prevent its destruction. In the case at bar the jury had a right to find from the evidence that the entry was made in such a manner and with such attendant circumstances—the display of a strong hand and determined purpose upon the part of Leigh and his men to destroy the fences and resist any attempt to prevent their doing so—as impressed the plaintiff with a fear of violence should he endeavor to assert his rights to prevent their action. When a person enters upon land in the actual peaceable possession of another, with a number of men acting under his direction and control with such a display of force and accompanied by such instant acts as are calculated to intimidate the occupant from resisting their intrusion and maintaining his possession, such conduct is sufficient to constitute a forcible entry within the purview of the statute.

There is little, if any, difference in the facts stated in the case of Ely v. Yore, 71 Cal. 130, 11 Pac. 868, and those in the case at bar. In that case, upon the subject which we are now considering, the court says: "The Code expression of an entry by 'violence or circumstances of terror' is the equivalent of the English statutory law expression of an entry 'with strong hand and a multitude of people.' To constitute such an entry under either law, it is not necessary that it should be accompanied with tumult or riot directed against the person of the party in possession. It will be sufficient if it is attended with such a display of force as manifests an intention to intimidate the party in possession or to deter him from defending his rights or to excite him to repel the invasion of his possession, and thus bring about a condition of things which the law was intended to prevent and punish, namely, acts tending to excite a breach of the peace. Where an entry is made with such a display of force, accompanied by destruction of property upon the land on which the entry is made, it is a forcible entry. * * * It is conceded that the plaintiff was in the actual or peaceable possession of the premises upon which the defendants at an unusual time and with a large number of men entered by tearing down the fence and removing its materials to another part of the land. Such acts were more than a trespass. Gray v. Collins, 42 Cal. 152; Brown v. Perry, 39 Cal. 23. The fact that the defendant did not personally remain in possession of the land upon which he entered with violence does not affect the character of his entry. He was legally adjudged guilty of a forcible entry." The case of Gray v. Collins, 42 Cal. 152, 156, presents also a similarity of facts with the case at bar and declares the same doctrine which was subsequently followed in the case from which we have just quoted.

These are the two leading cases in this state on the point to which we have cited them, and in both cases it is held that evidence such as is presented in the present case was sufficient to show a forcible entry. Other authorities in this state might be cited, but the law in its application to such a kindred state of facts as is presented here is so clearly stated in both the cases referred to as to make these citations unnecessary. In this same line of alleged insufficiency of the evidence to show that a forcible entry was made, it is claimed that it does not appear that the defendants took or remained in possession of the premises which were inclosed within plaintiff's fences, after such fences were destroyed. Without discussion whether such a showing under subdivision 1 of the section relied on by plaintiff was at all necessary, it is sufficient to say that the avowed intention of Leigh, as the evidence discloses, was that he went there to remove the fences and take possession of the inclosed land, and that he accomplished the latter when the fences were destroyed, and as necessarily incident to their destruction. The inclosed tract of 7 acres, before its segregation by plaintiff's fences, was part of the larger tract of 33 acres. The effect of destroying plaintiff's fences was to put an end to plaintiff's exclusive control and dominion over this 7-acre tract and to put it thereafter in possession of defendants as part of such 33-acre tract by reason of the fences which they had around this larger tract. The fact that plaintiff entered as he did upon the land after the fencing was destroyed and took away some stone which he had dug out for use on a road before the fences were destroyed, and that defendants did not oppose his doing so, did not show that the plaintiff was still in possession. It only tended to show that defendants did not consider this action on the part of plaintiff as interfering with their possession of the land as now part of the larger tract; and as the removal of the stone was no detriment to the land, but a positive benefit, they were not adverse to its removal.

These are the principal points urged upon this appeal as grounds for a reversal and concerning which we deem particular consideration necessary. Additional points are also presented, which, however, we do not think are of sufficient importance to merit any particular mention.

We perceive no error in the record which would warrant a reversal, and the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are therefore affirmed.

COOPER et al. v. BURCH et al.

MORTGAGES—SEPARATE ACTION ON NOTE.

In an action against one of the makers of a note, it appeared that it was secured by a mortgage executed by the same parties, and that without the knowledge of defendant plaintiff had released enough of the mortgaged property to satisfy the mortgage if the consideration recited in the releases had been paid, under an arrangement between the other makers and plaintiff, though the latter had not actually received the money. Held, that as the obligation of defendant was not to pay the amount of the note absolutely, but only the balance after the security was exhausted, and as the case was appropriate for the application of the rule that a separate action cannot be maintained on a note secured by mortgage, a judgment of nonsuit was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Suit by Rosana W. Cooper and others, as executors of one Wells, deceased, against John D. Burch and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Will D. Gould, for appellants. Geo. B. Patton, E. Edgar Galbreth, and D. Allen, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The suit was brought on the promissory note of the three defendants, set out in the complaint, purporting to have been executed by defendant Patton, by Boal, his attorney. Judgment was entered against the defendants Burch and Boal on default, and against the defendant Patton on his subsequent appearance and answer. A new trial was granted, and was affirmed by the Supreme Court on appeal (Cooper v. Burch, 140 Cal. 548, 74 Pac. 37), and on another trial the plaintiffs were nonsuited. Under the decision of the former appeal, the only questions now before us relate to the defendant Patton's "liability on the obligation upon which the judgment was recovered." Code Civ. Proc. § 992. This liability is denied by him on the ground, among others, that the power of attorney under which Boal acted did not authorize him to execute the note; and this, we think, was the case. But it is claimed by the appellants that Patton was notified of the making of the note a few days after its date, and that having failed to repudiate the same, or to make any objections thereto, the action of his agent is to be regarded as having been ratified by him, or at least, that he is estopped to deny the due execution of the note; and, for the purposes of the decision, it may be assumed that such is the case. But it appears from the answer of the defendant Patton and the evidence offered by the plaintiffs, that the note was secured by a mortgage of the same date, executed by the same parties, and that, without the concurrence or the knowledge of the defendant Patton, the plaintiffs from time to time executed satisfactions and releases of the mortgage as to lots as they were sold until the amounts acknowledged to have been received were sufficient to satisfy the note and mortgage. It, indeed, appears that under an arrangement with the defendants Burch and Boal, proposed by the plaintiff's testator, the money was not actually received by the latter; but there is no evidence in the record that the defendant Patton concurred in or knew anything about this arrangement. Upon these facts, the nonsuit was rightly granted. The obligation of the defendant Patton was not to pay the amount of the note absolutely, but the balance remaining after the mortgage security was exhausted, only. The case is therefore peculiarly appropriate for the application of the rule that a separate action cannot be maintained on a note secured by mortgage.

The judgment and order will be affirmed.

MORGAN v. SAN DIEGO COUNTY.

1. CORONERS — INQUEST — JURISDICTION TO HOLD.

Pen. Code, § 1510, provides that when a coroner is informed that a person has been killed or has committed suicide, or has suddenly died under such circumstances as to afford a reasonable ground to suspect that his death has been occasioned by the act of another by criminal means, he must hold an inquest. Held that, in order to justify an inquest under such section, the killing must have been sudden and unusual, and of such a nature as to indicate a possibility of death by the hand of the deceased or through the instrumentality of some other person.

2. SAME — INQUEST BY JUSTICE — EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION.

Where one inquest has been held on the body of a deceased person by a justice of the peace in accordance with the law, the coroner is not entitled to fees for the holding of a second inquest, in the absence of proof that the inquest held by the justice was unlawful.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Dr. A. Morgan against the county of San Diego. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty., and W. R. Andrews, Deputy Dist. Atty., for appellant. A. H. Sweet and Stearns & Sweet, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This action is brought by the coroner of the defendant county to recover compensation for his services in some 14 inquests, alleged to have been held by him. The findings and judgment were in plaintiff's favor, except as to one of said inquests; and the defendant appeals from said judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

It is objected by the respondent that the court has no jurisdiction of this appeal, because the amount in controversy is less than $300. The amount of the judgment is $597.17. The amount prayed for in the complaint is for the sum of $588.25, together with interest thereon, etc. It is conceded in appellant's brief that an amount is actually due plaintiff on his first cause of action of $121.25, and on his second cause of action of $127.50, and on his third cause of action of $62.25, making in all $311; and respondent contends that these concessions in the brief render the judgment, to the extent of said concessions, a consent judgment. This contention cannot be upheld. Nor do we think the concessions made in the brief of appellant have the effect to oust this court of jurisdiction of the appeal. If the superior court had jurisdiction of the case, this court has jurisdiction of the appeal. The jurisdiction of the superior court is to be determined by the prayer of the complaint; and it being for more than $300, and there being no admission in the answer that any portion of the amount claimed in the complaint is due, but, on the contrary, a denial that anything is due, there can be no question but that the superior court had jurisdiction of the cause; and it follows that this court has jurisdiction of the appeal. Nor do the admissions of appellant made upon the trial of the case, as we understand them, reduce the amount in issue to less than $300.

It was stipulated at the trial of the case between the respective parties, "that all the inquests referred to in the original complaint, and all those referred to in the supplemental complaint, were held in the manner and form required by law, provided the coroner had jurisdiction to hold the 14 inquests upon the bodies of the following persons [naming the 14 persons], and that the only dispute was the necessity and jurisdiction to hold these 14 inquests, and that as to all matters excepting the jurisdiction to hold said 14 inquests that the plaintiff have judgment by consent, and that all other questions were left out, and that plaintiff should have judgment by consent on the matters not disputed." As stated in plaintiff's testimony, and not contradicted, the facts surrounding the death of the deceased persons upon whom the several inquests were held are as follows:

(1) Sarah E. Dithelson: "I received word that she had died under very peculiar circumstances, was not supposed to be sick, not sick enough to have a doctor, and was found in the morning, hanging onto a dresser or chiffonier, dead. Her husband left her in the night about ten o'clock. She, not feeling quite as well as usual, had thought best to sleep near the stove; it being February. I was also informed that this woman had been very despondent. She was a second wife, and there had been a great deal of trouble with the children. They had lost some property, and the question was raised by the person informing me whether she had not committed suicide, so I held an inquest upon the body. * * * There was no physician in attendance, no death certificate given before the inquest, the case being referred to me immediately, and I relied upon the information that there was suspicions of suicide. A lady, whose name I have forgotten, told me before the inquest that she might have committed suicide. * * * I was informed there were suspicions of suicide, and I relied on the information."

(2) Maria Liara: "She was an infant in a Mexican family. The child was born in the morning without the attendance of any midwife or physician. Not even the neighbors were called in. It lived until late in the afternoon, and nothing was done to succor it at all, to sustain it, and the question was whether it was not a case of infanticide, allowed to die by neglect. The testimony showed on the inquest that the child was simply left in the room. Nothing was done. It was a case of neglect, but whether it was intentional I do not know. I learned in advance of the inquest that nothing had been done for the treatment of the child, and the question was whether the child was allowed to die purposely."

(3) A. R. Wadsworth: "He was a man in full vigor of health. I was called in that case as physician, and saw the remains but a few minutes after death. It occurred in the block above my house, and about noon time I arrived there, and another physician also arrived just after we. Wadsworth was a man in full vigor of health, who had just returned from down town with a brother-in law—a man named Morgan, but no relative of mine—and the brother-in-law made the remark, calling him by his first name, and said: 'We just walked up town, and I do not know of anything that could have killed him unless he had been poisoned." That is the expression he used. The brother-in-law said this to me, with whom he had just walked up from town. He died a few minutes after his return. He simply seated himself in a chair and expired. He was in the chair when I reached the place. There was nothing externally to lead to the cause of death."

(4) William Le Grande Cannon: "He was a man 30 years of age, known to be a consumptive; been under the care of different physicians in this country and Europe, and was stopping at the Florence Hotel. He died on Sunday, and was taken with the hemorrhage in the morning. He was at that time under the care of a Christian Scientist, and Dr. Remondino was in the hotel at the time the hemorrhage took place. Some of the guests summoned Dr. Remondino. He learned that they did not require his services, as they believed in Christian Science, and after telling them that something ought to be done for the young man, the young lady treating him arrived and they went through their treatment, whatever it might have been, and, as I was told afterwards, they gave him to understand there was nothing serious about the matter. He was just as well as ever, and he sat up and chatted, and died about 10 o'clock Sunday night. His mother went to the undertaker to prepare the body and procure a certificate of death, and the health officer refused to grant one. And the president of the board of health had instructed that no death certificate should issue, unless it be signed by the Christian Scientist who had attended him, and she refused to sign such certificate, and the body was held there. I was met at the depot by Dr. Remondino, and Dr. Hearne and Dr. Remondino told me I must investigate this case, as it was a case of gross neglect."

(5) J. B. Getchel: "That inquest was held February 7th. Mr. Getchel was an elderly gentleman, having a daughter living in National City. He had been visiting her some little time. He had no acquaintances except his daughter and those he happened to have met over in National. He had not been sick at all; had left the house early in the morning after breakfast, and was out for a little walk, and going into a barber shop, did not say a word, except he nodded his head as he came in, and sat down in the barber chair and put his head back, and the barber went to put the apron over him and he gasped, and was dead. No one had been with him after he had left the house and before he went to the barber shop. He had been walking all alone. Some three hours had elapsed since leaving the house. I was informed he had been out alone some three hours, and then went to the shop. * * * Dr. Fly was called in, but he was dead when he arrived. I asked Dr. Fly if he knew any cause for the death, and he said, 'No.' He was not acquainted with him; never had seen him, knew nothing about him."

(6) Santiago Lopez: "This man was shot and killed at Picacho." It appears that a justice of the peace at Picacho held an inquest on the body of Lopez prior to the one held by the plaintiff in this case.

(7) Joseph H. Cowan: "Cowan was a man about 75 years old. He arrived with his wife to this city in the evening. He was an invalid; came here for his health and had some trouble, as I understood, with the heart. They secured rooms at the corner of Third and C that evening, and he was taken sick during the evening and died before morning. No one was called in to see the case and they told no one about it. The circumstances seemed to me to point to something a little wrong. It seemed as though a man who would travel as far as from Montana for his health, and then, when taken sick, no one was called in, there might be something suspicious about it, and so I held an inquest. That was all the information I had to hold the inquest."

(8) M. J. Russell: "I had a telegram from Constable Trotter, at Oceanside, calling me there. It stated: 'Come to Oceanside. Mrs. Russell found dead in bed. Trotter.' And I went and held an inquest. She died all alone in a house where she had been living, about 2½ miles out of the city. No neighbors were within a quarter or half a mile. I saw Dr. Nichols when I got to Oceanside, and he told me that she had died in some sort of convulsions, as her position after death showed it. * * * The convulsions would lead one to believe she had possibly taken some poison, or had been poisoned."

(9) Arthur Dye: "I received a telephone from Mr. Dye, who lives at Witch Creek, to come out there and hold an inquest on his boy, who had been drowned, and I got nothing more of the circumstances. A telephone message came to Johnson & Connell to send the coroner to Witch Creek to hold an inquest on the body of Arthur Dye, who had been drowned, and I went out and held the inquest on the body of the boy. Before holding the inquest, I was informed that the boy had gone in swimming in a little pool in Witch creek, with another brother and sister, and that the boy died and was drowned."

(10) Juan Delgado: "I was called down to the government corral one night, and found there a person dead. The soldier who was on sentry duty said he had passed him as he was walking up the sidewalk, and he noticed he staggered a little bit, and he turned around to look at him. He went a ways beyond him and fell down. He went up to him and found he was dead, and called. He went back in the guardhouse and called an assistant, and they took the body and brought it into the guardhouse, and got the county physician, although the man was dead. The county physician found the man dead, and he called me up and I went down there. It was 6 o'clock, on the edge of dark, in September. Nobody had seen the man or knew anything about his whereabouts, excepting what the soldier said. It was very hard to find out who the man was, or learn where he came from. Nothing to indicate where he had come from, or what he had been doing."

(11) John Augustus Dowd: "He was found dead in a closet, back of a saloon. I thought that was circumstance enough to investigate, and held an inquest upon it to see what caused the death. No one saw the man go there. The man who occupied the saloon heard some one come in the saloon. I have no information except that he was found dead. * * * I knew him myself. He had gone in the closet some 20 minutes before the body was discovered. His condition as to sobriety was that he was able to walk around and about, though that morning he had fallen down and hurt himself. The man was a drinker right along. He was drinking all the time, and there had been months that he was never sober. That morning he was sober, however."

(12) C. T. Sheppard: "This was an infant two months old. I got my information from Dr. Parker, who was called into the case and had attended the child at its birth, and had not been called in since. Dr. Parker stated that he was called in the morning to see the little one, and found her dead. Upon examining it, he said the symptoms were that the child died from suffocation. He did not feel like giving a death certificate, and referred the case to me, as coroner, and said it was a case for me to hold an inquest. Upon that information I held the inquest. I spoke to the father about the matter, who said that they put the child to bed. About 9 o'clock it cried and he had tucked it away; and then again later it woke up and cried, and he tucked it up in its little baby carriage it slept in, and when he got up in the morning the child was dead. The child had been suffocated by the clothing. The father explained to me he put the child to bed, but said, of course, he hadn't done it with any intent. The child was very troublesome. The child being suffocated to death, it was a case I always thought coroners had to investigate, when anything of that kind occurred."

(13) C. C. Boyle: "This man was 77 years old, and was found drowned in the tank at Coronado. I thought it was a suspicious case by his being drowned in a tank like that, where there were so many people in the tank. The swimming teacher was in the tank at the time, and I held an inquest upon the body. The only information I had before holding the inquest was that he went in swimming in the tank and was drowned. They brought him out of the water and put him on the side of the tank, and found him dead. They worked over him; there was a physician among the spectators, who said to me he thought the man had some other trouble. The autopsy showed that he was drowned. There seemed to be no one implicated in it. It was a case of accidental drowning."

It is provided by section 1510 of the Penal Code that, "when a coroner is informed that a person has been killed, or has committed suicide, or has suddenly died under such circumstances as to afford a reasonable ground to suspect that his death has been occasioned by the act of another by criminal means," he must hold an inquest. Upon the interpretation of the language of this section depend the questions submitted upon this appeal as to whether the coroner had jurisdiction to hold an inquest in the several cases referred to, and also as to whether it was necessary to hold inquests in the several cases. Of course, it is plain that the first thing the coroner is called upon to do, when a death is called to his attention, is to determine whether or not it is a case coming within the section quoted. In deciding this question some latitude should, of course, be allowed the coroner. It should not be held that, simply because at the conclusion of an inquest it has been determined that the deceased died a natural death, he had no right therefore to hold an inquest. Under the terms of the section referred to, he has a right to act upon information. When he is informed that a person has been killed, or has committed suicide, he is warranted in holding an inquest. In this connection, what does the word "killed" mean? Certainly, if a man falls off a house and is killed by striking the pavement, it is not improper to speak of him as having been killed by the fall. If he is drowned, in speaking of his death it is perfectly proper to say that he was killed by drowning. If an infant dies of neglect, the neglect is what kills the infant. We might even say that consumption killed one of the deceased persons mentioned herein. In its broadest sense, a person may be killed by anything that causes his death. We do not think, however, that the term "killed" as as used in the statute embraces every means of death, but that it is qualified by the other clauses used in the statute, and that the whole section should be construed together. We think the killing should be shown to have been sudden and unusual, and of such a nature as to indicate a possibility of death by the hand of the deceased, or through the instrumentality of some other person. Construed in this way and measured by this rule, we find it difficult to select any one of the foregoing 13 cases and say of it that it appears to us beyond controversy that there was no ground "to suspect" that the death, or the killing, was sudden and unusual, and the taking off of the party occasioned either by the act of another, by criminal means, or by the intentional act of the deceased himself. We think, therefore, that, for the purpose of determining whether the coroner shall have his fees for the services performed, we would not be warranted in deciding in any of the 13 cases that there was no reasonable ground for holding an inquest, or that the coroner went beyond his jurisdiction in so doing.

As to the case of Santiago Lopez, it appears that an inquest had already been held upon the body of Lopez by a justice of the peace, and, in the absence of anything to show otherwise, we will presume that that officer proceeded according to his duty in the premises. To be sure, he is a judicial officer of an inferior court, and ordinarily no presumptions are to be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of the court over which he usually presides; but in this case he was acting in his special capacity to hold inquests, and this is not a direct proceeding to review his action, but is in the nature of a collateral attack upon his action, and, under a section of our Code, official duty is presumed to have been regularly performed. We hold that one inquest, duly and lawfully held in accordance with the law upon one body, is sufficient, and he who undertakes to hold a second inquest has the burden to show that the first inquest, for some reason, was not lawful; and unless he does that he should not be permitted to receive any fees for his services. We wish also to say that the circumstances detailed in the evidence were of such a nature that the justice of the peace had a right—indeed, it was his duty—to exercise his jurisdiction in the matter of holding this inquest.

The order denying a new trial is therefore affirmed, and the court below is directed to modify its judgment by reducing it in the amount of the fees claimed in the matter of Santiago Lopez.

We concur: ALLEN, J.; SMITH, J.

1. Judgments—Res Judicata.

Where it had been previously determined by the Supreme Court, in a suit in which all the defendants were parties, that the property in controversy vested in S. on the death of her husband, who had declared a homestead in the premises in his lifetime, and that the other defendants, who were their children, had no rights therein, such judgment was conclusive of the rights of the children in a subsequent suit to foreclose a trust deed executed by S.

2. Mortgages — Trust Deed — Deed by Trustees—Effect.

Where the title to the premises in question was vested in S. at the time she executed a trust deed thereof, the deed executed by the trustees, according to the terms of the trust, vested the title in the purchaser.

3. Same—Fraud.

Where, prior to the death of a husband, he had declared a homestead on the premises in question, so that on his death they passed absolutely to his widow, fraud or deceit, if any, practiced by the widow on her children, who joined her in the execution of a trust deed on the property, was immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; F. H. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Stockton Savings & Loan Society against Lavinia Saddlemire and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. F. Ramage and C. H. Fairall, for appellants. Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. The defendant Lavinia Saddlemire is the mother of the other defendants, who were parties to an action, wherein it was pointedly and distinctly held that they had no interest whatever in the property here in controversy. Saddlemire v. Stockton S. & L. Soc., 144 Cal. 652, 79 Pac. 381. It was there decided that the property vested absolutely in their mother upon the death of their father, who had declared a homestead on the premises in his lifetime. The facts upon which the decision in the case at bar depends are identical with the facts in the case cited, and hence it would be useless repetition to rehearse them here.

As the title to the premises was vested in defendant Lavinia Saddlemire when she executed the trust deed, it follows as a matter of law from the unquestioned facts that the deed executed by the trustees, according to the terms of the trust, vested the title in respondent.

We cannot see how fraud or deceit practiced upon the children, who joined their mother in the execution of such trust deed, or any misapprehension of law or fact by them could impair the title thus acquired. The law conserves rights by relieving parties from the result of fraud, deceit or mistake, but it does not dally with the complaints of those who were deprived of no right, and hence could not have been harmed by fraudulent practices, nor injured by any acts resulting from their own guilelessness. It results that the special defense pleaded by the children could not avail to defeat the effect of the deed executed and delivered by their mother.

There was no error in admitting the declaration of homestead. The foundation therefor was laid by proving every fact essential to the existence of the right evidenced by such declaration, which was duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded. Civ. Code, §§ 1262–1264.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

3 Cal. App. 480

FOLSOM v. CONKLIN.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 7, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POLICE OFFICERS—NEGLECT OF DUTY—REMOVAL.

Pen. Code, § 772, provides that when a written verified accusation is presented to the superior court, alleging that any officer within the court's jurisdiction has been guilty of charging and collecting illegal fees within his office, or has refused or neglected to perform his official duties, the court must cite the party charged to appear, and must proceed to hear the accusation in a summary manner. Deering's Ann. Codes & St. 1886, Appendix, p. 830, § 852 confers on municipal boards of trustees power to appoint in their discretion such police and subordinate officers as in their judgment shall be deemed necessary. Section 880 (page 836) declares that the department of police shall be under the direction and control of a marshal. Held, that where a marshal, duly appointed under such section, obstructed and prevented a police officer from performing his duty, prevented him from having access to the jail, and collected license fees for which he failed to account to the city clerk, as required by city ordinance, he was guilty of misconduct in office, within section 772, justifying removal.

2. SAME—DEFENSES.

Where a city marshal omitted to make monthly reports of license fees collected and monthly affidavits required by law, he could not excuse himself on the ground that he did not know he was required to file such reports, and that it had not been the custom of marshals prior to his time to file reports and receipts for license fees.

3. SAME — MARSHALS — PUBLIC FUNDS—DUTY TO ACCOUNT.

Where a city marshal received money for licenses in his official capacity, it was his duty to report the same and account for the money received to the city, though it was received prior to the delivery of licenses by the city clerk to the marshal, as required by city ordinances.

4. OFFICERS—REMOVAL—PROCEEDINGS — TIME —WAIVER.

Pen. Code, § 772, provides for the removal of public officers, and declares that on the filing of the petition the court must cite the party charged to appear at a time not more than 10 nor less than 5 days from the time the accusation is presented, and on that day, or a subsequent day not more than 20 days after the accused was to appear, must proceed to hear the accusation in a summary manner. Held, that the limitation of time within which the proceedings should be heard was merely intended to guaranty to accused a speedy hearing, and hence, where he appeared on the day set for trial and proceeded to trial without objection on account of delay, he could not thereafter object that the court lost jurisdiction to try the cause by reason of delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Leslie W. Folsom against J. J. Conklin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis, Kemp & Post, for appellant. John E. Daly, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. This was an action under section 772 of the Penal Code for the removal of a public officer. Findings and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial.

The accusation filed by plaintiff against defendant alleged, among other things, the defendant's election and qualification as marshal of the city of Long Beach; the appointment of plaintiff by the board of trustees as a police officer; the refusal of the defendant to recognize such appointment, and his neglect and refusal to exercise any control over such officer; that defendant obstructed such officer in the discharge of his duties; further, that defendant has willfully refused and neglected at all times to file with the treasurer of the city an affidavit showing that the moneys paid by him to said treasurer were all of the funds he had collected, or received, during the months preceding the payment to said treasurer, or to report delinquent lists of licenses uncollected. The complainant avers, and it is not denied, that an ordinance of said city, No. 109, was in force, providing for the licensing of certain kinds of business transacted and carried on in said town of Long Beach. The answer denied all of the allegations of the accusation, other than the existence of the ordinance above stated, and defendant's delinquency in relation to the filing with the treasurer an affidavit and report, as in the complaint alleged. Upon the trial, the court found that ordinance No. 109 provides that licenses shall be issued, signed by the city clerk and president of the board of trustees; that after the same are issued the city clerk shall deliver such licenses to the marshal and the marshal deliver his receipt to the clerk; that the marshal, upon collecting such licenses, shall deliver to the city treasurer all sums collected by him therefor, and take the treasurer's receipt for all moneys turned over to him; and thereupon said marshal was to deliver such treasurer's receipts for said sums to the city clerk. And the court finds that he did not file with the city clerk treasurer's receipts for money which he claims to have paid the city treasurer on account of licenses collected by him. The court further finds that he did collect various sums as and for licenses without having the license then in his possession, or delivering the same, or accounting to the city in any way therefor, but gave his individual receipt for such sums, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use; that he has issued numerous receipts for licenses to various persons, and has not accounted to the treasurer or the city clerk for the moneys collected upon the same. While there is nothing in the record showing the provisions of the ordinance before mentioned, as found by the court, yet there is no specification of error on account of such finding, and it will be assumed that the court finding the contents of the ordinance had the same before it upon the trial.

Appellant's contention is that the accusation does not state a cause of action against the defendant under section 772 of the Penal Code. This section provides: "When an accusation in writing, verified by the oath of any person, is presented to a superior court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of the court has been guilty of charging and collecting illegal fees for services rendered, or to be rendered, in his office, or has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office, the court must cite the party charged to appear before the court at a time not more than ten nor less than five days from the time the accusation was presented, and on that day, or some other subsequent day not more than twenty days from that on which the accusation was presented, must proceed to hear, in a summary manner, the accusation," etc. With this contention we do not agree. The municipal corporations act, by section 852 (Deering's Ann. Codes & St. 1886, Appendix, p. 830), confers upon the board of trustees the power to appoint, in their discretion, such police and subordinate officers as in their judgment may be deemed necessary. Section 880 (page 836) provides that the department of police shall be under the direction and control of the marshal. It was the duty, therefore, of the marshal to direct and control in a proper manner the official acts of this police officer. The court finds, and there is ample testimony in support, that, on the contrary, he obstructed and prevented the officer from discharging his duty, and prevented him from having access to the jail; thus neglecting and omitting to perform a plain duty devolving upon him by law. The record discloses that, without obtaining from the city clerk the licenses as by the ordinance provided, the defendant on several occasions collected from parties engaged in business in said city the amount of such license fees, giving his individual receipt therefor, keeping and appropriating the money to his own use, and making no return of any kind thereof to the proper officials. Defendant concedes that he omitted entirely the duty devolving upon him of making monthly reports, or filing the monthly affidavits required by law, excusing himself upon the ground that he did not know it was required of a marshal to file such reports, and that it has not been the custom of marshals in office prior to his time to file such reports and receipts. This ignorance of the law is no justification, and the finding of the court establishes that it was result, not of ignorance, but of improper motives in concealing from the officials money received by him in an official capacity. It mattered not whether the licenses were in his possession to deliver or not, if he received funds in his official capacity as marshal as and for licenses they thereupon became the property and funds of the city, and it was his duty to report the same whether the licenses had been delivered or not. Appellant insists that, notwithstanding these facts, the act of defendant was misconduct in office, punishable under the Penal Code, and is not cognizable in proceedings of this character under section 772, and cites as an authority Siebe v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 552, 46 Pac. 456. The Siebe Case may be readily distinguished from this. In that case, Siebe undertook the performance of a duty, but neglected and failed to perform it in a proper way, and the court holds that it was not a refusal or neglect to perform his duty. In this case there was no attempt at performance, but an entire omission and neglect to do those acts which by law devolved upon him in his official capacity; and whether the act amounted to misconduct or not, it nevertheless was an omission and neglect under the purview of section 772.

It is further insisted that because the accusation in this case was filed June 16th and the case was not tried until the 17th day of July, the court was without jurisdiction to hear and determine the action. There was no demand upon the part of defendant to dismiss the proceedings. The court obtained jurisdiction of the person and of the subject-matter when the citation was served. The limitation of time mentioned in the section, within which the proceeding shall be heard, is obviously intended to guaranty to the accused a speedy hearing, not unlike the right to a dismissal on account of delay given by section 1382 of the Penal Code. This right, like any other statutory right, may be waived by competent parties. People v. Hawkins, 127 Cal. 374, 59 Pac. 697. The defendant appeared on the day set for trial, whether the same was so set by agreement or otherwise, and proceeding to trial without objection on account of delay, will not be heard upon this appeal to raise for the first time an objection to the jurisdiction of the court for the reason mentioned.

It is unnecessary to consider or notice the many other specifications of error and exceptions taken at the trial, inasmuch as the judgment is amply supported by the admissions and other findings not involved in the specifications. Nor do we perceive any error in the record warranting a reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WHITTIER v. GORMLEY.

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACT—DEFINITIONS.

A contract reciting the receipt of $100 paid to bind the bargain and sale of a certain lot, said $100 to be considered and accepted as part purchase price of said lot, which is $5,500, less commission, signed by the party to be charged with the conveyance of the property, and accepted by the other, is sufficiently definite for specific performance; the amount of commissions being susceptible of ascertainment, and its certainty in amount not being disputed, and, under Civ. Code, § 1657, the money being payable on delivery of the deed.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—TITLE—INCUMBRANCE.

A vendor impliedly agrees to furnish a good title, which is not done where part of the land, however small, has been sold for taxes, and there is an unsatisfied mortgage on it, though it is probably barred; it requiring litigation to remove it.

3. SAME—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY—REMOVAL OF INCUMBRANCE—DEDUCTION.

The court, in an action by a purchaser for specific performance of a contract of sale, may give plaintiff credit on the purchase money for a reasonable sum expended by him to remove incumbrances, which the vendor refused to remove.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Henry F. Whittier against Thomas Gormley. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, for appellant. W. C. Batcheller, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for specific performance. Findings and judgment for plaintiff. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

The case as presented by the record is this: Defendant, the owner of a lot in the city of Los Angeles, agreed to sell the same to plaintiff for the sum of $5,500, and as evidence of such agreement executed the following instrument: "Los Angeles, Cal., Mch. 26th, 1902. Received of Henry F. Whittier the sum of $100.00, one hundred & 00–100 dollars, being paid to grantor to bind bargain, and sale of lot 17, block 85, Feldhauser sub. of block 85 & 86, Ord's survey of Los Angeles, California, said sum of $100.00 so paid, to be considered and accepted as a part of the purchase price of said lot which is $5,500.00, less commission." It is conceded that the words "less commission" were intended to and did mean a commission of $150. Upon the faith of this, defendant put plaintiff into possession of the premises and authorized him to collect the rent of the tenant for the month of April, which he did. Thereafter defendant furnished to plaintiff a certificate of title, made by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, which showed the title to said real property to be subject to the following incumbrances: (1) Two tax sales of the front vigintillionth part of said lot for delinquent taxes; (2) a tax deed to one Collins on account of a preceding delinquent tax sale; and (3) a mortgage, dated June, 1889, given to secure $14,806.72, in 30 monthly installments, commencing July 31, 1889, and duly recorded. The plaintiff objected to receiving such title, and afterwards the defendant notified him that the defects and incumbrances above mentioned had been removed; and, at plaintiff's request, defendant, on the 15th day of April, 1902, executed a deed in regular form and delivered the same to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, to be by them delivered to plaintiff upon the payment of $5,250, the balance of the purchase money. On the 17th of April plaintiff deposited with said Title Insurance & Trust Company an amount sufficient to pay such balance, with instructions to pay the same to defendant if said property was free and clear of defects and incumbrances. Defendant refused to correct or remove such incumbrances, or to allow the expense thereof, or to make any conveyance other than one subject thereto; and on the 24th of April withdrew said deed and destroyed the same. He never thereafter tendered any deed or demanded any of the balance of the purchase price. The plaintiff, after the refusal of the defendant to remove such cloud, obtained releases correcting the title to said premises in all respects, save as to the two tax sales first mentioned, at an expense of $67.50, and on the 26th of April, 1902, commenced this action. The court, by its decree, ordered the defendant, upon the payment to him of $5,250, to execute, acknowledge, and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to said land, free and clear of all defects, liens, and incumbrances, and providing that upon the defendant's default in that regard, a commissioner appointed by the court should execute such conveyance and receive the unpaid purchase money, and out of the same to repay plaintiff the $67.50 expended in clearing the title of certain defects, less $20.45, rents received, and to pay the necessary costs and penalties according to law to redeem said property from said two tax sales first mentioned, and to pay the balance to defendant.

Appellant's first contention is that the contract is too uncertain to be the subject of specific performance. We are unable to see anything uncertain in relation to this contract. It is signed by the party to be charged with the conveyance of the property and accepted by the other. Section 1657 of the Civil Code provides that if no time is specified for the performance of an act, if it consists in the payment of money only, it must be performed immediately upon the thing to be done being exactly ascertained. It follows, therefore, that the money was payable upon delivery of the deed. The amount of commissions is susceptible of ascertainment, and its certainty in amount is not disputed.

It is next contended that there was no agreement to furnish a certificate of title, which may be true. But it was the duty of the defendant to furnish a good or marketable title. The vendor in an executory agreement for the sale of land impliedly represents that he has a good title thereto as one of the considerations for inducing the vendee to enter into the contract, and that the conveyance therein agreed to be made will transfer such title. Wilcox v. Lattin, 93 Cal. 588, 29 Pac. 226. A title to be good "should be free from litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts; should consist of both legal and equitable titles, and should be fairly deducible of record." Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. 262, 9 Am. St. Rep. 189. Applying these tests, the title evidenced by the certificate, which of itself was a representation and statement of defendant as to its condition, showed incumbrances and defects. While the portion of the property attempted to be sold at the two first sales mentioned is so infinitesimal as to be scarcely susceptible of computation, nevertheless it is a cloud upon the title which might affect its market value. The mortgage under certain facts may have been barred, and probably was, and yet it constituted an incumbrance in the sense that it would require litigation in order to remove it and quiet the title, and it was not incumbent upon plaintiff to accept a title thus incumbered. "In an action for the specific performance of an agreement to convey land, a court of equity has power, by its decree, as against the parties who are before it, to enforce all the terms of the agreement. * * * The court can direct the application of the purchase money to the satisfaction of those incumbrances, and for that purpose can cause the money to be brought into court, and disbursed under its direction." Grant v. Beronio, 97 Cal. 498, 32 Pac. 556. The plaintiff in this case having the right to have the court decree that these incumbrances should be paid out of the purchase money, certainly possessed the right to expend the very small sum so required to remove them; and while the court does not in terms find that the amount so expended was a reasonable sum, its order and judgment in relation thereto will be taken as impliedly finding such fact.

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

SMITH, J. (concurring). In concurring in the opinion in this case I deem it proper to add that I do not wish to be understood as holding that either the two sales of the vigintillionth part of the front of the lots in question, or the mortgage thereon referred to in the findings, constitute any defect in the title. The case is substantially the same, whether we hold the affirmative or the negative of these questions, and therefore I deem it unnecessary to pass upon them.

7 Cal. Unrep. 266

1. Mortgages—Foreclosure—Note—Mortgage—Construction.

Where a note is secured by a mortgage, the note and mortgage are to be construed together as evidencing the intent and purpose of the parties.

2. Same—Maturity of Debt—Construction.

A note and mortgage securing the same provided that the principal should be paid in five years, that the interest was to be paid semiannually, and if not paid when due, it should be added to the principal and bear the like interest; but, if default was made in payment of interest for 30 days, then the "whole sum, principal, here promised, shall, at the option of the holder of the note, become immediately due, payable, and collectible." Held that, where an action to foreclose was commenced 30 days after default in payment of interest, the mortgage was subject to foreclosure at plaintiff's election for the whole amount thereof.

3. Same—Election—Notice.

Where a mortgage provided that on default for 30 days in interest, the whole sum, principal and interest, should become payable at the option of the holder, the filing of a complaint, after 30 days' default in interest, seeking to recover the entire debt, constituted a sufficient notice of election by the mortgagee to claim the whole amount as due.

4. Same—Pleading—Defense—Remedy.

An objection that a complaint in a suit to foreclose a mortgage was insufficient for want of facts in that no definite or separate amount was alleged to be due could be taken advantage of by special demurrer, and was waived by defendant's failure to so object thereto.

5. Judgment—Res Judicata—Conclusiveness.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage it was alleged "on information and belief" that M. had an interest in the said "premises or property mentioned" in said mortgage, but that the same was subsequent and subject to the mortgage interest, and M. made default, such default was tantamount to an admission that M.'s interest was subsequent to plaintiff's so that after judgment it was too late for him to assert that his rights were not adjudicated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Cyrus F. McNutt and Joseph E. Hannon, for appellants. Wright, Bell & Ward, for respondent.

NOYES, Special Judge. Plaintiff filed complaint for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the defendant, the Lake View Town Company. The mortgage was given to secure the payment of a promissory note, likewise made by the said defendant to plaintiff for the sum of $5,000. The mortgage lien covers various subdivisions of land belonging to defendant, together with "one thousand shares of the capital stock of Lakeview Water Company; the said capital stock being in fact, and also mortgaged as, appurtenant to said land, on the plan of one share of the capital stock to each acre of said land." The stock was evidenced by certificate No. 475, which was owned by the corporation defendant and assigned to plaintiff as pledgee in pursuance of the mortgage contract. The note, or that part of it pertinent to the legal questions here raised, is as follows: "$5,000. Pasadena, Cal., April 10, 1901. Five years after date, excepting as herein otherwise stated, Lake View Town Company, * * * promises to pay unto San Gabriel Valley Bank, * * * the sum of five thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. If interest be not paid when due, it shall be added to, and become a part of, and thereafter bear like rate of interest with, the principal sum. If default be made in the payment of interest for a period of thirty days, then the whole sum, principal, here promised, shall at the option of the holder of this note, become immediately due, payable, and collectible." A copy of this note was inserted in the mortgage and made a part thereof, and the mortgage, in fixing the rights of the parties thereto, provided, inter alia, but with some particularity, that "the mortgagor will during the life of this mortgage, promptly pay all taxes that may be assessed against said mortgaged property, excepting the taxes upon the interest hereby created, and will pay all assessments that may be levied upon said water stock; that it will keep said land, or a large portion thereof, in reasonable state of cultivation; that it will promptly defend all adverse claims of title to, or lien against, such property. If the mortgagor fails to perform the tax, assessment, or defense covenants above stated, the mortgagee may perform the same and pay the expense of it, and the amount so paid, with interest thereon at the same rate named in said promissory note, shall be due and payable by the mortgagor to the mortgagee at the next interest due date therefor according to said note and be secured by said mortgage. * * * In case of default in making payments hereby secured, the mortgagee may cause the mortgage to be foreclosed and the mortgaged property sold in manner provided by law in foreclosure cases," etc.

The foregoing excerpts from the mortgage, together with the copy of the note, constitute that part of the record pertinent to the questions raised by the appellants. They pray for a reversal of the judgment on the following grounds: First, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or, if the complaint is sufficient, to warrant a decree favorable to plaintiff; second, it is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a judgment for overdue interest and costs only. In aid of these two points appellants cite the cases of Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Johnson, 53 Cal. 99, and the late case of Yoakam v. White, 97 Cal. 286, 32 Pac. 238. The language of the first case is as follows: "In case of default by the mortgagor in the payment of the said note or interest, or in the performance of any of the conditions hereof, then the mortgagee may, at its option, either commence legal proceedings to foreclose," etc. And in Yoakam v. White: "The mortgagor promises to pay said note according to the terms and conditions thereof, and * * * in default of the payment of note by its terms, the mortgagees or their assignees may foreclose this mortgage," etc. That a note, and mortgage given in security therefor, are to be construed together as evidencing the intent and purposes of the parties thereto, must be held as settled in this state. Being, as they are, essentially the indivisible parts of a single contract, their joint purport and meaning must control. Being thus construed together in this action, the contract between the parties, as concerns the amount due, is to the effect that the principal is to be paid within five years after April 10, 1901, and the interest is to be paid semiannually; that if not paid when due it shall be added to and become a part of the principal and bear the like rate of interest; but if default be made in payment of interest for thirty days, then the "whole sum, principal, here promised, shall, at the option of the holder of this note, become immediately due, payable, and collectible." This action was commenced more than thirty days after the default in interest, and under the well-considered cases of Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220, and Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 Pac. 451, no separate or definite act of election was necessary as a prerequisite to commencing the case. The filing of the complaint is, for all the purposes of the case, to be considered sufficient notice of the election, and of the amount claimed as due. It was notice to all adverse parties that whatever legal and equitable rights the plaintiff claimed he proposed to obtain them in his judgment, and right here the first cause for reversal advanced by appellants may be settled. It is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient for a cause of action in that no definite or separate amount is alleged as due, etc. This point is not determinative for the reason that appellants might have taken advantage of the defect by special demurrer. The most extreme criticism of the complaint would be that in this respect it was uncertain and ambiguous, and appellants not having availed themselves of this advantage are deemed to have waived it. Reynolds v. Hosmer, 45 Cal. 630; Montgomery v. McLaury, 143 Cal. 83, 76 Pac. 964. Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Johnson and Yoakam v. White, supra, are not in point. The mortgage contract in both cases provides that the plaintiff may foreclose on the default of any of the conditions and terms thereof, and it was held that plaintiff in both cases was restricted to a foreclosure for only the sums and amounts thus defaulted, and that no option under such default, under the terms of the mortgage contract, could be exercised to declare the whole or any further amount due. The distinction, therefore, between the reported cases and the one under consideration, is this: The reported cases hold that judgment of foreclosure may be had only for the particular amount defaulted, the contract between the parties having thus restricted plaintiff's rights. In this case it is held that as the action was commenced 30 days after default, and as the contract between the parties permitted plaintiff to elect the "whole sum" as due after such default for 30 days, the filing of the complaint was tantamount to such election, and on trial thereof, no special demurrer having been filed alleging uncertainty, etc., plaintiff could legally demand the "whole sum" and interest, disbursements, and costs in making up his judgment.

The point made that the rights of defendant McNutt should not be concluded by the judgment is not good. It is not alleged that defendant McNutt has any particular interest in said real property, or in said stock. "On information and belief," it is alleged McNutt has an interest in said "premises or property mentioned in said mortgage," but that the same is "subsequent and subject" to said mortgage interest. The defendant McNutt by his default confesses such allegation, and it is now too late for said defendant to claim that any of his rights were invaded. He has been offered the opportunity provided by law to set up whatever interest he may have, if any, and to have them adjudicated. His failure is now a bar to further claim on his part. Before he can claim error on the part of the court he must, as the law requires, set up whatever rights he may have, and it is upon these rights that the superior court is to pass, if it does so, and if error is made then the same may be corrected by the Appellate Court. As the judgment was in conformity to the allegations of the complaint and entirely within the powers of the court, we do not see how a defaulting defendant can now claim error. Hutchings v. Ebeler, 46 Cal. 557.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

LOWE v. OZMUN.

1. Judgments—Res Judicata—Collateral Issues.

Plaintiff, who was the owner of certain gas stock and bonds, after having pledged the bonds to defendant's testator, joined with other stockholders of the gas company in a suit to vacate a sale of their stock by the gas company for nonpayment of delinquent assessments levied thereon, on the ground that the directors had conspired to levy such assessments in order to increase the value of their bonds without any necessity therefor. Plaintiff alleged in this suit that testator converted $20,000 of such bonds, which were held as collateral to plaintiff's debt; that by such conversion the debt was satisfied; that certain stock belonging to plaintiff, sold at such delinquent assessment sale and theretofore held by testator for voting purposes until the debt was satisfied, was plaintiff's property; and that the certificates should be returned. Testator denied the conversion, and alleged the sale of the bonds under the pledge for a sum less than enough to pay plaintiff's debt, which allegation the court found to be true, and rendered judgment for testator. Held, that the issue of conversion of the bonds in such action was collateral only, and that such judgment was not res judicata of plaintiff's right to recover for conversion of the bonds in a subsequent suit.

2. Pledges—Foreclosure—Public Sale.

A public sale of pledged property must be made at public auction, in the manner and on the notice to the public usual at the place of sale in respect to auction sales of similar property, and must be for the highest price obtainable, as provided by Civ. Code, § 3005.

3. Same—Right of Pledgee to Buy.

When pledged property is sold at public sale as authorized by Civ. Code, § 3005, the pledgee or pledge holder may purchase at the sale, as authorized by section 3010.

4. Same—Notice—Waiver.

Notice of the time and place of sale of pledged property, required to be given by Civ. Code, § 3002, may be waived by the pledgor at any time, as authorized by section 3003.

5. Same—Sale at Public or Private Sale—Validity of Contract.

A contract of pledge, authorizing the pledgee to sell at public or private sale, with or without notice, is valid, and a sale at private sale without notice conveys title.

6. Same—Private Sale.

Where a contract of pledge authorized the pledgee to sell at public or private sale, the term "private sale" should be construed to mean, not merely a taking over of the property by the pledgee at such a price as he might elect to consider an offer, but a sale conducted in the manner usually and ordinarily followed in relation to private sales of property.

7. Same — Conversion of Pledged Property.

Where a pledgee of personal property renounced such relationship and notified the pledgor that he no longer held the property in pledge, but asserted ownership thereof, and acting on that claim thereafter sold the property as his own, his acts in repudiating the pledge amounted to a conversion of the property.

8. Same—Payment of Debt—Tender.

Where a pledgee of securities, the value of which exceeded the debt for which they were pledged, converted the securities to his own use, such conversion amounted to a satisfaction of the debt, entitling the pledgor to recover the excess in value of the securities without a tender of the amount of the debt.

9. Appeal—Admission of Evidence—Prejudice.

Where, in an action against a pledgee's executor for the conversion of certain bonds, the judgment awarded plaintiff was one for the value of the bonds at the date of the conversion, without reference to the expense of the sale, defendant was not prejudiced by evidence of the account of the sale or of the value of the bonds after the conversion, which was admitted, but which was not considered by the court in determining the case.

10. Pledge—Conversion by Pledgee—Judgment.

In an action for conversion of certain bonds by a pledgee, a judgment for the value of the bonds at the date of the conversion, with a recoupment of damages by crediting the amount of the debt at the date of the conversion, was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by T. S. C. Lowe against Roy Wheeler Ozmun, as executor of the estate of A. M. Ozmun, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Russ Avery and F. W. Burnett, for appellant. E. S. Williams, Lynn Helm, F. C. Bailey, and Oscar A. Trippet, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for conversion. Judgment for plaintiff, from which judgment, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The complaint, which appears to have been filed May 9, 1900, alleges that in 1896 plaintiff was the owner of certain bonds of the Pasadena Consolidated Gas Company of the value of $20,000, and bonds of the Pasadena & Mt. Wilson Railway Company of the value of $10,000; that at that date he pledged the same with A. M. Ozmun to secure an indebtedness of $10,801.66; that said Ozmun, on the 10th day of May, 1897, unlawfully converted said bonds to his own use, at which date plaintiff's indebtedness to Ozmun was $11,230.86, and no more; that on the 11th day of May, 1897, plaintiff demanded from defendant the said bonds, or the value thereof, less the sum so due and owing from plaintiff; that Ozmun refused either to return said bonds or pay their value to plaintiff, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $18,769.14, no part of which has been paid; that Ozmun died in 1899, and defendant, who is the executor of the last will and testament of deceased, published notice to creditors, and thereafter plaintiff presented his claim duly verified for the above-named sum, which was rejected. A copy of said claim is attached to the complaint, which shows the indebtedness originally existing, the amount and value of the bonds, and the balance claimed to be due after deducting such indebtedness.

A demurrer to this complaint, which involved, not only its sufficiency as a pleading, but also the bar of section 339, Code Civ. Proc., was considered by our Supreme Court upon appeal in Lowe v. Ozmun, 137 Cal. 257, 70 Pac. 87, and the complaint was there held to state a cause of action, and that the claim therein set out was not barred by the provisions of the statute. After the coming down of the remittitur defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and by way of a separate defense set up that the indebtedness mentioned in the complaint was evidenced by a note given by plaintiff to Ozmun in the year 1896, due in one day, which note contained a clause authorizing Ozmun to sell the collateral mentioned in the complaint at public or private sale, at the option of the payee, without advertising the same or demanding payment of the debt or giving notice, and authorizing the pledgee at such sale to become the purchaser. It is alleged that demand was made upon plaintiff for the payment of the debts, which being refused, on May 4, 1897, the pledgee caused to be published in the Evening Express of that date, a notice that on May 10, 1897, at 2 o'clock p. m., he would sell said collaterals at public auction to the highest bidder; that pursuant thereto he sold the same for $4,748, being the full value of the bonds, and credited the same upon the note, and that the balance remains unpaid. And for a further defense defendant sets up the pleadings and records in an action brought at some date not apparent of record, but before March 27, 1898, by plaintiff and other stockholders of the Consolidated Gas Company, a corporation, to vacate and annul a certain sale of stock of said gas company theretofore made on account of the nonpayment of a delinquent assessment levied upon such stock by the board of directors, basing their right of action in part upon the claim that the individual defendants to such action and directors of said corporation were the owners of a large amount of the bonds of said gas company, and that they had conspired together to levy such assessment for the sole purpose of increasing the value of such bonds, and without any other necessity for such assessment; and it was alleged in said complaint that Ozmun, on May 10, 1897, converted $20,000 of such bonds, the property of Lowe, to the use of himself, the said Ozmun, and that said bonds so converted were held as collateral to a debt of Lowe, and by such conversion all obligations of Lowe to Ozmun had been satisfied, and that certain stock belonging to Lowe, sold at said delinquent assessment sale and theretofore held by Ozmun for voting purposes until such indebtedness was satisfied, was the property of Lowe and should be returned to him and certificates issued therefor. In that action the defendants denied the conversion, and alleged that they had sold the bonds mentioned in the complaint as claimed by Lowe in the manner provided in the contract under which they were held as collateral, and that the proceeds were insufficient to pay such indebtedness. The court in its findings in that case found that the allegations of the defendants' answer were true, and that plaintiffs were entitled to take nothing by said action, and that defendants were entitled to their costs. As a further defense in this action, the defendant pleaded the bar of the statute under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure.

Upon the trial of this case the trial court found that said Ozmun unlawfully converted the bonds mentioned in the complaint to his own use; that the plaintiff demanded their return, or their value, less the amount due on said loan, May 11, 1897, which was refused; that Ozmun, after demand for the payment of the debt secured by the collateral bonds, published a notice, as alleged in the answer, that he would sell said bonds on May 10, without specifying the year; that the space occupied by such notice was 2¼ by 2 inches, with over 100 words printed therein; that on the 10th of May, 1897, Ozmun sold the bonds to himself for $4,748, that being the only bid. The court further finds that said sale was not made at public auction in the manner and upon the notice to the public usual at the place of sale in respect to auction sales of similar property, and was not made for the highest obtainable price; that said pretended sale was not a good-faith public auction sale. The court further finds that Ozmun thereafter claimed to hold and own said bonds adversely to plaintiff, and claimed that plaintiff had no right to redeem the same from said sale upon payment of the amount due upon said note; that afterwards, in 1898, Ozmun sold said Pasadena & Mt. Wilson Railway Company bonds and received the price unto himself; that in July, 1902, defendant, the executor, sold the gas bonds and received the price unto himself; that the value of said bonds so pretended to be sold on May 10, 1897, and the value of said bonds belonging to the plaintiff converted by defendant and said deceased, over and above said indebtedness, was at the time of said conversion $2,489.27; and plaintiff was damaged at the time of said conversion by said conversion in said sum, the same being the value of said bonds over and above the amount of said indebtedness, together with interest thereon from the date of conversion, May 10, 1897, to date, making a total of $3,621.88. The court further found that none of the matters or things set forth in said complaint have been at any time the subject of litigation between the same parties in this action, or in any action, in any court, at any time; that there was an action brought, as alleged in the answer, and that the judgment therein rendered was as alleged in the answer, and is final; that plaintiff has not paid to the said defendant, or the said Ozmun, any money or property on account of the indebtedness recited in said amended complaint since or before the rendition of said judgment.

Appellant contends for reversal of the judgment upon various grounds: First, upon the defense of res adjudicata. This, we think, cannot be maintained. The action pleaded as an adjudication was essentially one to vacate a sale made by the corporation of certain stock belonging to the plaintiff, and incidentally as a basis to support their claim of bad faith in relation to such sale, and to establish that the officers making the assessment upon which the same was due were affected and controlled in their actions on account of their large holdings of bonds of the corporation, the value of which they were seeking to increase, and the allegation of the conversion of plaintiff's bonds was to establish the amount of the holdings of the bonds by the officers at the time of the assessment. In Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 654, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982, our Supreme Court has held that a judgment operates as an estoppel from further litigation only as to such matters as were necessarily considered and determined, and never upon immaterial or collateral issues; that the test proper to apply in determining the materiality of the issues is to inquire whether or not the judgment is dependent upon such issue. If the findings upon any issue were erroneous, and yet the judgment has support, then such issue is collateral. In this case the finding of the court that the assessment was properly levied and the sale regularly conducted was all that was required to support the judgment rendered; for it mattered not who owned the bonds or how they acquired them, if such delinquent sale transferred title to the stock the court was warranted in granting the relief given, and the judgment was fully supported by the findings, outside of any finding with reference to the bonds.

It is next contended that the sale of the bonds was made in pursuance of the contract contained in the collateral note. The finding of the court that the sale was not a public one, we think, has ample support in the testimony, lacking as it did any reasonable or customary notice of its time and place. A public sale of pledged property must be made by public auction in the manner and upon the notice to the public, usual at the place of sale in respect to auction sales of similar property, and must be for the highest obtainable price. Civ. Code, § 3005. By section 3010, when so sold, the pledgee, or pledge holder, may purchase at such sale. By section 3002 the pledgee must give actual notice to the pledgor of the time and place at which the property pledged is to be sold. By section 3003, notice of the sale may be waived by the pledgor at any time. Notwithstanding these provisions, our Supreme Court has determined in Williams v. Hahn, 113 Cal. 475, 45 Pac. 815, that the authority in a contract to sell at public or private sale, with or without notice, is a valid agreement, and that a sale of pledged property, at private sale, without notice conveys title. This contract gave an optional right to the pledgee to sell, either at public or private sale. All of the elements of a public sale being omitted, and there having been no public sale, then the only sale which he was authorized to make was a private sale. This contract, authorizing a private sale without notice, must have a reasonable construction. The term "private sale" comprehends something more than a mere taking over of the property by the pledgee at such price as he may elect to consider an offer. This is, in effect, but a declaration of forfeiture, an agreement for which is invalid under section 2889, Civ. Code. To give effect to the contract, if possible, is our duty. The agreement, then, that the pledgee may become purchaser at a private sale, must be taken as meaning at a sale conducted in the manner usually and ordinarily followed in relation to private sales of property. A sale of property is a contract, and, like every other contract, requires an agreement between two or more. A mere taking over of the property without any agreement with another competent to contract is not a sale, in our opinion.

It is next insisted that, there being no actual sale, there was no change of relation; hence, no conversion. Very eminent authorities have been cited by appellant which go to the extent claimed. In this state, however, the leading case of Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 420, and which is cited and approved in very many subsequent cases, establishes the doctrine that " 'it is not necessary to a conversion that there should be a manual taking of the thing in question by the defendant. It is not necessary that it should be shown that he has applied it to his own use. Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the plaintiff's rights? If he does, this is in law a conversion, be it for his own or another person's use.' * * * A mere claim of dominion, an intention intimated to interfere with goods under a pretense of right or authority, amounts to a constructive trespass." Ozmun, on the 11th of May, 1897, occupied the relation of pledgee. On that date and thereafter he renounced that relationship and notified plaintiff that he no longer held the property in pledge, but asserted ownership therein, and, acting upon that claim, thereafter sold the property as his own. We think clearly that the acts and declarations of Ozmun on the 11th day of May, 1897, amounted to a conversion of the property so pledged and changed his relationship thereto.

Appellant's next contention is that no recovery can be had, because no payment or tender of the debt was proven. The court finds that from the 10th of May, 1897, Ozmun refused to account to plaintiff for said bonds, and claimed that plaintiff had no right to redeem the same from said pledge. The evidence as to the refusal of Ozmun to accept, on and after May 10, 1897, money due upon the obligation of Lowe and to turn over to him the securities, is very conflicting; but upon this appeal we must assume, as found by the court, that Ozmun refused to recognize plaintiff's right to redeem, and so asserted to him and his agents, which being true, under section 1515, Civ. Code, obviated the necessity of formal tender, even were such tender essential to maintain this action. In addition to all this, no tender of the debt was averred in the original complaint, and the facts upon which the claim of conversion was based—namely, that he had appropriated to his own use the bonds, the value of which was in excess of the debt, which in law amounted to a satisfaction of the debt—are clearly set forth in the original complaint, and were before the Supreme Court on the appeal mentioned, and that court held such complaint to be sufficient, not only in that regard, but also upon the question of the statute of limitations, and the same has become the law of this case.

We find no prejudicial error in admitted evidence of the account of the sale, or of the value of the bonds after the conversion. The findings of the court show that nothing established thereby was considered or had any weight in the determination of the case; the judgment being only for the value at the date of the conversion found to have been May 10, 1897, and without reference to the expenses of sale. Evidence in relation to the executor's acts after the conversion was not material, and the judgment is not dependent thereon for support. Nor do we see anything conflicting in the findings. It is true that the court in one finding says that the value of the bonds converted by defendant and said deceased was at the time of the conversion a certain sum, but the same finding shows the conversion to have been made May 10, 1897, years before the appointment of the defendant as executor; and hence reference to the executor's conversion may well be disregarded.

An examination of the many other specifications of error develops nothing which, in our opinion, would justify a reversal of the judgment. The judgment being for the value of the bonds at the date of conversion, with a recoupment of damages by crediting the amount of the debt at the date of such conversion, is, in our opinion, a proper judgment.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

3 Cal. App. 427

GREENE v. OSCEOLA GOLD MINES CO., Limited.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 18, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, June 15, 1906.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—ACTIONS — PLEADING—ANSWER.

Where, in an action on a note, the answer, for want of information and belief, denied its execution and nonpayment and set up want of consideration, it was insufficient to raise an issue on the question of the execution and nonpayment of the note as an entirety.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1590–1595.]

2. SAME—CONSIDERATION.

G. and others, as owners of a mining bond, contracted to sell it to a corporation thereafter to be formed for its entire capital stock. G. and others undertook to pay $3,000 due on the mining property and to procure a conveyance thereof to the corporation. On the same day, the corporation agreed to accept the assignment of the bond and the deed of the owner of the property and to issue therefor its whole capital stock. Anticipating such agreement, G. advanced to the corporation $3,000 due the owner of the property, but before that time G. had paid $2,000 to be used in developing the property and the payment of expenses already accrued in the development. This amount was credited to G. on the books of the corporation, as was the $3,000, together with $3,176, which was one-fourth of the previous expenditure in the purchase of the bond and the development of the property. The $2,000 was paid on the agreement that it should be refunded out of the first earnings of the mine, after which the corporation executed to G. a note covering all advances credited to her on the books, including the $3,176 expended before the promoter's agreement and the $3,000 paid for the acquirement of the mine. Held, that such note was not void for want of consideration, in so far as it purported to secure the $2,000, though it was without consideration as to the other advancements.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Henry A. Greene against the Osceola Gold Mines Company, Limited. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Fred W. Heatherly and Powers & Holland, for appellant. Lynn Helm and Sidney J. Parsons, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in defendant's favor, and from an order denying a new trial.

The action is upon a promissory note, dated July 26, 1901, for $9,500, and interest. The answer, for want of information and belief, denies its execution and nonpayment, and further sets up as a defense a want of consideration. The answer being insufficient to raise an issue upon the question of the execution and nonpayment of the note as an entirety, the only question for consideration on this appeal is whether or not the note executed was without consideration. The case is this: On the 12th of June, 1900, Mary C. Greene, W. H. Fuller, T. R. Garnier, and G. W. Beck were the owners jointly of a mining bond conditioned for the conveyance to them, or their assigns, upon payment of $3,000, of a certain mining property. They had made various contracts in relation to the disposition thereof to a corporation thereafter to be formed; and on the date last mentioned, after the formation of such corporation, finally agreed in writing to convey their equity in the property to defendant corporation for its entire capital stock, and in such agreement Greene, Garnier, and Fuller undertook to pay the $3,000 due on said property and to procure a conveyance thereof to the corporation. On the same day the corporation, by resolution regularly adopted, agreed to accept the assignment of such bond and the deed of the original owner of such property and issue therefor the whole of its capital stock, one-fourth thereof to each of said holders of the bond. Anticipating this agreement, Mrs. Greene had already advanced and paid into the corporation, through Fuller, her attorney, the $3,000 due to the owner, and which, under the agreement, she, Fuller, and Garnier were to pay as a part of the consideration for the issue of the stock to them. Before this time, however, on the 31st of May preceding, Mrs. Greene had paid to Fuller $2,000, to be used in development of the mine and payment of expenses already accrued in its development. This money was credited to Mrs. Greene on the books of the corporation, as was the $3,000 before mentioned, together with $3,176, the one-fourth of previous expenditures in the purchase of the bond and the development of the property. The undisputed testimony is that this $2,000 was not paid or advanced, except upon the agreement that it should be refunded out of the first earnings of the mine before any dividends were paid, and the corporation seems to have received this $2,000 and to have expended it in payment for labor and materials before the incorporation, as well as for machinery, supplies, and development thereafter. After this $2,000 had been received by the corporation, and under the agreement before mentioned large blocks of stock were sold to various persons, and afterwards, in March, 1901, the corporation executed to Mrs. Greene a note covering all advances and sums credited to her upon the books, which included the $3,176 expended before the promoter's agreement and the $3,000 paid out for the acquirement of the mine, the renewal of which note is sued on in this action.

We are of opinion that the trial court was justified in finding that, as to the $3,176 and the $3,000, there was no consideration moving to the corporation. The stock was issued in consideration of the conveyance to it of the bond for a mine in its then existing developed condition, and a conveyance from the owner for the consideration of which the other parties, and not the corporation, were to pay. But as to the $2,000 the case is different. Mrs. Greene was under no legal obligations to pay any liens for labor, if any existed upon the mine, or to do any development work after its acquirement by the corporation; and the corporation having received from her the $2,000 and credited the same upon the books, even the payment of a portion thereof on account of debts due from the original promoters would not warrant a finding that there was no consideration for the note, even to the extent of such payment by the corporation on account of its previous debts; nor is there any offset claimed or demanded in the pleadings on account thereof. Subsequent to the conveyance of the property to the defendant, Mrs. Greene advanced $2,250 additional; but this seems to have been paid her with interest, and is not involved in the case. We think, therefore, that there is no testimony in the record supporting the finding of an entire want of consideration, but that, on the contrary, to the extent of $2,000, the original note was a valid and subsisting obligation of the corporation, and to such extent, with interest, is still an obligation evidenced by the note sued on in this action.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: GRAY, P. J.

SMITH, J. I concur in the judgment, and also in what is said as to the sufficiency of the item of $2,000 referred to in the opinion to constitute a valid consideration to that extent. I am not prepared, however, to hold that the note was to any extent invalid for lack of consideration or otherwise. It was duly executed by the corporation in pursuance of a resolution of the board of directors and in consideration of an acknowledged indebtedness appearing on its books. I see no evidence of any fraud in the transaction on the part of the plaintiff, who, if not defrauded, was in some way induced to advance large sums of money for the benefit of the other corporators and the corporation, which she was under no peculiar obligation to pay. As to the question whether, under the agreements between the corporators, written or oral, and the agreement of assignment between the corporators and the corporation, she could, in the absence of any action upon the part of the corporation, have recovered the amounts advanced by her, I express no opinion. But she naturally and in good faith claimed the right to recover these sums, and it was competent for the board of directors to determine on the validity of her claim, and to issue the obligation of the company for its payment. Whether or not they were mistaken in their action, I am not prepared to say that the claim of the plaintiff did not consitute a sufficient consideration for the note. I deem it unnecessary, however, under the circumstances, to enter upon a particular examination of this point, or to express a definite opinion thereon; and I am therefore of the opinion that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, without any special instructions.

3 Cal. App. 416

PEOPLE v. STOFER.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 11, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1906.)

1. LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

On a prosecution for grand larceny a request for an instruction that the stealing would not constitute grand larceny unless the property was taken from the person of another and relative to the two degrees of larceny constituted a request for an instruction as to what constitutes taking from the person.

2. SAME.

Where on a prosecution for grand larceny it appeared that prosecutor and defendant had been talking together, prosecutor holding his purse, and that defendant on leaving prosecutor took his purse from his hand, and that when he returned and gave back the purse some of the money was gone, and was found in defendant's possession, it was error to instruct that defendant was guilty of grand larceny or nothing, to fail to instruct on petit larceny, and to refuse a requested instruction as to what constitutes a taking from the person within the meaning of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; J. C. Gray, Judge.

Frank Stofer was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frank Thunen and Wm. E. Duncan, Jr., for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was accused of the crime of grand larceny in that he did, on August 23, 1905, wrongfully and feloniously "steal, take, and carry away from the person and immediate possession of John Coleman, $20 in gold coin * * * and 50 cents in silver money," the personal property of the said Coleman. The jury found the defendant guilty of grand larceny, and the court adjudged that the defendant be imprisoned for the term of 10 years. Defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. Defendant was refused an instruction, the purpose of which was to inform the jury that the stealing of money less in value than $50 would not constitute grand larceny, unless it was taken from the person of another, and further to inform the jury of the two degrees in larceny, and that, although guilty of stealing the money, the jury should have been given the opportunity under proper instructions to determine whether the crime was grand or petit larceny.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "There are but one of two verdicts that you can find in this case. * * * They will be 'guilty of grand larceny,' or 'guilty as charged;' and 'not guilty.' There is no lesser crime in it; it is either 'guilty,' or 'not guilty.' The taking of money from the person of another, as I have read to you in the statute, is grand larceny; it makes no difference whether the amount be great or small." The instruction given by the court removed from the jury all consideration of the lesser offense of petit larceny, and not only assumed as proven the important fact that the money was taken from the person of Coleman, but that there was no evidence from which the jury might have reasonably drawn the inference that the money was not so taken. Respondent cites cases where the Supreme Court has held that in a prosecution for murder, the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that they may return a verdict of manslaughter is not error, if the evidence clearly shows that the jury would not have been warranted in rendering a verdict of manslaughter, and where the appellate court was able to say from an examination of the evidence that the crime of manslaughter was not involved. People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183, is among the cases so holding. The principle of these cases need not be questioned. It is nevertheless well established as a principle of criminal jurisprudence that where murder is charged and the facts and circumstances would warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty of the lesser offense of manslaughter, it would be prejudicial error for the court to refuse an instruction as to what constitutes manslaughter. The rule applies in grand larceny cases. See subject discussed in People v. Comyns, 114 Cal. 107, 45 Pac. 1034. The question there was as to whether the defendant was guilty of a larceny of articles in value exceeding $50. Here the question of the value is not in dispute, but the equally important question is in dispute, namely, did defendant take the money from the person of Coleman with intent to steal it? If the facts and circumstances were such as to leave open to reasonable doubt whether the money was taken by defendant from the person of Coleman in the sense intended by the statute, the court erred in withdrawing the question from the jury and confining their inquiry to the sole question of defendant's guilt as charged in the information. The mere taking of personal property from the person of another is not in itself sufficient to constitute the crime, for the taking may have been without intent to steal the property and may have been with the actual or implied assent of the owner. The Supreme Court in People v. McElroy, 116 Cal. 583, 48 Pac. 718, after reviewing the cases, said: "In view of these authorities and the origin of the statute, we think its obvious purpose was to protect persons and property against the approach of the pick-pocket, the purse-snatcher, the jewel-abstractor, and other thieves of like character who obtain property by similar means of stealth or fraud, and that it was in contemplation that the property shall at the time be in some way actually upon or attached to the person, or carried or held in actual physical possession—such as clothing, apparel, or ornaments, or things contained therein, or attached thereto, or property held or carried in the hands, or by other means, upon the person; that it was not intended to include property removed from the person and laid aside, however immediately it may be retained in the presence or constructive control or possession of the owner while so laid away from its person or out of his hands." It was held in People v. Appleton, 120 Cal. 250, 52 Pac. 582, not to be error for the court to omit an instruction as to what constitutes taking from the person, within the meaning of the statute, where the defendant asks for no such instruction. But here there was what must be regarded as a request for an instruction on the question.

It is not necessary to state the evidence at length. Coleman and defendant were both negroes, and whether former acquaintances does not appear. Coleman came to Oroville on the afternoon of August 22, 1905, and proceeded to get drunk; he hung around the saloon of one Thorp until midnight, but could not remember what befell him the balance of the night. The next morning about 9 o'clock he and defendant were together in Thorp's saloon; defendant had Coleman's valise and said he was "going to take Coleman up to the half past 12 train, and see that he went off on it." Coleman was still very much intoxicated. The two went out of the saloon together, and not long thereafter defendant went back and handed a purse to the barkeeper, stating that it contained Coleman's money. Later, defendant went back again and said to Thorp, who was then taking the place of one of his barkeepers, that Coleman had sent him for $5. Thorp refused to give it to him and defendant went out again.

Later both Coleman and defendant returned and Coleman said he wanted his money. Thorp prudently counted it out to him, to show that it had not been tampered with by him. He testified that there was "a twenty-dollar piece, two fives, two halves, and a few short bits" in the purse when he handed it to Coleman, who treated "all around" and the two then went into a back room together and sat down at a table; Coleman having his purse in his hand, and thumping it on the table at times. Witness Cherry was in this back room. He testified: "They sat that way, talking for about half an hour, and directly Coleman said it was time to go to the train. He said: 'Where is my valise? I want to go to Marysville on that train.' And Stofer said, 'I will get your valise.' It was in that little office in there. This man had the money in his purse, patting it on the table, and Stofer reached over and took the purse out of his hand and went into the place and got his valise; and he was in there two or three minutes, and came out and put the valise on the table, and gave him his purse, and said, 'It is all right; put it in your pocket and we will go to the train.'" Coleman soon after opened the purse and discovered that the twenty-dollar piece was gone and at once accused defendant of taking it. Thorp, hearing the loud talk, went into the back room, saw the purse on the table and found on examination that the twenty-dollar piece was missing. Shortly afterwards defendant went out back to a water-closet and Thorp followed him and took from his hand a twenty-dollar piece and a fifty-cent piece and brought the money to Coleman. Defendant was soon thereafter arrested.

It seems to us that under the circumstances disclosed defendant had opportunity to have secured the money without taking the purse from the person of Coleman for that purpose. They had been together since 9 o'clock of that morning and defendant had been given possession of the purse by Coleman and had himself deposited it with Thorp for safekeeping. When the two men went into the back room of Thorp's saloon and sat down together and were talking, as Cherry testified, for a half an hour, Coleman might have allowed defendant to handle the purse and the money might have been taken at such a time. Cherry did not know what money was in the purse when he testified to having seen defendant take it out of Coleman's hand. Besides, the jury were not bound to believe Cherry's testimony. Furthermore, conceding the truth of Cherry's testimony and that the stolen money was in the purse when defendant took it out of Coleman's hand, it was for the jury to say whether defendant intended at that time to steal the money or made up his mind to steal it while he was going to get Coleman's valise. It is not beyond reasonable probability or possibility that the money dropped out of the purse while Coleman was thumping the purse on the table. Coleman had intrusted the purse to defendant earlier in the day, and there is no evidence that he suspected defendant of foul play with him while sitting at this table, or that he kept the purse in his own hands all the time while sitting there. He was in a maudlin condition, and had no distinct recollection of what occurred except that on opening the purse he missed the twenty-dollar piece. The evidence may have been and apparently was sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty of larceny, but there was enough of doubt as to whether the larceny was committed in conjunction with the alleged act of taking the money from the person of Coleman to entitle defendant to the verdict of the jury upon this latter element of the alleged crime. Proof of the larceny of the money was not of itself sufficient to support the verdict. As instructed, the jury were not permitted to consider the probability, much less reasonable possibility, that the money was taken from the purse by defendant at some time while it was in defendant's possession by leave of Coleman. In our view of the law as applied to the facts and circumstances, the court erred in giving the instruction complained of, and in refusing to instruct the jury as to what constitutes the taking of property from the person of another, and also in not instructing the jury as to the lesser crime of petit larceny.

The judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CHAPMAN v. BENEDICT et al. (STULL, Intervener).

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 7, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 23, 1906.)

1. PLEDGES — RIGHT TO REDEEM — OFFER TO PAY.

The right to redeem security given as collateral for a debt by reason of a seasonable and proper offer to pay is not affected by subsequent offers on such offer being rejected.

2. SAME—PLEADING—EFFECT OF PRAYER.

One who has seasonably offered to pay a debt, which offer is refused, and so under Civ. Code, §§ 1504, 1512, 1515, stopped the running of interest, is entitled to redeem her securities given as collateral for the debt on payment of the debt and interest to such date, and may do so, though in the prayer of her complaint therefor she, by reason of a mistake of law as to the effect of the offer, claims exemption from interest only from a later date.

3. SAME—REDEMPTION—JUDGMENT.

A judgment giving the right to redeem securities given as collateral should specify the time within which payment should be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by William Chapman against

Charles E. Benedict and others; Gertrude Stull intervening. Judgment for intervener. Plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Harris & Swanwick and Charles Lantz, for appellant. C. C. Wright, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. The suit was brought by plaintiff as assignee of the intervener to foreclose a mortgage made by the defendants to one Wm. N. Holway, of date May 1, 1900, to secure a promissory note for the sum of $3,000. Judgment was rendered for the intervener, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The note and mortgage were assigned by Holway to the intervener to secure his promissory note to her for the sum of $2,400, and were assigned with Holway's note to the plaintiff by the intervener as collateral security for her note to the plaintiff of date May 20, 1901, for the sum of $1,500, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent., etc. These facts are alleged in the complaint in intervention, and it is further alleged: That this complainant paid the interest due on her personal note August 20, 1901; that thereafter three times she offered to Charles Lantz the money due on her personal note and demanded the reassignment of said securities; and that Charles Lantz has ever since refused to accept the money, claiming a fee not rightly belonging to him. Then there is a copy of a receipt given for the interest paid, which shows it to have been paid August 19, 1901. There were other facts alleged touching the intervener's right to make the assignment; but, in view of the proceedings on the trial and the findings of the court, these allegations may be regarded as immaterial. The complaint in intervention is duly verified, and its allegations are not specifically denied. The execution of the note and mortgage in suit, and its assignment, together with the execution of Holway's note to Mrs. Stull, and of her note to the plaintiff, are admitted. But it is found: (1) That Mrs. Stull did not assign to plaintiff the $2,400 note of Holway, for which she held the note and mortgage in suit as collateral, of which fact the plaintiff had notice; that she had no right to transfer the latter without also transferring the $2,400 note; (2) that said intervener, Gertrude Stull, paid to the said plaintiff the interest due on her said note to the 20th day of August, 1901; that on said 20th day of August, 1901, the said Gertrude Stull offered to pay Chas. Lantz her said note in full, including all amounts due thereon to date of said offer, and demanded of plaintiff a return of the said securities held by him; that said plaintiff, by his attorney in fact, Chas. Lantz, then refused and has ever since refused to accept said payment, assigning no reason for such refusal save that the amount tendered by said Gertrude Stull did not include an additional sum of $125 claimed to be due from said Gertrude Stull to the said plaintiff's attorney for services rendered in a prior action to foreclose said $3,000 Benedict mortgage. The conclusions of law were that the intervener was entitled to judgment for the possession of the papers and securities deposited with the plaintiff as security for her note, upon the payment to the plaintiff of the sum of $1,500, and judgment was entered accordingly.

These findings are attacked by the appellant as not justified by the evidence. As to the first, the note of Mrs. Stull in evidence discloses an assignment of the Holway and Benedict notes, and said first finding has no support in the testimony; but the error is of no materiality as affecting the rights of the parties upon this appeal. As to the second finding, there is testimony in the record to the effect that on the 20th day of August, 1901, intervener notified Lantz, who was the attorney in fact for plaintiff, that she was ready and willing to pay her said note of $1,500, and that said Lantz notified her that he would not accept the tender of the amount due Chapman, as principal, unless she paid him an additional sum, which was not a part of the note or connected therewith, and not due Chapman in any event. There is some little difficulty in bringing the findings within the issues tendered by the intervention; but taking the whole complaint in intervention together, from which it appears by the date upon the receipt that the payment of interest was on the 19th of August, and that thereafter she tendered the amount, it indicates that the pleader intended to say that interest was paid to August 20th, and not on August 20th, and reconciles what otherwise would be a discrepancy between the findings and the allegations of the complaint in intervention. It is true that intervener does not assert with any degree of positiveness that the 20th day of August was the exact date of the tender, but she says it was immediately after the note matured, and Lantz, who was offered as a witness for plaintiff, was not prepared to say that the 20th was not the correct date of the conversation referred to. The fact that several other offers of performance were made after the 20th of August in no wise affects the status of the parties, assuming a proper offer of performance to have been made on the 20th. That Lantz was the attorney in fact, and had full authority in the premises to act for plaintiff, affirmatively appears in the record. The notice given by Lantz to intervener of his refusal to accept the money rendered formal tender unnecessary. Civ. Code, §§ 1512, 1515. The money, however, does not seem to have been deposited in bank, whereby the obligation was extinguished, as provided by section 1500, Civ. Code; but such tender had the effect to stop the interest. Civ. Code, § 1504. We attach no importance to the prayer of the complaint in which the intervener claims exemption from interest from January 20, 1902. If, in fact, a tender were made and the interest stopped thereby, her mistake as to the effect of such tender would not prejudice her, especially where the pleading was drawn by one not learned in the law, as is indicated by the fact that the complaint in intervention was signed by the intervener in propria persona. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the finding of the court as to the tender cannot be disturbed. But the judgment is defective in not fixing a time within which the money due from Mrs. Stull to the plaintiff, $1,500, shall be paid, or providing for the contingency of nonpayment within the time specified. We are therefore of the opinion that the time should be fixed by the court within which the money is to be paid by Mrs. Stull, and that upon her failure to pay the same her complaint in intervention be dismissed, and the case left to proceed between the original parties.

There is a motion in the case to dismiss the appeal, but as the same motion was made and determined in the Supreme Court it cannot be further considered. It is ordered, therefore, that the judgment appealed from be modified by striking therefrom, at the end of the second paragraph thereof, the following words: "Whenever the said Stull pays or tenders to the said plaintiff the sum of $1.500, and thereupon that the assignment thereof from Stull to Chapman shall be void" —in lieu of what there shall be inserted: "Upon the payment to said William Chapman of the sum of $1,500 gold coin of the United States, within ten days after receiving written notice of the entry of the judgment, and that if the intervener shall fail to pay the said sum within the time so fixed, her complaint in intervention shall be dismissed, and the plaintiff have leave to proceed with the foreclosure of the mortgage in suit against the original parties;" and it is further ordered that the judgment so modified, and the order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, shall stand affirmed.

I concur: GRAY, P. J.

SMITH, J. (concurring). I concur in the opinion on the ground that I am not satisfied that we would be justified in disturbing the finding of the court as to the date of the tender made to the plaintiff by Mrs. Stull. On this point I am satisfied from the evidence and from the allegations and prayer of the complaint in intervention, that Mrs. Stull herself, at the time of filing her complaint, did not believe that she had made any effectual tender prior to the date named, "Jan. 20, 1902," and that she then believed that she was entitled to exemption from interest only from that date. But it is suggested in the opinion that the court below may have been satisfied that she was under a mistake of law on this point, and upon this hypothesis the court, perhaps, was justified in its findings. Otherwise, I would think she should be charged with interest up to that date.

KRAMM v. STOCKTON ELECTRIC R. CO.*

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—MOTION FOR NONSUIT—EFFECT.

A motion for a nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact that can be legitimately drawn therefrom, on which motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant.

2. SAME.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, some of which tends to sustain plaintiff's cause of action, a motion for a nonsuit should be denied.

3. STREET RAILROADS—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—CARE REQUIRED.

Though ordinary care is required on the part of persons crossing the tracks of both street and commercial railroads, what is ordinary care is widely different in the two cases.

4. SAME — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — DEFENSE.

Where decedent was killed by being struck by a street car while crossing the track, the fact that he might have been guilty of contributory negligence would constitute no defense, if, by the exercise of ordinary care, defendant's agent could have avoided the accident after discovering decedent in a perilous position.

5. SAME—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for death of a pedestrian by being struck by a street car while crossing the track, evidence held to require submission of the street railroad company's negligence and decedent's contributory negligence to the jury.

6. SAME—PLACE OF DANGER.

Where decedent, at the time he was struck by defendant's street car and killed, was employed in the work of spreading gravel on the street on which the car was operated, and just prior to the accident went on the track to permit a sprinkler to pass, he was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in going on the track.

Action by Catherine Kramm, as administratrix of the estate of Philip Kramm, deceased, against the Stockton Electric Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, dismissing the action on a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's case, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Reversed.

Jacob & Flack, for appellant. A. L. Levinsky and Budd & Thompson, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for personal injury to plaintiff's intestate resulting in his death. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and plaintiff appeals from this order and from the judgment of nonsuit and dismissal of the action. The complaint alleged that defendant did carelessly, negligently, and willfully "run one of its cars upon, knock down, and kill Philip Kramm." The defense is a denial of plaintiff's complaint, and avers contributory negligence on the part of deceased.

*For opinion on rehearing, see 86 Pac. 903.

There are certain well-established rules governing appellate courts in reviewing the action of trial courts in granting nonsuits which may be stated at the outset. The motion for nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence and every inference of fact that can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon such motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. Goldstone v. Merchants' Storage Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776. If there is any evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's action, the nonsuit should be denied, without passing upon the sufficiency of such evidence (Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408), and where there is a conflict in the evidence, some of which tends to sustain the plaintiff's case, a motion for a nonsuit should not be granted. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Fisher, 109 Cal. 566, 42 Pac. 154. Mr. Justice Temple, in Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651, said: "The rule is that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. * * * If but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it is a question of law for the court; but if one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury." In view of these well-established rules it is only necessary to look into the record sufficiently far to see whether there is any evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's cause of action. We have nothing to do with the question of the credibility of the witnesses, nor with testimony tending to create a conflict, nor with any apparent disagreement as to the facts among plaintiff's witnesses. The evidence, on this motion, must not only be viewed most strongly against defendant, but must be interpreted most favorably to plaintiff.

It appears that deceased was engaged in the work of spreading gravel on California street, in McCloud's addition to the city of Stockton. Witness Looper was employed as a driver of a four-horse sprinkling wagon being used to sprinkle the gravel on this street where deceased was at work. California street runs in a northerly direction (bearing westerly), at a curve of about 630 feet south of the place where the accident happened. There is a clear view of the track for this distance and from the point where the street makes the curve. Looper came along with his sprinkling wagon and passed deceased as he drove north. Reaching the end of the gravel, he turned his team back south, sprinkling as he went, and as he approached deceased the latter "stepped back west on the street car track," as he had done before, to let Looper pass, who, as he got about opposite deceased, had some conversation with him as to the quantity of water required on the gravel, his team moving and the water running from the sprinkler as they talked. At this time deceased stood facing northeast, with his back towards the south and towards the approaching car. Looper testified: "and, of course, I was talking to him about the amount of water, and all at once—I was not—my eye was turned to him—turned a little west, talking to him; and all at once I felt my line jerk, you know, and my wagon moved and my horses went pretty fast, you know—started up, you know. I could tell from my lines, you know, that my horses had shied. I throwed my eyes up; I seen the street car coming and my horses had kind of shied to the east. * * * I seen the car approaching. I just turned to him and said, 'Look out there!' 'Look out there!' I says, 'for the car, old boy,' and turned to my team again, and was drawing my team back straight. They kept moving along, but I straightened my team back on the gravel again and turned my head to see the old man—what had become of him. I looked kind of back for he had stepped in. As a matter of fact, I thought he would step in towards my wagon, as he was standing on that there rail. I thought he had stepped between my wagon, and I turned my head to see what had become of the old man. I knew he was in a pretty dangerous place. Of course, I seen his hat then, just behind the car. I stopped my team then. The car was stopped. His hat was just behind the car. * * * I saw the motorman and seen the old man lying under the car—the car wheel." Looper testified that his wagon was about four feet from the east track; that the water was running in full force on the gravel and made a little noise; that his "team was moving through the rocks or gravel as the car approached and as the water ran"; that when he "first noticed the car it was about 60 feet away from" him; that it "was coming pretty rapidly—pretty fast"; that he had seen the cars running on that line for a number of years, and he "thought at the time that the car was running at least 15 miles an hour." He testified that he stepped the distance from the point where deceased was struck by the car to the point to which his body had been carried by the car, and found it 15 or 17 feet. He "stepped it after the car had been moved away from there, and they had taken the old man away and the track was clear." He also testified that he heard no bell ring and heard no alarm, and that he heard no "one call out as the car approached, or give any alarm." Deceased was 57 years old, with good hearing and good eyesight; "a fleshy, heavy-set man" and "probably weighed 180, may be 200 pounds."

Witness Barnhart, a teacher in the public schools, resided on a lot west of California street and fronting on the railroad track where deceased met his death. He testified that he saw the car going north on the street at a point marked "G" on the map in evidence, which was about 180 feet from the point where the accident occurred. "The bell rang just then." Witness had come out of the cellar of his house to where he had gone for a can of oil. He testified: "I stooped and picked up the can and started up into the house, walking along the east side of the house, walking south. I had taken a couple of steps when I glanced again towards California street, and I saw the car apparently in the act of passing a man. There was just a streak of daylight that you could see between them. * * * I presumed the car would pass the man, but to my surprise the car hit him, struck him; and also at the same time my glance rested upon the car, it naturally—I saw standing where I did, I saw the motorman just in the act of putting on the brake. I watched the car for an instant * * * I watched the car until it came to standstill, which it seemed to do within a short distance —I suppose, its own length." He was asked if he saw the motorman as he looked at the car the last time and answered that he did. "A. The motorman was in the act of putting on the brake. Q. In what position was the brake lever at that time? A. Straight up and down—perpendicular. Q. Perpendicular; and he was in the act— A. Of pulling back on it. Q. What is that? A. He was in the act of pulling back on the brake. Q. When he was in the act of pulling back on the brake, as you have stated, how far from the car was this man? A. Well, it was at this time I expected the car to pass the man, and it was just as I said—a streak of daylight between the car and the man." He testified that at the point "G" where he first saw the car the gong gave a single stroke, and that the car bell did not ring after that until the car struck deceased, and of this he said he was positive. He stated that the car was running at the rate not less than 12 miles an hour, and did not appreciably slacken its speed from the time he first saw it and when he last saw it.

Mrs. Barrett testified: "The first I heard was the slowing down of the car and the applying of the brakes against the wheels. I heard an exclamation 'Oh!' almost the same time, as near, I would say, as you can make two sounds together. The applying of the brakes, as I would describe it, was a kind of grating sound, the brakes against the wheels." Witness assisted in getting deceased from under the car. She also testified that she heard no bell being rung just before she heard the grinding of the brakes. Mrs. Rosa Tulan was with Mrs. Barrett and testified to the same facts as did the latter, except that she took no part in removing the body from under the car.

The motorman who operated the car the morning of the accident testified: That he saw Mr. Kramm when he rounded the curve on California street talking to Mr. Looper on the water wagon (this curve was 630 feet south); that after he left the curve he saw Kramm start to back across the track as he rang his bell; that he was on the track all the time thereafter until the car struck him; that he had previously seen Kramm there and knew he was at work on the street spreading gravel. "Q. Did he, Kramm, seem to notice you when you rang the bell? A. Well, I could not say, the man backed across the track, started to back across the track and stopped. I could not say positively whether he noticed me or not. I did not see him look at me or look at the car. * * * Q. Did he, Kramm, seem to notice you when you rang the bell? A. I don't know. He seemed to me to be deaf." There was evidence tending to show that the motorman used the brake, and did not resort to what is known as the "reverse," the latter expedient being used for stopping quickly, and that the car might have been stopped going at the speed testified to within 12 or 15 feet. The motorman testified that he was within 10 or 12 feet of Kramm when he noticed that he stopped on the track, and he shouted to him and rang the bell, threw off the current, and applied his brakes, and he thought the car was running at about 8 miles an hour. The evidence was that deceased was injured in a way to show that the car struck him with considerable force, ran over his body, and dragged him "15 or 17 feet," and that he was taken out from "under the west front wheel." The motorman testified that the reason he did not put down the brakes sooner was that he thought Kramm would continue backing off and would get out of the way.

To our minds it is quite obvious that there was sufficient evidence in support of plaintiff's case to require that it be passed upon by the jury. It is contended, upon the authority of Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company, 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, that the court was justified in taking the case away from the jury. And it is claimed that this case modifies, if it does not overrule, the case of Harrington v. Los Angeles Railway Company, 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85. The learned trial judge seems to have taken that view. The facts in the Green Case are in no wise similar to the facts here, and the principles governing that case are not necessarily applicable. There the question related to the conduct of the deceased in crossing in front of a steam railway train and at a railroad crossing. The deceased approached the track of defendant on foot and by daylight, at a point from which it was plainly visible for a distance of 800 feet to the eastward, beyond which it made a curve north. When she was 30 feet distant from the track, she was seen to look towards the east and then immediately advance in a northwesterly direction along the path which crossed the track at an angle of 30 degrees. When she looked to the east, the train had not rounded the curve and was out of view, "for she advanced slowly along the path, without again looking up, and when in the act of stepping on the track was struck by the locomotive and killed." It was held that she was guilty of culpable negligence, directly contributing to the fatal result. The court quoted approvingly from Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 230, 53 Pac. 651, where the court said: "The railroad track of a steam railway must itself be regarded as a sign of danger, and one intending to cross must avail himself of every opportunity to look and listen for approaching trains. What he must do in such a case must depend upon circumstances. If the view of the track is obstructed, he should take greater pains to listen. If, taking these precautions, he would have seen or heard the approaching train, the very fact of injury will raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions." In applying the principles relating to negligence, contributory or otherwise, the courts recognize a distinction between cases of injuries by street railroads and cases of injuries by "ordinary steam railroads running through the country at comparatively long intervals of time." It was said in Schneider v. Market Street Railway Company, 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734: "In either case 'ordinary prudence' is required on the part of persons crossing the track; but the question of what is ordinary prudence is widely different in the two cases." It will be noted that the motorman saw the deceased on the track engaged in talking with Looper. He must have known that the sprinkling wagon was in motion and that the water was escaping from the sprinkler, and that the moving of the wagon wheels in the gravel and the escaping water would make some noise. Deceased was standing with his back towards the car, which fact the motorman noticed, and gave no evidence of observing its approach, except that he stepped back as though to get off the track; but it is quite evident from Looper's testimony that neither he nor deceased noticed the approach of the car until it was so near as to make escape difficult, if indeed possible, at the speeu the car was moving. When Looper called to deceased to look out, he could not have stepped towards the wagon and there escaped, for the evidence was that the projecting steps of the car and the hubs of the wagon wheels would probably have caught him. He had not time to escape behind the wagon, where the water was rushing from the sprinkler, nor in front of the four horses attached to the wagon. Possibly an active young man with his faculties instantaneously alert and serving him could have jumped back and escaped. But the law does not require that a person thus endangered shall exercise every possible means of escape or suffer the consequences. There was evidence that the motorman did not apply his brake until the very instant of the collision, and there was evidence that no bell was rung or warning given shortly before the car struck the deceased. It is said in Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85: "It must be remembereu that a person in great peril, where immediate action is necessary to avoid it, is not required to exercise all that presence of mind and carefulness, which are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary cicumstances. The reasonableness of his effort to escape the injury after discovery of the danger was a question for the jury, to be determined by them in view of all the circumstances shown by the evidence." This we believe to be a correct statement of the law. Similar views were expressed by the court in Schneider v. Market Street Ry. Co., supra: "If the plaintiff is suddenly put into peril, without having sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, he is excusable for omitting some precautions or in making an unwise choice under this disturbing influence, although if his mind had been clear he ought to have done otherwise."

The deceased may have been guilty of negligence, but defendant cannot for that reason excuse itself if by the exercise of due care its agent could have avoided the accident after discovering the negligent party in his perilous position. Swain v. Fourteenth St. Railway Co., 93 Cal. 179, 28 Pac. 829; Lee v. Market Street Railway Co., 135 Cal. 293, 67 Pac. 765. There was evidence, whether true or untrue it is not our province to judge, that the motorman saw deceased in his perilous position when far enough away from him to have stopped the car before reaching him, or at least to have so reduced its speed as to have caused less injury; and there is evidence, which we must receive, that the motorman did not attempt to check the momentum of his car until the very instant—one witness testified simultaneously—the car struck the deceased. Clearly, under the circumstances shown, the facts ought to have gone to the jury.

Nor can defendant be heard to complain that deceased was standing upon the track. He had a right to be there, and, in the present case, his duty called him there. Shea v. B. V. R. R. Co., 44 Cal. 414; Swain v. Fourteentn Street Ry. Co., 93 Cal. 179, 28 Pac. 829.

Without further noticing the evidence or further comment, in our judgment the case should have gone to the jury, because, among other reasons, the jury as presumably "sensible and impartial" men might have decided that the deceased exercised ordinary care (Herbert v. S. P. Co., supra), or that the motorman "had the last clear opportunity to avoid the injury," in which case it was his duty to have done so. Esrey v. S. P. Co., 103 Cal. 541, 37 Pac. 500; Lee v. Market Street Ry. Co., supra.

The judgment of nonsuit and dismissal is reversed.

3 Cal. App. 437

WARD et al. v. EASTWOOD et al.

1. MINES AND MINERALS — CONTRACT — CONSTRUCTION—PAYMENT.

Where plaintiffs contracted to mine certain ore at $2.50 per ton, for ore deposited in the chutes ready for hoisting by defendants, a provision of the agreement that payment should be made on the 10th of the month for the ore hoisted the preceding month, the quantity of which was to be ascertained from the number of tons hoisted, did not preclude plaintiffs from recovering for ore mined and deposited in the chutes, which defendants failed to hoist because of the rise of water in the mine.

2. SAME—UNFORESEEN OCCURRENCES.

Where certain miners agreed to mine ore in defendants' mine and place the same in the chutes ready for hoisting at a certain price per ton, without assuming any risks concerning defendants' ability to keep water out of the mine, as they had agreed to do, the fact that water arose in the mine by reason of unusual rains, which prevented defendants from hoisting ore mined by plaintiffs and placed in the chutes, was no defense to plaintiffs' action for the price of mining such ore.

3. APPEAL—REVERSAL—IMMATERIAL FINDINGS.

Immaterial findings, which do not affect the correctness of the judgment, though erroneous, are not ground for reversal.

4. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR.

Failure of the court to find on all the material issues is not prejudicial error, where the court finds on an issue which was determinative of the judgment, and where findings in favor of appellant on other issues would not justify a contrary judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by James Ward and others against A. B. Eastwood and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Tabor & Tabor, for appellants. Lardner & Barnes and W. H. Slade, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to recover on a contract for mining 200 tons of ore and quartz rock in defendants' mine. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and plaintiffs had judgment for $487, being the amount prayed for, less $13 for supplies furnished plaintiffs by defendants. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The contract was oral, and, as was alleged in the complaint, was that plaintiffs agreed to work for defendants, as miners, in the Hathaway mine, Nevada county, "in breaking down and abstracting ore and quartz rock in said mine, ready for hoisting for the agreed price of two and $^{50}/_{100}$ per ton; and said defendants agreed on their part, to keep the said mine free from water so that plaintiffs could perform said labor, and to pay plaintiffs said sum of two and $^{50}/_{100}$ dollars for each ton of rock and ore so extracted and to pay said $2.50 per ton as fast as said rock was broken down and ready for hoisting." It was alleged "that plaintiffs began work on January 2, 1902, and continued work under said contract down to the 6th day of March, 1902, when they were driven out of said mine by water, the defendants having failed to keep said mine free from water." It is alleged that plaintiffs broke down and extracted ore in said time to the extent of 639½ tons, for which there became due to plaintiffs the sum of $1,598.75, no part of which has been paid except $1,098.75. Defendants answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that plaintiffs agreed to break down and mine out quartz rock at a certain level "and place the same in the chutes at said level at the agreed price of $1.25 per car"; that it was agreed that the ore thus mined in each calendar month should be paid for on or about the 10th day of the succeeding calendar month, "provided that the same had then been hoisted and milled, and not otherwise." Defendants averred that they did not employ any of the plaintiffs other than Emil Anderson and Henry Johnson, and that if plaintiffs, other than these two, were employed it was not by defendants, and that defendants had, prior to the commencement of the action, paid plaintiffs last above named in full for all ore broken down and placed in the chutes "which had been hoisted and milled, or which it was possible to hoist up from said level in said cars, or to measure and mill." Defendants averred that excessive rains during the months of January, February, and March, 1902, caused the 600-foot level on which plaintiffs were working to fill with water to such extent as to render it impossible to hoist cars therefrom, "and that no foresight or care on the part of defendants could have prevented the same," alleging that said level was flooded "by the act of God."

The court found the allegations of the complaint to be true and found against defendants as to their alleged understanding on the contract; and the court found that the ore was to be paid for when broken down and ready in the chutes to be hoisted, "that whether or not the mine became filled with water is no excuse for defendants in not paying the contract price for the ore delivered in the chutes," and that it was no excuse for not paying plaintiffs the contract price for ore delivered in the chutes that defendants "did everything in their power to keep the water out of the mine to the end that they might hoist the ore. Defendants challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings that defendants contracted with all the plaintiffs; that the contract was that defendants should pay for ore in the chutes, and not, as claimed by defendants, after it was hoisted, crushed and milled; that the ore unpaid for which was broken down and placed in the chutes ready for delivery was 200 tons. It is also claimed that the findings as to defendants' special defense arising out of the alleged excessive rainfall, and the flooding of the mine by an act of God, are not findings of fact, but are conclusions of law, and are contrary to the facts and against the law. It is further complained that the court erred in not finding specifically upon the facts set up by defendants as a special defense; i. e., the facts relating to the excessive rainfall as a reason for not keeping the mine free from water and for not hoisting the ore so that it could be milled and measured.

There is substantial agreement in the testimony of plaintiffs, all of whom were witnesses, that the understanding was that plaintiffs were to break the rock and place it in the chutes ready to be hoisted. They were to furnish their own material, powder, fuse, and candles, and defendants were to furnish the timber, keep the mine free from water, and to pay plaintiffs $2.50 per ton of ore. It was understood by plaintiffs that they were to be paid for the quartz produced during any calendar month, according to the prevailing custom, between the 10th and 15th of the succeeding calendar month. The amount of ore that was mined was ascertained by hoisting it in buckets, counting two buckets as a ton. Thus far there is no substantial conflict as to the agreement. Defendant Knoff, however, testified: "The ore was to be paid for after we hoisted it and cleaned up the mill." The testimony of plaintiffs was that they did not so understand the contract. It appears that plaintiffs were paid in February for the ore mined and hoisted in January, and no question then arose as to ore not hoisted. In March payment was made only for ore hoisted in February, and as the level on which plaintiffs had been working was under water, and they had been compelled to quit work, they demanded payment for the remaining unhoisted ore, some of which was mined in February and some in March. This was refused, and on March 22d they commenced the action. We do not think, because payment was to be made on the 10th of the month for the ore hoisted the preceding month, the quantity of which was to be ascertained from the number of tons hoisted, that it would follow that plaintiffs were to receive no pay unless the ore was hoisted. They had nothing to do with that part of the work and had no control over it. They consented to receive pay in the manner testified to by them, but, according to their testimony, they never agreed that they should receive no pay unless the ore was hoisted, crushed, and milled, as contended by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs' contract was performed on their part when they placed the ore in the chutes. The time and manner of payment and the means adopted to measure the ore did not affect the value of plaintiffs' services to defendant or plaintiffs' right to compensation therefor at the contract price.

Nor can we see that defendants are excused from paying for the ore that was mined and unhoisted because defendants were unable with their facilities to keep the water out of the mine. The only means adopted was by a hoisting bucket, and there is evidence tending to show that even this inadequate means was not used to the best advantage, and there was also evidence tending to show that much more ore could have been hoisted than was taken out before the water rose to the 600-foot level where plaintiffs were working. But, aside from these considerations, defendants were no more excused by the happening of unusual rains than they would have been had fire destroyed their mill and hoisting works, or than if an earthquake had caused the shaft to collapse and had made further hoisting impossible. Unless plaintiffs took these risks, which is contrary to the evidence, agreeing that they were to be paid only for ore to be hoisted and milled, the inability of defendants to avail themselves of plaintiffs' labor should not deprive plaintiffs of the compensation justly due them. It was not necessary for the court to find specifically upon the issue as to the alleged unavoidable cause which prevented defendants from hoisting the ore. Holding, as we do, that plaintiffs were entitled to pay for the ore delivered in the chutes, it was immaterial what cause prevented defendants from hoisting and milling it. If defendants, through their own fault or neglect, failed to hoist the ore, it could not for a moment be claimed that they would be excused from paying for it. If they were prevented from hoisting the ore through some unavoidable cause, which did not destroy the ore, but left it where plaintiffs had agreed to place it, the rights of plaintiffs would be unaffected, inasmuch as they had fully complied with their part of the contract, and hence it would be immaterial what the cause might be. Immaterial findings, which do not affect the correctness of the judgment, though erroneous, are not ground for reversal. Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 665, 55 Pac. 683. Failure to find upon all the material issues is not prejudicial error, where the court finds upon an issue which is determinative of the judgment, and where findings in favor of appellant upon other issues would not justify a contrary judgment. Windhans v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557. It is true that there was an understanding that the ore was to be measured by the hoisting bucket—two buckets to the ton—and payment was to be made upon this measurement at the time agreed upon. But as this means of measurement was no longer available, the ore being under water, plaintiffs had the right to show by other means the quantity of ore remaining in the chutes when they were forced to quit work. They had not agreed to do any given amount of work or continue for any stated time. They were to receive pay for the ore mined and placed in the chutes, and could cease work at any time. The testimony as to the quantity of ore remaining in the chutes is in conflict. Plaintiffs estimated it by arriving at the cubic contents of the ore piles, of which 22 cubic feet made one ton. They also estimated the amount somewhat from the day's work of each man, and what the previous work had shown was an average day's work per man. Defendants controverted this testimony by evidence tending to show that plaintiffs' estimate was too great. The court, however, accepted the testimony of plaintiffs, and with its conclusions we cannot interfere.

There was evidence that all the plaintiffs were equal partners in the net proceeds, each man to be paid according to the time he worked, less his share of the expenses. A statement was handed in to the defendants showing the amount due each, and by agreement among the plaintiffs each was to be paid separately, and he was so paid. There was no demurrer for misjoinder of parties plaintiff. There was evidence to support the finding that defendants recognized all of the plaintiffs as working under the contract alleged in the complaint.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BROWN v. YARRAHAM GOLD MIN. CO. et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 2, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 28, 1906.)

1. BOUNDARIES—ASCERTAINMENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

On an issue as to the location of the boundary line between two sections, it cannot be assumed that a line was not run on the ground by the surveyor who surveyed the township as described in his field notes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, §§ 147, 148.]

2. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS BY COURT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Findings of the court on an issue as to the location of a boundary line, based on conflicting evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

3. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR—CORRECT RESULT.

Where, in a suit for possession of a mining claim and for damages for the removal of ore by defendant, judgment was rendered against defendant on the theory that such amount was due from him under a contract between himself and plaintiff relative to the claim, though the contract did not warrant the judgment, defendant could not complain, where it appeared that plaintiff was entitled to such sum as damages for the removal of ore under any rule that could be adopted as to the measure of damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by William H. Brown against the Yarraham Gold Mining Company and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Geo. J. Leovy and Wm. Chambers, for appellants. C. F. Holland and Powers & Holland, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The suit is brought for the recovery of the mining claim known as the "Bryan Gold Mine," described in the complaint as situate in section 24, township 29 S., range 34 E., M. D. M., with damages, etc., and for an injunction. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Section 24 is government land, unappropriated, unless by the plaintiff's claim. Section 13, adjoining it on the north, has been patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, from which, under a contract of sale, the corporation defendant has derived a possessory title. The principal question in the case is as to the location of the boundary between the two sections named. According to the location claimed by the plaintiff, this line is to the north of the mine. According to the claim of the defendants, it is south of the mine, and about half a mile south of the location claimed by the plaintiff. The court adopted the plaintiff's location and found the mine to be in section 24.

The defendants claim that this finding is not supported by the evidence; but we are of the opinion that this contention is without merit. The township in question was surveyed by Carlton in the year 1876. The township next to the east (township 29 S., range 35 E.) had been previously surveyed and subdivided by Washburn in the year 1854, and again, presumably to correct errors, in the year 1855. On the line between these two townships no monuments have been found. But in the township in question (township 29 S., range 34 E.) monuments have been found at the common corner of sections 14, 15, 22, and 23, and at the corner of sections 3, 4, 33, and 34, and also at the quarter section corner between sections 3 and 4 and at the southwest corner of the township. These all connect and agree with the location of the northeast corner of section 24, or southeast corner of section 13, as claimed by the plaintiff and found by the court. The southeast corner of the township, as described in the field notes of Carlton, being 17.30 chains north of the intersection of Cottonwood creek with the meridian line, also agrees with this location, as is the case also with the corner of sections 3, 4, 9, and 10, of township 30 S., range 35 E., as shown by Carlton's field notes. These facts would seem to fix the location of the disputed corner of sections 13, 24, 19, and 18, beyond controversy, and, notwithstanding the conflicting facts developed by the defendants, would seem to be sufficient to support the finding.

It is claimed, however, by the appellants that by certain monuments and natural objects described in Washburn's field notes of township 29 S., range 35 E., and now found upon the ground, the true location of the disputed corner and line is indicated to be about half a mile to the south of the corner adopted by the court. But, assuming this to be the case (which, however, is not clear), we are of the opinion that the survey of the township in question by Carlton must control, and that the problem is simply to determine how the lines were run by him, and that according to his survey the location of the disputed line cannot be otherwise than as found by the court. The result is, assuming the subdivisions of the adjoining township 25 S., range 35 E., to be as claimed by the appellants, that the surveys of the two townships would not correspond, and that along the dividing line there would be two several sets of corners corresponding in the literal description. But this, we understand, is by no means an uncommon occurrence.

Another contention of appellants' counsel is that the line between sections 13 and 24, though described in Carlton's field notes as running nearly due east from the northwest corner of section 24, is to be construed as running to a point about half a mile south of the intersection of the easterly line with the meridian. But this construction, if otherwise admissible, would be admissible only upon the assumption that the line was not run on the ground by Carlton as described in his field notes; and this cannot be assumed. Assuming the true location of the southwest corner of section 18 in the adjoining township (range 35 E.) to be as claimed by the appellants, the only conclusion we could draw would be that Carlton mistook the quarter section corner on the west line of that section for the section corner. But, as it is with Carlton's survey of the township in question only that we are concerned, this would be immaterial. On the whole, the most that can be claimed in favor of the appellants is that the evidence of the location is conflicting; and it follows that the finding of the court cannot be disturbed.

Objection is also made by the appellants to the personal judgment against the defendants for damages to the mine, as to which it is claimed that the finding is not sustained by the evidence. There is, however, sufficient evidence to sustain the finding.

Objection is also made to the personal judgment against Hamman for $300, being one-fourth of the gold extracted from the mine. But this objection, also, we think, is untenable. From the allegations of the complaint and the findings, it appears that possession of the mine was taken by the defendants under a contract of sale made by the plaintiff to the defendant Hamman of date May 13, 1902, which was abandoned November 18th of the same year. Afterwards, on May 19, 1903, the plaintiff in the meantime having re-entered, the defendants forcibly entered and ousted him, and it is found by the court that between August 1, 1902, and the same date of the following year, defendants extracted from the mine gold of the amount and value of $1,200, of which, according to the contract between plaintiff and defendant Hamman, the former was entitled to 25 per cent., which is the amount adjudged, $300. There may be a question here as to the liability of the defendant Hamman under the contract for one-fourth of the gold extracted after the resumption of possession by the plaintiff. But upon the facts found, and in the absence of anything appearing to reduce the amount, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover as damages the whole sum of $1,200; and, under any rule as to the measure of damages that might be adopted, the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff, upon the facts shown by the evidence, could hardly have been less than $300. The appellants, therefore, are not in a position to complain.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CASTILE.

1. ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction of robbery, where it appeared that defendant and his codefendant were in the vicinity at the time of the crime, that they had in their possession many articles stolen, and that the clothing worn by the robbers and the size and appearance of the men completely identified defendant.

2. CRIMINAL LAW — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

There is no error in refusing requested instructions substantially covered by those given.

3. ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a prosecution for robbery, evidence as to property taken from prosecutor by the robber and found in defendant's possession was admissible for purposes of identification, though not specified in the information.

4. CRIMINAL LAW — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — REQUEST—NECESSITY.

No request having been made for an order to limit the evidence to its legitimate purpose, defendant could not complain on appeal of the absence of such an order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Silas Castile was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Johnstone Jones and H. H. Appel, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and from the judgment thereon, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals.

The principal contention of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. An examination of the record discloses that the robbery was perpetrated by two men answering the description of the defendant and his brother Jacob. That defendant and his brother were in the vicinity of the robbery when it occurred is unquestioned. That they had in their possession when arrested, or had sold between the date of the robbery and the arrest, many articles taken from Ellis, who was robbed, is established. The clothing worn by the robbers and the size and appearance of the men engaged in the robbery so completely identifies the defendant with such robbery that the jury could not well have found otherwise.

We perceive no error in the admission of evidence with reference to the personal property of Ellis, taken from him by the robbers and found in defendant's possession afterwards, notwithstanding such property was not specified in the information. This evidence was admissible for the purposes of identification. No request was made at the trial for an order to limit the evidence to its legitimate purpose, and on appeal, in the absence of such request, defendant will not be heard to complain. People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 306, 64 Pac. 472. Notwithstanding the absence of such request, however, the court did, by an appropriate charge, instruct the jury that such testimony was received for the purpose of identification only. No abuse of discretion is apparent in permitting a leading question to the witness Beja, and his evidence was proper in rebuttal.

The instruction refused, and on account of which refusal defendant complains, was substantially given by the court in other instructions, and there was no error in such refusal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CASTILE.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 7, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1906.)

1. ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a prosecution for robbery, it was proper to admit evidence as to property found in defendant's possession and taken from prosecutor at the time of the robbery for the purpose of identifying defendant, though the property was not specified in the complaint as taken from prosecutor.

2. SAME — INSTRUCTIONS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction that, if the property in question was not the property mentioned in the information and taken from prosecutor at the time and place alleged, such taking might be considered for the purpose of identification, but would not warrant a conviction, properly limited the effect of the evidence.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

There is no error in refusing an instruction substantially covered by one given.

4. SAME—FURTHER INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

On a prosecution for robbery, a charge defining the crime in the general terms of the statute is sufficient, in the absence of a request for an instruction more particularly charging the elements of the offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Jacob Castile was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Johnstone Jones and H. H. Appel, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, alleged to have been committed by him and his codefendant, Silas Castile, upon one Morris Ellis. From the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals.

In this case, as in the Case of Silas Castile, 86 Pac. 745, the contention of the appellant is that the judgment and order should be reversed on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence in support of the judgment. The chain of facts and circumstances relied upon to establish the identity of the person, each material fact and circumstance so relied upon, was so established from the evidence as to justify the verdict of the jury. The court did not err in admitting evidence over the objection of defendant with reference to certain looking glasses, alarm clock, and piece of buckskin found in possession of the defendant and which witnesses testified were taken from Ellis at the time of the robbery. This evidence was admissible for the purpose of identifying the defendant, and, while they were not specified in the complaint as being articles so taken from him, evidence was properly received in relation thereto as tending to establish identification of the defendant with such robbery.

The court charged the jury properly that, if they found that such property was taken from Ellis, it could not find defendant guilty for the taking of such looking glasses and clock, yet it might consider the taking of the same for the purposes of identification, if they believed from the evidence that said looking glasses and clock were with the property mentioned in the information and taken from said Ellis at the time and place alleged in the information. This instruction properly limited the evidence to the purpose for which it was legitimately received. The instruction tendered by the defendant and refused was given, in substance, by the court in another instruction, which was more favorable to defendant than the instruction so refused.

The charge of the court defining the crime was in the general terms of the statute. "If defendant deemed it essential to his protection to have them more particularly charged as to what would constitute the offense it was his duty to ask it. In the absence of such request the defendant will be deemed to have been satisfied with the charge as given, and the omission will not be held error." People v. Appleton, 120 Cal. 252, 52 Pac. 582.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

2. Same—Statutes—Construction.

Pen. Code, p. 581 (Act March 20, 1903; St. 1903, p. 289, c. 235), provides that no combination between two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of any trade dispute between employers and employés shall be deemed criminal, nor shall those engaged therein be indictable or otherwise punishable for the crime of conspiracy, if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime, nor shall any restraining order or injunction be issued with relation thereto, provided that nothing in the act shall be construed to authorize force or violence or threats thereof. Held, that such provision did not deprive the court of power to restrain a boycott of complainant's business during a strike by means of pickets and persons stationed in front of complainant's place of business bearing signs and transparencies derogatory to complainant.

3. Same—Injunction—Scope.

An injunction against a trade union and its members, restraining the boycotting of complainant's business, was objectionable in so far as it enjoined defendants from mere expression of opinion at any time or place as to complainant and its business, which expressions at most would only constitute a slander.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Suit by Golberg, Bowen & Co. against the Stablemen's Union, Local No. 8,760, and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Henry B. Lister, for appellants. Bush Finnell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action for injunction to restrain the defendants, who are members of the Stablemen's Union, Local No. 8,760, from doing certain alleged damaging acts to plaintiff, which acts are mostly connected with what is called a "boycott" of plaintiff's business by the defendants. A demurrer on the general ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also on some special grounds, was interposed by defendants. The demurrer was overruled, and, defendants declining to answer, judgment was rendered for plaintiff. From this judgment, defendants appeal.

We see no merits in the special grounds of demurrer, and do not deem it necessary to specially notice them. The main question is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The plaintiff was a corporation, and at the time mentioned in the complaint was engaged, at its places of business, "in selling groceries and general household goods to various patrons and customers with whom it had established business relations, and with the public in general, upon whose patronage and trade plaintiff depends for its existence." Its places of business were No. 432 Pine street, and No. 232 Sutter street, in the city and county of San Fransisco. It also had a place at No. 965 Sutter street which was used as a stable, in which the horses and vehicles used in carrying on its business were kept and cared for. It is averred that in September, 1904, defendants notified plaintiff at its place of business, No. 432 Pine street, that plaintiff must continue to pay certain wages to its employés at said stable, or defendants would order a strike and cause all of the union stablemen employed by plaintiff, of whom there were many, to quit plaintiff's employment. On or about October 3, 1904, plaintiff notified defendants that it would not comply with said demand, but would exercise the right to pay its said employés what employés in the same kind of work were receiving from their employers. It is further averred that thereupon, and on or about said October 3, 1904, "the said defendants entered into a combination, confederation, and conspiracy for the purpose of coercing plaintiff to subject the control of its business to the said Stablemen's Union, Local No. 8,760, and the members thereof, by inaugurating and declaring a boycott on the said business of said plaintiff, and thereupon and on the 3d day of October, 1904, in pursuance of said unlawful combination, confederation, and conspiracy, placed and continue to place, representatives or pickets in front of the places of business of plaintiff, carrying placards or transparencies which are false in fact, bearing the words and figures as follows, to wit: "Unfair firm; reduced wages of employés 50 cents per day. Please don't patronize." It is further averred "that subsequent to the 3d day of October, 1904, and since the said boycott so ordered as aforesaid by said Stablemen's Union, Local No. 8,760, the said Stablemen's Union and the members thereof have conspired, confederated, and combined among themselves and with other parties to the plaintiff unknown, and will continue to conspire, confederate, and combine among themselves and with other parties to the plaintiff unknown, to provide means and methods for impeding the plaintiff in the conduct and transaction of its aforesaid business to interfere with employés, not members of said union, employed by said plaintiff, who are engaged in a line of work other than that of stablemen, and to greatly impede and obstruct the plaintiff in carrying on its aforesaid business, and by threats and intimidations by reason of maintaining pickets or representatives in front of the said places of business of plaintiff, compel and force said employés engaged in other lines of work than that of stablemen to quit the services of plaintiff." It is further averred "that the defendants, in furtherance of their said combination, confederation, and conspiracy, have placed and continue to place in front of the aforesaid places of business of plaintiff said representatives or pickets, and that said representatives or pickets are for the purpose of not only inducing but intimidating the nonunion employés of plaintiff to quit its service, and are for the purpose of intimidating patrons and customers of plaintiff who may desire or attempt to do business with the said plaintiff." It is further averred that by means of said representatives and pickets placed in front of plaintiff's said places of business bearing the placards and transparencies above described, "many patrons and customers of said plaintiff have been and now are frightened and intimidated from entering the places of business of plaintiff." It is further averred "that the said pickets or representatives are still engaged in the acts herein complained of, and threaten to continue the commission of the acts and each of the said acts to the irreparable damage and injury of this plaintiff, and that by reason of and by consequence of the acts herein set forth, plaintiff has already been damaged in the sum of $500, and if the said acts still continue, and the said defendants threaten to continue the said acts as hereinbefore alleged, plaintiff will be irreparably damaged, and his business will be greatly injured, if not destroyed." It is further averred that defendants and each of them are financially irresponsible and unable to respond in damages to any judgment against them on account of the commission of the acts alleged to have been committed and threatened to be committed by them.

We think that the complaint clearly states facts sufficient to constitute the cause of action alleged. It is not necessary here to undertake to define the limits within which a number of persons conspiring for the purpose of injuring the business of another may legally do acts tending to accomplish that result. It is averred in the complaint that in the case at bar, and for the purpose above stated, and with intent to threaten and intimidate employés and patrons and customers of plaintiff, the said defendants do keep immediately in front of plaintiff's place of business, and threaten to so keep there, representatives and pickets bearing the placards and transparencies above set forth, and that by said means they have intimidated patrons and customers of plaintiff from entering said place of business, and will, if not restrained, continue to so intimidate the said patrons. It cannot be successfully contended that the said acts of defendants committed immediately in front of plaintiff's place of business as aforesaid, could not, in the nature of things, have had the effect of intimidating plaintiff's patrons, and, as it is averred that they did have that effect, the fact of such intimidation must, for the purposes of this case, be considered as established; and such acts, having such effect, undoubtedly interfered with and violated plaintiff's constitutional right to acquire, possess, defend, and enjoy property. In many cases cited in respondent's brief a "boycott" was enjoined without reference to the means used to carry it into effect, as, for instance, in Oxley Stave Co. v. Coopers', etc., Union (C. C.) 72 Fed. 695, it was held that "a boycott by the members of trades' unions or assemblies (which term in law implies a combination to inaugurate and maintain a general proscription of articles manufactered by the party against whom it is directed) is unlawful and may be enjoined by a court of equity." But there is no necessity to go that far in the case at bar. Here the alleged acts tended directly to intimidate customers, and did intimidate them. That in such a case the threatened acts will be enjoined has been frequently held. In Allis Chalmers Co. v. Reliable Lodge (C. C.) 111 Fed. 264, the court said:

"That a conspiracy existed among a number of these officers and members to stop and thereby injure the business of complainant by intimidation and violence is evident. * * * These being the facts in the case, the law is clear and emphatic. The jurisdiction being established, is there any doubt as to whether the court should, in this case, grant the temporary injunction prayed for? I am clear there is not. As now presented, the court must grant the writ in broad and unmistakable terms, commensurate with the exigencies of the situation, as shown by the facts and evidence upon this proceeding. To do so will work no hardship, nor will it even hamper the actions of any law-abiding person. Indeed, no one without purpose to commit an unlawful act could be affected thereby." In United States v. Haggerty (C. C.) 116 Fed. 510, the court said: "This court, however, has heretofore, upon repeated occasions, recognized the power of the court to issue injunctions in cases where there is a combination and conspiracy upon the part of any class of people to prevent them from interfering with the business of others." In Frank v. Herold (N. J. Ch.) 52 Atl. 152, the court said: "Now, then, I think it is quite clear from what I have said that these defendants had no right to use the means which are forbidden by the restrained order now brought in question to prevent these operatives from continuing to work for the complainants, and that in doing so they are inflicting an injury upon the complainants, in respect to their private rights, precisely the same as they would if they broke, interfered with, or clogged the engine that drove their machinery, and that for such injury the complainants are entitled to a legal remedy by action. Now, this being so, the next question is, what right have the complainants here in this court asking for the restraining power of the court? Why, the answer to this is two-fold: First, it is quite clear that the relief in damages to be recovered in an action at law is entirely inadequate. It is quite absurd to say that they can sue each of these persons, and recover damages against them in separate suits, for every little act which, in the aggregate tends to result in injury. And, in the second place, the injury is continuing and irreparable, and not capable of admeasurement according to legal principles. So that at law the remedy is entirely inadequate. It is, therefore, a clear case for the interposition of a court of equity to exercise its preventive remedy, and that is the particular sphere at this day of a court of equity, as contradistinguished from a court of law." There are many other cases to the same effect decided in England and in many of the American states. Appellants cite Davitt v. American Bakers' Union, 124 Cal. 99, 56 Pac. 775; but in that case it was merely held that the complaint was defective because it dealt wholly in "generalities, presumptions, and conclusions," and stated no "specific overt acts" done for the purpose of carrying out the alleged conspiracy. That case, therefore, does not apply to the case at bar, for here the specific acts are alleged.

Appellants make the bare statement, without argument, that "an injunction in this case is also specifically forbidden by Pen. Code, p. 581." The section of an act of the Legislature there referred to (Act March 20, 1903; St. 1903, c. 235, p. 289) is somewhat difficult of construction; but, in the first place, it cannot, in our opinion, be construed as undertaking to prohibit a court from enjoining the main wrongful acts charged in the complaint in this action, and, in the second place, if it could be so construed, it would to that extent be void, because violative of plaintiff's constitutional right to acquire, possess, enjoy and protect property.

It is contended by appellants that the judgment rendered in this case is too comprehensive, and enjoins them from doing some acts which are not within the averments of the complaint, or within the principle, even if conceded to be correct, upon which the court below based its conclusion. We think that this contention must be sustained, to the extent, at least, as is hereinafter stated. Some parts of the judgment seem to enjoin appellants from the mere expression of an opinion at any time or place as to plaintiff and its business, which would, at the worst, consist only of slander, which could not be reached in this form of action and seem to restrain them from doing other things which do not appear to be connected with or incidental to the main acts and threatened acts done at and in front of plaintiff's said places of business as above stated. The judgment must therefore be modified, so as to eliminate those objectionable parts.

The judgment, after the first paragraph thereof, is amended and modified, so as to read as follows: "Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the Stablemen's Union, Local No. 8,760, of San Francisco, T. F. Finn, T. J. White, and all and each of the defendants herein, and each of their officers, members, agents, clerks, attorneys, and servants, be, and they are hereby, enjoined and restrained from interfering with, or harassing, or obstructing plaintiff in the conduct of its business at any of its said places of business No. 432 Pine street, No. 232 Sutter street, and No. 965 Sutter street, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, by causing any agent or agents, representative or representatives, or any picket or pickets, or any person or persons, to be stationed in front of or in the immediate vicinity of said places of business, with a placard of transparency having on it the words and figures as alleged in the complaint herein, or any placard or transparency (having words or figures) of similar import, and from, at said places of business, or in front thereof, or in the immediate vicinity thereof, by means of pickets or transparencies, or otherwise, threatening or intimidating any person or persons transacting or desiring to transact business with said plaintiff, or being employed at said place or places by the plaintiff." And as thus amended and modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—UNIFORMITY—PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

Pen. Code, § 272 (St. 1905, p. 759, c. 568), provides that any person having the care, custody, or control of any child under 16 years of age, who exhibits, uses, or employs, or in any manner, or under any pretense, sells, apprentices, gives away, lets out, or disposes of any such child to any person, for or in any business, exhibition, or vocation, injurious to the health or dangerous to his life or limb, or for the vocation, occupation, service, or purpose of singing or playing on musical instruments, rope or wire walking, etc., shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; but that the act shall not prevent the employment of such child as a singer or musician in any church, school, or academy, etc. Held, that such act was not unconstitutional for nonuniformity, in that it discriminated against children under 16 years of age, in favor of those over such age.

2. SAME.

Such section was also not objectionable as making an unfair discrimination in favor of the employment of children as singers or musicians in churches, schools, or academies.

In Bank. Habeas corpus on application of Henry Weber. Writ denied.

W. F. Williamson, for petitioner. W. H. Langdon, Dist. Atty., and R. W. Harrison, Asst. Dist. Atty. (Jno. M. Ehleman, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The petitioner was arrested and confined for an alleged violation of section 273 of the Penal Code. The return shows that he is in custody upon two separate complaints relating to different children. Each complaint charges that the defendant did willfully and unlawfully take, receive, hire, employ, and use a certain male child, naming him, under the age of 16 years, in the business of scaling the boilers of a steamer, the said business being then and there dangerous to the life and limb of said child. The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is based upon the proposition that the law under which the complaint was made is unconstitutional and void. Section 273 refers to the preceding section 272, and it is necessary to state the substance, at least, of both sections.

Section 272, so far as material, is as follows: "Any person * * * having the care, custody, or control of any child under the age of sixteen years, who exhibits, uses, or employs, or in any manner, or under any pretense, sells, apprentices, gives away, lets out, or disposes of any such child to any person, * * * for or in any business, exhibition, or vocation, injurious to the health or dangerous to the life or limb of such child, or in or for the vocation, occupation, service, or purpose of singing, playing on musical instruments, rope or wire walking, dancing, begging, or peddling, or as a gymnast, acrobat, contortionist, or rider, in any place whatsoever, or for or in any obscene, indecent or immoral purpose, exhibition, or practice whatsoever, or for or in any mendicant or wandering business whatsoever, or who causes, procures, or encourages such child to engage therein, is guilty of a misdemeanor. * * * Nothing in this section contained applies to or affects the employment or use of any such child, as a singer or musician in any church, school, or academy, or the teaching or learning of the science or practice of music; or the employment of any child as a musician at any concert or any other musical entertainment, on the written consent of the mayor of the city or president of the board of trustees of the city or town where such concert or entertainment takes place." St. 1905, p. 759, c. 568.

Section 273 is as follows: "Every person who takes, receives, hires, employs, uses, exhibits, or has in custody, any child under the age, and for any of the purposes mentioned in the preceeding section, is guilty of a like offense, and punishable by a like punishment as therein provided." St. 1905, p. 759, c. 568.

The contention of the petitioner is that these provisions contain an arbitrary and unreasonable classification, and, consequently, are not of uniform operation, and that the act constitutes a special law for the punishment of crimes, where a general law could be made applicable. It is said that only a certain portion of the minor children of the state are affected by the act, namely, those who are under 16 years of age, and that this is an arbitrary discrimination between those who are over that age and those who are under that age; that any child over the age may enjoy his natural privilege of working for his own support as he pleases, while those under that age are prohibited therefrom. There is no sound reason for any such criticism. The same reasoning might be applied to a large number of laws which are universally conceded to be valid and constitutional. The law providing that a male person under 21 years of age is a minor, subject to the legal disabilities of minority, might be rendered unconstitutional by the same process of reasoning. It is competent for the Legislature to provide regulations for the protection of children of immature years. The growth of a child is gradual and the age of maturity varies with different children. It is impossible for any person to fix the exact time when a child is capable of protecting itself. The legislative judgment in regard to the proper age at which such regulations shall become applicable to the child cannot be interfered with by the courts.

It is also stated that the law makes an unfair discrimination by allowing the employment of children as singers or musicians in churches, schools, or academies. The ground of this objection is that such employment, so far as the court can see, may be as injurious to the health or morals, or as dangerous to the life or limb of the child as those which are prohibited in the law, and that no prohibition is lawful under the Constitution unless it extends to all employments which are equally injurious. In matters of this kind the Legislature has large discretion. It must determine the degree of injury to health or morals, which the different kinds of employment inflict upon the child, and the corresponding necessity for protecting the child from the effects thereof, and, unless its decision in that regard is manifestly unreasonable, there is no ground for judicial interference. We do not think the law in question so unreasonable as to require us to hold it unconstitutional.

The petition is denied, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the officer.

JOHNSON v. LEVY.

(Court of Appeal. Third District, California. May 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1906.)

1. Sales—Bill of Sale—Property Sold.

The bill of sale given by the lessee of a livery stable to the lessor, reciting that the former sells to the latter all his right, title, and interest to and in "the following described personal property," then after the words "to wit" enumerating the property sold, after which are the words, "and all and every kind of property of every name and nature now used in conducting the dray and livery business," transfers only the personalty used in the business, and not the lease.

2. Damages—Evidence—Certainty.

Testimony consisting merely of a guess or reasons for a guess, unsupported by data, and on information derived from others of the most general and indefinite character, is insufficient to support a finding as to damages.

3. Same — Withholding Real Estate — Profits of Business.

Damages for the wrongful withholding of real property leased for a livery business cannot include profits which might have accrued from the business, could plaintiff have procured teams in lieu of those he had surrendered with which to conduct it; defendant having in no way interfered with plaintiff as regards teams.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by C. E. Johnson against A. Levy. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. F. Farraher, for appellant. Coburn & Collier, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This action involves the right to the possession of certain real property in Dunsmuir, known as the "Lee Livery Stable." The court rendered judgment for plaintiff, and awarded him $300 damages, together with $60 per month as the rental value of the premises during the period of detention, and defendant appeals.

The court found on all of the issues, and the facts gleaned from such findings may be summarized as follows: The owner of the premises leased the same to one Beem for the term of three years, and the latter, about seven months later, assigned the lease to plaintiff, who at the same time purchased certain personal property, consisting of horses, buggies, wagons, harness, robes, blacksmith tools, and stock in and about the stable, from his assignor. At the time of such assignment and sale defendant held a chattel mortgage on the personal property sold, to secure a note for $600, with interest thereon amounting to $50. The verbal terms of the agreement of assignment and sale were to the effect that plaintiff was to execute and deliver to defendant a note for the sum of $650, secured by sureties, pay $150 in cash, and the balance of $1,500, as provided in a written agreement to be entered into between plaintiff and defendant. Pursuant to the advice of the attorney who prepared the papers, the bill of sale of the personal property was made to defendant, instead of plaintiff, and the other terms of the verbal agreement were carried out. Three days after the execution of the bill of sale, secured note, and agreement, Beem executed and delivered a written assignment of his lease to plaintiff. Plaintiff was placed in possession of the stable and personal property, and remained in possession thereof until the following spring, when he surrendered possession of the personal property to defendant, but refused to surrender the leasehold interest, and expressly agreed with defendant that the latter might keep the personal property surrendered in the stable for one day only. The defendant forcibly took and retained possession of the stable, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $300, and the further sum of $60 per month, the rental value of the premises during the time defendant so retained possession. This appeal is from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The principal findings assailed as unsupported by the evidence are those relating to the cash payment and to damages and rental value, and the findings resting on the construction of the written instruments executed between Beem and defendant, and plaintiff and defendant. The sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that Beem placed plaintiff in possession and assigned the lease to him is also disputed. All other findings are unchallenged and therefore we must accept them as true. We think the evidence is sufficient to sustain all the findings except those relating to damages. "A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." Civ. Code, § 1647. The circumstances and conditions surrounding and accompanying the execution of the several writings to be construed stand confessed through the unchallenged findings reciting them, and, in obedience to the rule of law above quoted, such circumstances must be considered in determining the intention of the parties and the meaning of the language used. "Several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together." Civ. Code, § 1642. "A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties, and such interpretation must be reasonable." Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1643.

The vital question to be answered by the construction of the several writings under consideration is whether plaintiff or defendant succeeded to the leasehold interest of Beem. The written assignment of Beem to plaintiff, indorsed on the lease, needs no construction, and it only remains to consider whether the leasehold interest passed to defendant by virtue of the instrument executed and delivered to him by Beem three days before such formal assignment to plaintiff was executed. By failing to challenge the findings in this regard, the appellant tacitly admits that there was a verbal agreement that the attorney suggested a bill of sale by Beem to defendant, instead of to plaintiff, and that the instrument under consideration was made pursuant to such verbal agreement and suggestion. This being true, it follows that the instrument was intended solely as a bill of sale of personal property, and this intention is very apparent on the face of the instrument itself. It is there recited that Beem sells, transfers, assigns, and delivers unto Levy "all his right, title, and interest to and into the following described personal property." Then after the words "to wit" is inserted an enumeration of the property sold. The clause "and all and every kind of property of every name and nature now used in conducting the dray and livery business known as the 'Beem Livery Stable,'" upon which the appellant relies, is found at the close of the descriptive paragraph, and is separated from the preceding words by a comma. It is patent from the context that this clause relates to and is qualified by the words "the following described personal property," and that there was no intention to transfer other property than the personalty used in conducting the business. The agreement between plaintiff and defendant is convincing on this point. In that instrument the words "all and every kind of property now used in the conducting of the dray, livery, and feed business of the Beem Livery Stable" are used in describing the property, and yet in that instrument the property to be delivered by plaintiff to defendant in the event of a forfeiture is specifically described in an inventory in which personal property only is listed. While there can be little question concerning the intention of the parties, as gathered from these two documents, all possible doubt vanishes when the language employed is construed in the light of the admitted purpose of the instrument executed by Beem to defendant. Civ. Code, § 1636. But, even if we accept the construction of that instrument contended for by appellant, we are still forced to the conclusion that he had no right to take or retain possession of the realty here in dispute. If it be admitted that the description of the property in the instrument executed and delivered by Beem to defendant is broad enough to include the leasehold interest, then it must also be admitted that the descriptive clause in the agreement between defendant and plaintiff is also broad enough to operate as an assignment of such interest to the latter. If this be the fact, and analysis of the two papers leaves no room for a contrary conclusion, then the specific inventory of property to be surrendered under the last-mentioned agreement certainly does not include the leasehold or any kind of an interest in the real property. The plaintiff only agreed to surrender possession of the personal property mentioned in such inventory, and its testimony alone is sufficient to support the finding that he surrendered nothing else.

The findings relating to rental value and damages are not supported by the evidence. While there is some vague and unsatisfactory evidence tending to show that the value of the rents, issues, and profits was $60 per month, there is no evidence whatever tending in the remotest degree to show that the rental value amounted to that or any other sum. The evidence touching damages lacks every element of certainty. It consists solely of the guess or reasons for the guess. Both the direct and cross-examinations of the plaintiff, and even this is not supported by data or particulars, demonstrate that he had no personal knowledge upon which to base an estimate, and the information derived from others was of the most general and indefinite character. It is well settled that such evidence will not support a finding as to damages. Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 235, 62 Pac. 395. But, even if this evidence be accorded the utmost weight, it is still insufficient to support the finding. It clearly indicates that the estimated damages consisted of profits which might have accrued from the business, which plaintiff might have conducted if he could have procured horses, buggies, robes, wagons, etc., in lieu of the personal property surrendered. Under no rule of law known to us can damages for the withholding of real property include speculative profits which might accrue from the joint use of real property, the possession of which is withheld, and of personal property which has no relation to the real property or to the controversy. Had defendant unlawfully deprived plaintiff of the possession of the stable, horses, buggies, harness, etc., such damages might have been proper; but in the case presented respondent was simply entitled to damages resulting from the unlawful detainer of the stable.

The order is reversed.

PARDEE v. SCHANZLIN et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE—NOTARIES—SEALS.

Courts take judicial notice of the seals of notaries public, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 7.

3. PUBLIC LANDS — APPLICATION TO PURCHASE—AFFIDAVITS—EXECUTION.

A copy of an application for the purchase of state lands, purporting to have been sworn to before a notary public, with a seal attached, duly certified by the surveyor general, and indorsed, showing the action taken thereon in the surveyor general's office, introduced in evidence, established prima facie the due execution of the document.

4. SAME—SCHOOL LANDS — PURCHASE — AFFIDAVIT.

Pol. Code, § 3495, providing for the sale of school lands, declares that an applicant must make an affidavit that he is a citizen of the United States or has filed his intention to become such, and section 3500 provides that any false statement contained in the affidavit defeats the right of the applicant to purchase the land or to receive any evidence of title thereto. Held, that the fact that an applicant averred that she was a citizen of the United States, instead of that she had filed an application to become a citizen, which was the fact, was not such a defect in the application as would avoid her title based thereon.

5. SAME.

Where an applicant for the purchase of school lands made and filed her intention to become a citizen on the same day that she swore to the affidavit attached to her application, but the application was not filed with the surveyor general for five days thereafter, in which she stated she was a citizen, such facts were sufficient to support a finding that at the time of the making of the affidavit and application and at the time of filing the same the applicant had filed her intention to become a citizen, and that she was a resident, etc.

J. E. Pardee, for appellant. H. D. Burroughs, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action on reference of the surveyor general of the state to determine the right to purchase certain school lands. The court found that defendant Mrs. Schanzlin made application to purchase the land in question on March 2, 1892, and on March 7, 1892, a certificate of purchase was duly issued to her, and that within 50 days thereafter, as required by the statute, on September 5, 1892, she paid the full purchase price of $800 and $3 fee, and on October 27, 1892, certificate of purchase No. 2,081 was duly issued to her, which remains in full force; that by mesne conveyances the defendant company, on March 13, 1902, became the owner of said land and is now entitled to all the rights acquired by the said Schanzlin by virtue of said certificate of purchase; that the land is timbered land and unfit for cultivation; that plaintiff on November 11, 1903, filed his affidavit and application in due form in the office of the surveyor general to purchase said land, and demanded that his affidavit of contest be referred to the proper court for adjudication, which reference was duly made, and on November 17th the action was commenced. Judgment passed for defendant company, from which plaintiff appeals on bill of exceptions.

1. It is claimed that there is no evidence that Mrs. Schanzlin made the affidavit required by section 3495 of the Political Code. This point arose on objection of plaintiff to the introduction of Mrs. Schanzlin's affidavit and application to purchase the land; the claim being that there was no evidence that the affidavit was subscribed and sworn to before any officer authorized to administer oaths. The evidence offered and received consisted of a copy, duly certified by the surveyor general, of the original application of Mrs. Schanzlin, purporting to be sworn to before Alvan Flanders, notary public, with his seal attached, and variously indorsed, showing the action taken thereon in the office of the surveyor general. Courts take judicial notice of the seals of notaries public (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 7), and in the execution of their official duties there is a presumption that they were regularly performed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15). The introduction of the affidavit established prima facie the due execution of the document.

2. It is next claimed that the affidavit was false, in this: that the applicant, Mrs. Schanzlin, stated that she was a citizen of the United States, whereas the evidence shows that she had declared her intention to become such citizen. It may be admitted as well settled by the cases, too numerous to require citation, that the applicant to purchase state land must state in his application all the facts which the statute makes requisite for such purchase, and these facts must be shown to be true, and that, failing in this respect, the applicant must fail. The requisites to be stated in an application to purchase school land are found in section 3495 of the Political Code. Among other things, it is provided that the person desiring to purchase "must make an affidavit that he is a citizen of the United States, or has filed his intention to become such." Section 3500 provides that "any false statement contained in the affidavit * * * defeats the right of the applicant to purchase the land, or to receive any evidence of title thereto." The contention of appellant is that the statute provides for two distinct and separate classes of persons who may apply to purchase: First, citizens, native or naturalized; second, persons qualified to become citizens who have declared their intention to become citizens. The argument is that Mrs. Schanzlin falsely declared herself to be in the first class, when in fact she knew that she belonged to the second and was not a citizen. Some analogy is sought to be drawn from the decisions in respect of the requirement as to occupancy. The statute requires a statement in this regard "that there is no occupation of such lands adverse to any he has, or if there is an adverse occupation the affidavit must show that the township has been sectionized three months and that the adverse occupant (giving his name) has been in such occupation more than sixty days since the plat was filed in the United States Land Office." Section 3495. It has been held that a statement in the affidavit that there is no occupancy, when in fact the land is occupied, will defeat the application, even though the occupancy has continued more than three months after the land has been sectionized. Pol. Code, § 3497; Plummer v. Woodruff, 72 Cal. 29, 11 Pac. 871, 13 Pac. 51. The provisions of the statute in respect of occupancy do not seem to us to be analogous. The statute as to citizenship prescribes a personal qualification, and the qualification is equally sufficient whether the applicant be a citizen or has declared his intention to become a citizen. In the case involving occupany the occupant who has failed to apply for three months after the land has been sectionized may still apply and contest the claim of another applicant. He does not loose his right, though he may loose his preference under section 3497, supra. The material fact required to be shown in the matter of citizenship is that the applicant "is a citizen of the United States, or has filed his intention to become such," in either of which cases he is a qualified purchaser. It was held in Fairbanks v. Lampkin, 101 Cal. 520, 36 Pac. 6, that a false statement as to certain subdivisions of the section of school land not being suitable for cultivation did not defeat the right to purchase other subdivisions as to which the affidavit was true. This was a departure from the general rule laid down in the cases as to false statements of statutory requirements. It seems to us that it would be an extremely harsh reading of the statute, as contended for by appellant, under the circumstances here disclosed, to forfeit an otherwise valid entry 10 years after the purchaser had paid in full for the land, during all of which time she was entitled to have a patent issue to her or her assigns.

3. It appeared that Mrs. Schanzlin made and filed her declaration of intention on the same day that she swore to the affidavit, and appellant makes the point that it does not appear which of these instruments was first executed. She was a lady 64 years old when testifying to an event happening 12 years earlier, and she could not remember whether she filed her declaration of intention before making affidavit to her application. But it appeared that the application was not filed with the surveyor general for some 5 days later. The court found "that at the time of making said affidavit and application * * * and at the time of filing thereof in the office of the register of the state land office * * * said Antoine B. Schanzlin had filed her intention to become a citizen of the United States and she was a resident," etc. If any presumption is to be indulged in, it must be against that which would imply perjury on the part of the applicant. The law generally rejects all fractions of a day, in order to avoid disputes. 2 Blackstone's Com. (Cooley) 141. Where, however, conflicting rights have accrued on the same day, to guard against injustice, the truth and fact in point of time when any particular act was done or event happened, may always be averred and proved. Id. note. No such situation is here presented. We think the evidence was sufficient to justify the finding.

4. Defendant Schanzlin made default, and defendant company pleaded the statute of limitations. Sections 315, 316, Code Civ. Proc. The court made no finding on this issue, and it is urged as prejudicial error. It is not necessary to decide whether or not these sections of the Code apply to this class of cases. The judgment of the court was supported by the findings, and a finding on this issue of the answer was immaterial.

Respondent makes the point that under the ruling in McCabe v. Goodwin, 106 Cal. 486, 39 Pac. 941, the title of the assignee of a certificate of purchase of this particular class of state land, for which payment in full has been made, after several years have elapsed, cannot be contested by a third person. It is not necessary to decide the question.

The foregoing disposes of all the points made in appellant's brief.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GALLANAR.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 13, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 11, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law — Trial — Conduct of Jury.

That one of the jurors in a prosecution for homicide drew on a blackboard hanging in the jury room a diagram from his recollection of the testimony of the front of the room in which the killing took place, for the purpose of expressing his view of the circumstances surrounding the homicide, was not objectionable as a reception of evidence out of court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2054-2062.]

2. Homicide—Manslaughter.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence held to justify an instruction on manslaughter.

3. Same—Instructions.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, there was evidence of a quarrel, it was not error for the court to charge that, while the purpose, the intent, and its execution may follow rapidly upon each other, it is proper for the jury to consider the shortness of the interval in considering whether such speedy execution may not be attributed to sudden passion and anger, rather than to deliberation and premeditation, which may characterize offenses of a higher degree than manslaughter.

4. Same—Evidence.

An instruction that if the jury were in doubt as to the precise circumstances under which the homicide was committed, whether deceased at the very moment of the killing was in fact about to inflict on defendant great bodily harm, then the previous relations between them, etc., became important for the jury's consideration, which relations embraced every word, act, and circumstance bearing on the point of which evidence had been received, was not objectionable as authorizing the jury to disregard the direct evidence and base their verdict on circumstances and probabilities.

5. Same—Self-Defense.

In a prosecution for homicide, an instruction on self-defense, that it was not necessary to justify the killing that the danger be actual and that it was enough that the danger be apparent, such an appearance as would induce a reasonable person in defendant's position to believe that he was in imminent danger of great bodily injury, was proper.

6. Same—Manslaughter—Evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of manslaughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; C. M. Head, Judge.

George W. Gallanar was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See 79 Pac. 378.

J. H. Creighton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and T. B. Brainard, Dist. Atty., for the People.

BUCKLES, J. The defendant was charged with murder in killing one A. Garman, a bartender in a saloon in the town of Keswick, in Shasta county, and was convicted of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was denied, and defendant sentenced to state prison for a term of 10 years. The appeal is from the final judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The first assignment of error, and the one mostly relied upon for reversal, is that after the case was submitted to the jury, and while in the jury room considering the verdict, one of the jurors drew on the blackboard hanging in the jury room a diagram of the front of the barroom in which the shooting took place, giving it the appearance of having the door closed. The diagram was made by the juror wholly from his recollection of the testimony and for the purpose of graphically expressing his view upon the condition of affairs at the scene of the homicide. No allusion was made by any of the jurors to this diagram during the time they were deliberating on their verdict, and it is charged that the jury thus received testimony on a material matter outside of the court and not on viewing the premises. We think any juror had a right to make a drawing or picture from his recollection of the testimony for the purpose of more fully expressing what he understood the evidence to be. Had the diagram been made from the juror's own knowledge, or from information which came to him through any other channel than through the testimony of the witnesses while testifying during the course of the trial, it might be said to be testimony received out of court. The testimony shows conclusively that before the defendant entered the barroom, just before the shots were fired, the door was closed; that he opened it, went in, and closed it after him; and that thereafter the deceased opened the door, when two witnesses standing on the porch in front saw a portion of what took place on the inside. The making of the diagram as it was made was not evidence received out of court, nor additional testimony to that which was given during the trial, and could not possibly have prejudiced the defendant. The several authorities cited by appellant go to the question of receiving testimony out of court, and therefore have no application here.

The next assignment of error is that the court instructed the jury on manslaughter, when it is contended the evidence did not indicate manslaughter, and under the testimony the verdict should have been either murder or acquittal. We find no error in this; but, had the court not given an instruction on manslaughter, it certainly would have been error. That the defendant shot and killed the deceased there was no dispute at the trial. At about 10:15 a. m. of the day of the killing the defendant was in the barroom holding a discussion with the deceased. When the witness Murdock went out, the defendant and deceased were left there alone, and no witness has attempted to testify to what took place between these two people in that barroom at the time, further than that the witness Murdock testified that as he was leaving he heard the defendant say to the deceased, "I have got to go down the road, and I will see that you go, too." Defendant left the barroom, and, according to the testimony of Murdock, defendant said to him at the depot, soon after Murdock had left the barroom, "Garman [deceased] run me out of the saloon with a bottle." Defendant returned to the barroom that day about 1 o'clock in the afternoon and immediately on entering said to deceased: "Have you got that bottle ready? Will you run me out with that bottle again?" To which deceased replied, "I don't want to have any trouble with you, nor I don't want you to come in quarreling with me or raising a disturbance." Defendant testified: "The first thing that happened after I closed the door was when Garman [deceased] got up and made a run for me. He got up and says: 'You son of a bitch get out.' * * * I stepped to the north to get out of his way. He went to the door and throwed it open. * * * I moved towards the north to get out of his way, because I did not know what he was going to do, after what had occurred in the morning." Deceased then came toward him with a bottle in his right hand, and was angry and grappled with defendant, when defendant drew his pistol and commenced firing, and killed the deceased, hitting him with at least three of the shots fired. While there was evidence tending to show that defendant had had a quarrel with deceased in the forenoon, and that defendant had returned to renew the quarrel, and that the killing was done with premeditation and therefore murder, still the evidence did tend to show a fight in which the killing might have been done under the heat of passion and so forth, and thus induce the jury to convict the defendant of manslaughter. Under the testimony in this case such instruction could not by any possibility have harmed the defendant. People v. Chun Heong, 86 Cal. 332, 24 Pac. 1021. As there was some evidence tending to show the killing to be manslaughter, the case of People v. Chames, 122 Cal. 140, 54 Pac. 596, has no application.

As the evidence in this case tends to show there was a quarrel, the following instruction was not erroneous: "But while the purpose, the intent, and its execution may follow thus rapidly upon each other, it is proper for the jury to take into consideration the shortness of such interval, in considering whether such sudden and speedy execution may not be attributed to sudden passion and anger, rather than to deliberation and premeditation, which must characterize the higher offense." The instruction was certainly as favorable to the defendant as could be made consistent with the facts disclosed by the evidence. The defendant testified: "I am aware that I shot the man because he had a bottle raised and I thought he was going to kill me—thought he was going to hit me with the bottle. I don't know the position the bottle was in. He did not say he would strike me with it. I did not see from where he got the bottle. I have an idea he got it from the end of the bar, where he got it in the morning when he run me out."

The court instructed the jury: "If in this you are in doubt as to the precise circumstances under which the homicide was committed —that is, are in doubt as to whether the deceased, at the very moment of the killing, was, in fact, about to inflict upon defendant great bodily harm—then the previous relations between the parties and their previous conduct towards each other and defendant's knowledge of the deceased become important for your consideration; and those previous relations and that previous conduct and knowledge embrace every word and every act, in short, every fact and circumstance, bearing upon that point, of which evidence has been received. You are to place yourselves as nearly as possible in the situation of the parties, as respects each other, at the very scene and time of the homicide." Appellant contends that this instruction amounted to the advice of the court to the jury that it might discard the direct evidence in the case and arrive at the verdict on certain circumstantial evidence and probabilities. But such a theory cannot be maintained, for the jury was distinctly told that the previous relations, previous conduct and knowledge must be such as shown by the evidence in the case, and no intimation was given that appearances might be determined from probabilities arising from circumstances not in evidence. Besides, this instruction must be read with other instructions which were given upon appearances. The court had told the jury that it was not necessary to justify such killing that the danger be actual. "It is enough that it be apparent danger; such an appearance as would induce a reasonable person in defendant's position to believe that he was in imminent danger of great bodily injury." We see no error in the instruction. Appellant argues in his brief that when the prosecution closed its case, the testimony showed that defendant was justified in killing the deceased, and when the evidence was all in the state had failed to overcome the presumption of innocence. The defendant had testified to the killing and the acts and words of deceased, and his own acts, at the time of the killing, and it was the province of the jury to take all these matters into consideration as well as all the other testimony in the case and determine therefrom whether the appearances were such as to justify the defendant in killing the deceased. There was no conflict between witnesses' statements as to whether the defendant was justified in killing the deceased, for they could not be permitted to speak upon that. They could but detail the facts and leave the jury to draw the conclusion and declare the same by their verdict. The fact that defendant testified that "I shot Garman because I was afraid he would kill me or injure me" is not conclusive that such fear is genuine or well founded. Whether or not he had reason to entertain such fear, and whether he did actually entertain such fear, the jury must determine from the evidence detailing all the facts and circumstances, as well as it is for the jury to determine from all such facts and circumstances whether the killing was done in a quarrel and under the influence of the heat of passion, when there is evidence, tending, as we have seen, to show a quarrel, and that defendant acted in the heat of passion. The firing of the shots followed almost as closely upon the heels of the declaration by deceased that defendant was a son of a bitch as one thought follows another, and the jury doubtless believed that to be the real cause of the shooting and therefore convicted the defendant of manslaughter from this view, and ignoring the fact that defendant and deceased had quarreled in the morning, and deceased had run the defendant out of the barroom with a bottle, and that defendant returned later in the day armed with a pistol when he would be assured of a renewal of the quarrel, might tend in some degree to indicate premeditation to enter the combat armed with a deadly weapon and to use the same if opportunity offered. We think the verdict of manslaughter fully supported by the evidence.

There are many assignments of error as to the admission of testimony, all of which we have carefully examined, but are unable to find any prejudicial error in any of them.

Judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA LUMBER CO. v. PETERS et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 2, 1906.)

Mechanics' Liens — Materials — Separate Buildings—Amount—Designation.

Where a materialman furnished lumber or a single order under one contract to be used in the construction of three houses, with nothing to show how much thereof was to be used in each building, he was not required, in his claim of lien filed on the three houses to designate the amount due him on each of the buildings, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1188, providing that in every case in which one claim is filed against two or more buildings at the same time the claimant must designate the amount due to him on each of the buildings, etc.

Action by the Southern California Lumber Company against Frank H. Peters and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant California Title Insurance & Trust Company appeals. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab, for appellant. Borden & Carhart, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This action is brought by a materialman to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon three cottages situated upon three adjoining city lots. The houses were all constructed at the same time, and the lumber was furnished under one contract by plaintiff directly to the owner of the cottages, who is the defendant Frank H. Peters. On a trial without a jury the findings and judgment were for plaintiff, and the defendant California Title Insurance & Trust Company appeals from said judgment, and the record brought up consists of the judgment roll.

The appellant has a trust deed of the premises foreclosed, which deed was recorded after substantially all the materials were furnished, and it contends that the plaintiff's lien is postponed to the lien of its deed, for the reason that plaintiff's claim of lien failed to designate the amount due him on each of the buildings, as required by section 1188, Code Civ. Proc. This section reads as follows: "In ever case in which one claim is filed against two or more buildings, mining claims, or other improvements owned by the same person, the person filing such claim must at the same time designate the amount due to him on each of such buildings, mining claims, or other improvements; otherwise the lien of such claim is postponed to other liens." Assuming, without deciding the question, that a trust deed constitutes a lien upon the property within the provisions of said section, we are still of the opinion that plaintiff's claim of lien does not come within the section. The lumber having been furnished upon a single order, and all under one contract to be used in all the buildings, and having been so used in all the buildings, without anything to show how much of it was used in each building, it was impossible to "designate the amount due to him on each of such buildings." Indeed, under such circumstances, there was nothing due him on each of the buildings. His claim existed against the buildings jointly and not otherwise. It will not be held that the Legislature intended to defeat the application of the lien law to a particular class of cases by requiring the performance of something impossible; but, on the contrary, the mechanic's lien law, being remedial in its nature, will be given a liberal interpretation to promote justice and carry out its general purpose, and it will be presumed that in enacting section 1188, Code Civ. Proc., the Legislature had in mind those cases only where it was possible to designate the amount due on each of several buildings, and did not intend that the section should apply to any other class of cases. To give the section the construction contended for by appellant would cut the throat of the mechanic's lien law as applied to a class of cases, and would render nugatory as to those cases the general provision of the Constitution giving mechanics, materialmen, etc., "a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material." Const. Cal. art. 20, § 15. Such a construction as that cannot be tolerated. Statutes must be either harmonized with the Constitution or wiped out entirely. This construction of the section is not new. Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986; James on Mech. Liens, §§ 243–251.

It was therefore proper to make the trust deeds of appellant subordinate to plaintiff's lien.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLINT et al. v. EUREKA CRUDE OIL CO.

1. DEED—CONSIDERATION.

Delivery of stock pursuant to a contract to give it for a conveyance of land, which took the place of an unexecuted agreement to give it for a lease of the land, is a sufficient consideration for a deed of the land.

2. SAME—CANCELLATION—OFFER TO RETURN CONSIDERATION.

The grantor, not having offered to return the consideration, may not have a deed canceled for fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 212; vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, §§ 33–38.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Martin Clint and another against the Eureka Crude Oil Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

Will D. Gould and James H. Blanchard, for appellants. Fred W. Heatherly, Geo. D. Blake, Telfair Creighton, and F. E. Davis, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This is an action to cancel a deed alleged to have been obtained from plaintiff Martin Clint and others by false and fraudulent representations and without delivery. On a trial without a jury the findings and judgment were in defendant's favor. The appeal is by plaintiffs from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

It is reasonably clear from the evidence that the 18,750 shares of stock in the defendant corporation were agreed to be given, and were in fact transferred, as a consideration for the deed sought to be canceled herein, and that this was a sufficient consideration to uphold such deed. It is immaterial that the transfer of this stock may have also constituted the agreed consideration for a lease of the same property mentioned in the deed. We find nothing in the evidence to warrant the theory that two lots of stock of 18,750 shares each were ever agreed to be delivered to plaintiff Clint. The evidence shows that before any of this stock was delivered to Clint the previous lease was, in effect, canceled by an agreement to convey the same and also the property leased to the defendant. This agreement was executed to defendant by all the parties to the lease, including the plaintiff Clint, who was the lessor named in the lease. This agreement to convey the whole title took the place of the original agreement of lease and the agreement to transfer the 18,750 shares of stock, being still unexecuted at the date of the last agreement, constituted a sufficient consideration to support the agreement to convey the entire title, and especially was it a good consideration when the stock was thereafter delivered in accordance with the agreement. Furthermore, if it were admitted that the delivery of the stock was not a sufficient consideration to support the agreement to convey, still we have the signatures to the agreement to convey of the parties named as lessees in the lease, and their signatures agreeing to convey their valuable interest in the lease most certainly constituted a sufficient consideration for plaintiff's signature to the same instrument. We think, therefore, that the findings of the court as to the consideration, as well wherein they negative plaintiffs' allegation that the agreement to convey was without consideration, as also in the affirmative finding that the transfer of the stock was the consideration, are amply supported by the evidence.

There is no evidence that plaintiffs ever offered to return any portion of the stock received by them for this deed, and the court finds that no such offer was made. Of course, it would be inequitable to cancel this deed without a return of the stock which was given for it, even if the deed was obtained by fraud and a delivery also procured by fraud and without the consent of the grantors. This is an action in equity, and the plaintiffs cannot be restored to their rights in the property, and at the same time retain the consideration for it which they have received. It is therefore unnecessary to determine anything as to the question of fraud, and the finding of fraud in the transaction may be disregarded as immaterial to the support of the judgment. The judgment must stand for the defendant on the finding of no offer to return what was received by plaintiffs for the land, however fraudulent the transaction may have been. This failure to restore or offer to restore the consideration prevents a recovery by plaintiffs, whatever view may be taken of the other issues in the case, and we need not, therefore, consider any other issue. It is found that the land described in the complaint is the same land described in the agreement to convey, and no attack is made upon this finding in appellants' brief. A careful reading of the special findings will disclose that they dispose of every issue in the case. The finding to the effect that all the material allegations of the complaint are untrue, "except as hereinbefore found" and that the answer, except as hereinbefore found, is true, may be disregarded as entirely unnecessary and immaterial.

Some other objections are urged, but after an examination we do not find them of sufficient importance to require further discussion. The peculiar circumstances and facts surrounding this case and the transactions which led to its commencement and prosecution inclines us to the opinion that neither party should have been awarded costs.

Therefore, the order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is modified to the extent of striking out that part thereof awarding costs and otherwise to stand affirmed.

I concur: ALLEN, J.

SMITH, J. I concur in the judgment, but for reasons that will require a somewhat extended explanation. The suit was brought to cancel or annul a deed, or document purporting to be a deed, of date December 21, 1900 (designated in the record as "Exhibit A"), between Martin Clint and others, of the first part, and the Eureka Crude Oil Company, an Arizona corporation, of the second part. The document is not signed by three of the parties named as grantors, but several months after the transactions involved in this case a similar deed was executed by them. The allegations of the complaint show a flagrant case of fraud perpetrated on the plaintiffs by the defendant through its secretary and agent, by means of which the plaintiff's signature to the instrument and its possession without delivery were obtained from the plaintiffs by the defendant; and these allegations are, in effect, found to be true by the court. There is, indeed, a finding by the court in general terms that the deed was delivered; but it is found specifically that the deed was placed by the plaintiffs "in the hands of [the defendant's agent, Kloeckner,] with oral instructions that he should show the same to their * * * attorney [Gould] and should not deliver the same to the defendant corporation, or to any person or persons, unless the same should be first approved by their said attorney," and other facts are found showing as matter of fact that there was no delivery. Kenney v. Parks, 137 Cal. 527, 70 Pac. 556. And see, also, Tewksbury v. O'Connell, 21 Cal. 60; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 530, 573, 2 Pac. 418; Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 223, 31 Pac. 1; Center v. Davis, 113 Cal. 309, 45 Pac. 468, 54 Am. St. Rep. 352. The general finding is, therefore, to be regarded as a mere conclusion of law from the specific facts found, or as in conflict with those facts, and in either case is to be disregarded. Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 301; Warder v. Enslen, 73 Cal. 294, 14 Pac. 874.

The answer, besides denials of the complaint, sets up a previous written agreement between the same parties of date March 23, 1900, whereby the plaintiff Martin Clint and the other parties named as grantors in Exhibit A agreed to convey to the defendant all their right, title, and interest in and to "the Triumph, Jersey, and Venezuelan claims in the San Fernando mining district"; and it is alleged that the deed in question, Exhibit A, was made "in pursuance and performance of said" agreement; and the court finds these allegations to be true. It is also alleged in the answer, and found by the court, that at some date unstated there was issued to the plaintiffs 18,750 shares of the capital stock of the defendant, that this was received by them in consideration of the execution of the deed in question; and that said stock has not been returned to defendant or any part of it. But it appears from the evidence, without contradiction, that this stock had been issued to the plaintiff Martin Clint long before the date of the alleged deed, Exhibit A, in pursuance of the agreement of March 23d, and of the lease, of date March 8, 1900, therein referred to. This stock, therefore, could not have been the consideration of the deed Exhibit A, otherwise than indirectly as being the consideration of the pre-existing agreement of Martin Clint, of date March 23, 1900, to make a conveyance of the lands therein described. The finding is, therefore, to be construed simply as a finding that the deed, Exhibit A, was made in consideration of the obligation of the plaintiff Martin Clint to convey under the pre-existing agreement. Nor, as the stock was held by the plaintiff under a subsisting, unrescinded agreement, was it required of him to return it as a condition of the cancellation of the deed. It is also to be observed that the allegations of the answer and the findings thereon, in effect, find that there was in fact a delivery of the deed; but for the reasons already explained this part of the finding must be disregarded. The gist of the case, therefore, as found, is that the possession of the deed undelivered and the signature of the plaintiff Martin Clint thereto were fraudulently obtained by the defendant, as alleged in the complaint, and that the only defense is the pre-existing agreement of March 23, 1900, and the alleged fact that the deed, Exhibit A, though fraudulently obtained, was such a deed as the defendant had a right, under the agreement, to demand from the plaintiff Martin Clint.

Two questions are, therefore, presented: The one as to the sufficiency of the defense pleaded and found; the other as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings on this defense. As to the latter point, upon a comparison of the agreement and of the deed, Exhibit A, it will be seen that the descriptions are altogether different, and that there is nothing to indicate identity between them. Nor is there in the record any evidence tending to show such identity. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears from the evidence, and indeed from the specific facts found, that a part of lot 2 of the section referred to in the deed is not included in any one of the three claims described in the agreement. It is, therefore, clear that, as to the part of lot 2 improperly included in the deed, the defense altogether fails. This point, however, though raised by the specifications in the case, is not touched upon by the appellants in their brief, and it may, perhaps, be inferred in support of the judgment of the court below that the discrepancy between the description in the deed and the agreement was too slight to be material, or there may be some other explanation of the apparent discrepancy which was satisfactory to the court below, and would be satisfactory to us if brought to our attention. I therefore will assume, for the purposes of this opinion, that the finding as to the identity of the land described in Exhibit A and the land agreed to be conveyed by the agreement of March 23, 1900, is sustained by the evidence. But, even assuming this, the defense is plainly untenable. The signature of the plaintiff Martin Clint and the possession of the undelivered deed were fraudulently obtained by the defendant; and the case is, therefore, the same in principle as though the possession of the deed had been acquired by force and violence, or even by highway robbery or burglary. Cutler v. Fitzgibbons (Cal. Sup.) 83 Pac. 1075. The case cited is in point to this proposition. Ordinarily, therefore, the only course left to us would be to require the cancellation and delivery up of the deed. But, in view of the fact that the plaintiff Martin Clint is under the obligation incurred by the agreement of March 23, 1900, to convey to the defendant the lands described in that agreement, and that the corresponding obligation of the other grantors had been performed by the execution of proper deeds, equity would seem to require of him, as a condition of receiving this relief, to execute to the defendant a deed of conveyance according to the terms of the agreement, and as the result of such a requirement (upon the assumption that the finding is supported by the evidence) would be the same as a ratification of the deed in question, we see no reason why that course should not be followed. Civ. Code, § 3532. This, indeed, is to make a deed for the plaintiff, but it is competent for the court to do this directly, as by a commissioner. But under these circumstances, and in view of the admitted fraud of the defendant (which was of a most flagrant character), I do not think it should have recovered its costs; for this would be, as it were, setting a premium upon fraud. I am of the opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the court below should be modified by striking therefrom that portion thereof that allows the defendant costs.

There are some other findings in the case, upon which reliance seems to be placed by respondent as constituting a defense by way of estoppel, or as showing laches upon the part of the plaintiffs. But there is no plea of estoppel in the case; nor, were it otherwise, would the facts found be sufficient to support that defense. Nor upon the facts found are the plaintiffs chargeable with laches. The plaintiff Martin Clint continued in possession, "holding possesion according to his right" (Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 564, 6 Am. Rep. 624), and the defendant had notice of the fraudulent character, and nullity of the deed. And as to the purchasers of stock, assuming for the purposes of the decision that their case can be considered, it is not found that they made their purchase on the faith of the deed, nor do the circumstances indicate that such should have been the case; for the omission of a small part of lot 2 does not materially affect the consideration for the stock. We have deemed it unnecessary, therefore, to do more than merely to allude to this part of the findings.

I am of the opinion that the order denying the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial should therefore be affirmed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the lower court to modify the judgment heretofore entered, as above indicated.

SWEENEY v. DOYLE, County Auditor.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1906.)

OFFICERS—SALARY DURING CONTEST—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

Pol. Code, § 936, relative to payment of the salary of an office, title to which is contested by proceedings in court, is not repealed by the county government act, which contains no provision relating to the payment of the salary for the time of the contest.

On rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 84 Pac. 1017.

McLAUGHLIN, J. In his petition for rehearing appellant insists that section 936 of the Political Code was repealed by the provisions of the county government act subsequently enacted. This point was made in the briefs, but was not noticed in the opinion filed, and hence we deem it proper to say that there is nothing in the point then and now urged. The county government act contains no provision relating to the payment of salaries in cases where an action to determine the right to an office is pending, and, as repeals by implication are not favored, the existing law relating to this particular subject was not repealed thereby.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

3 Cal. App. 561

BANK OF YOLO v. BANK OF WOODLAND et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. APPEAL — FINDINGS — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

A finding based on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. ASSIGNMENT — CONSIDERATION — PRE-EXISTING DEBT.

A pre-existing debt is alone a sufficient consideration for an assignment of moneys which might become due to the assignor as commissions or profits from certain charters of vessels for the shipment of grain to foreign countries.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assignments, § 114.]

3. SAME — VALIDITY — CERTAINTY — AMOUNT DUE.

An assignment of commissions or profits to be derived from certain charter parties was not invalid because no particular amount was specified; the amount due thereunder being ascertainable in the method provided by Civ. Code, § 1610 et seq.

4. NOVATION—ASSIGNMENT.

An order requesting E. to pay any balance that might be due the drawer on final settlement of certain shipments of grain, including charter commissions collected for the drawer's account, to defendant bank, though not negotiable, constituted a valid novation, as provided by Civ. Code, §§ 1530–1532.

5. ASSIGNMENTS — CONSIDERATION — EXTENSION OF TIME.

Where the charterer of certain vessels executed an order requesting E. to pay any balance that might be due such charterer on final settlement, including charter commissions, to defendant bank, in consideration of a pre-existing debt owed by the charterer to the bank, the acceptance of such order by the bank operated as a conditional payment of a part of the drawer's debt, and as an extension of time of the payment thereof until the amount due to the drawer should be ascertained; and hence the order was based on a sufficient consideration.

6. SAME—SUBJECTS OF ASSIGNMENT.

Where a charterer of certain vessels for the shipment of grain entered into a contract with E. to finance the adventure, the balance due on a final settlement between the charterer and E. and the rights and things in action arising out of their agreement, including the profits to be derived therefrom, were proper subjects of assignment.

7. LIENS — COMMON-LAW LIENS—EQUITABLE LIENS—PURCHASE MONEY.

Where E. agreed with the charterer of certain vessels for the shipment of grain to finance the adventure, after which the charterer executed to defendant bank for a pre-existing debt an order directing E. to pay to the bank all profits, commissions, etc., which should become due to the charterer under such contract, a party furnishing grain for the loading of the vessels, and who, on receiving nearly the whole market value thereof from E., delivered to him every indicia of ownership and right to possession, had neither a legal nor an equitable lien on the proceeds of the sale of the grain, nor on the amount of commissions or profits due the charterer.

8. ASSIGNMENT—NOTICE—DUTY TO GIVE.

Where, after the making of a contract for the loading of certain vessels for foreign transportation, the charterer assigned all his interest in the commissions and profits to defendant bank, the latter was not bound to give notice of such assignment to complainant bank, which was furnishing grain for such adventure, of which fact defendant bank had knowledge.

9. APPEAL — FINDINGS — FAILURE TO FIND — PREJUDICE.

Failure of the court to find on a particular issue is not prejudicial, where under the evidence any finding that could have been made on such issue would have been adverse to the party complaining.

10. SAME—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

In a suit to recover the proceeds of an adventure for the shipment of grain, a large part of which had been assigned to defendant bank, evidence given by the president of the assignee bank that neither the cashier nor any other agent of the bank had been given authority to finance such shipment, or to buy wheat with which to load the vessels, was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Yolo against the Bank of Woodland and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Huston and E. R. Bush, for appellant. N. A. Hawkins, for respondents.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $2,713.65 from the defendant Evans, and to have it adjudged that the other defendants had no claim to or interest in said sum. Evans deposited the money in court to abide the result of the controversy between the banks, and the action as to him was dismissed. The Bank of Woodland, in its answer, denied the averments of the complaint, and by way of cross-complaint set forth its right to the money; and Simpson answered, denying generally the averments of both the complaint and cross-complaint. The court rendered judgment that the plaintiff was entitled to $183.54 of the sum so deposited, and the respondent bank to the remainder and to costs. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The following facts are gleaned from the evidence, construed, as it must be, in the light most favorable to the findings and judgment: The defendant Simpson made an agreement with defendant Evans, and through the agency of the latter, at some time prior to December 11, 1900, chartered two ships, named, respectively, the Anglessey and the Shenandoah, for the purpose of loading the same with cargoes of grain for sale and shipment to England. The terms of the charter party, as far as they relate to commissions to become due to Simpson, provided for a commission of 5 per cent., one half of which was payable at the time the charter party was executed, and the other half at the port of discharge. The first installment was called the "charter commission" and the second the "address commission." On December 10, 1900, Simpson executed and delivered to respondent an order requesting Evans to pay any balance that might be due him on final settlement of the Anglessey and Shenandoah shipments including charter commissions collected for his account, to the respondent. On the following day this order was presented to, and indorsed and accepted in writing by, Evans. At the time it was drawn and accepted Simpson was indebted to the respondent in the sum of about $20,000, the payment of all of which, save about $3,000, was secured. The order was taken as additional security for this indebtedness, and no money was advanced to Simpson at the time it was drawn. The indebtedness of Simpson to respondent at the time this action was commenced had been reduced to the amount of respondent's judgment herein. When the order was executed and delivered, there was no agreement between respondent and Simpson, whereby the former was to "finance the cargoes," or furnish money to buy grain to load the ship. Respondent had furnished the money to buy grain to load two other ships, which had been loaded before the Anglessey and Shenandoah, but refused to make advances to buy wheat to load the ships named. After the refusal to make such advances, and after the order was accepted, respondent, through its cashier, learned that appellant was helping Simpson on the cargoes of the Anglessey and Shenandoah. That official knew when the order was taken that it would be valueless unless the ships were loaded and cleared. He had no knowledge as to how Simpson was to load the ships, but thought Evans would see him through if nobody else did. He was shown a letter by Simpson, dated November 10, 1900, wherein Evans agreed to advance 95 cents per cental on wheat loaded, and to collect advances and "address commissions" for Simpson's account, through London friends, and to render a final account to him. Respondent never notified appellant that it held the order, and the latter knew nothing of its existence until after the wheat had been loaded on the ships. Respondent never "financed a cargo" for Simpson. In their dealings, the latter would buy the grain, and turn in the warehouse receipt to secure the amount of the check drawn in payment therefor, which was then paid by respondent. Simpson had some grain hypothecated to respondent which was loaded on the ships named. Of the grain loaded on the Anglessey respondent furnished 398,744 pounds, the appellant 2,219,332 pounds, and the Yolo County Savings Bank 473,854 pounds. Of the grain loaded on the Shenandoah respondent furnished 25,854 pounds, appellant 6,230,720 pounds, and one Cerkel 4,854 sacks. Early in December, 1900, Simpson agreed with appellant that, if the latter would advance the money necessary to load the two ships he had chartered, all moneys realized from the cargoes "except a small pro rata that might be due to the Bank of Woodland" would be paid to appellant. In buying wheat from the farmers, Simpson paid for the same by issuing checks, to which the warehouse receipts, indorsed by the holders, were attached, and the checks so given were honored by appellant upon delivery of the receipts. The wheat was shipped to Port Costa by appellant, in whose name it was held, and, as it was loaded on the vessels, the mate issued receipts therefor in lieu of the warehouse receipts. After it was all loaded appellant was paid 95 cents per cental on the mate's receipts, which were taken up by and delivered to Evans, who in turn surrendered them when the bill of lading was issued. Some of the wheat delivered by appellant cost more, and some less, than 95 cents per cental, but, freight charges and other expenses included Simpson was indebted to appellant in the sum of about $4,000 on account of the transaction after Evans paid appellant 95 cents per cental for the wheat furnished. After the "address commissions" are paid Evans had in his hands $2,713.60, which was payable to Simpson or his assignees. On January 8, 1901, the cashier of appellant bank mailed a letter to Evans in which he said: "I have given the Grangers' Business Association authority to collect 95 cents per cental on all mate receipts not yet delivered to you, and an additional 25 cents on each ton of our wheat on ship Shenandoah. Any payments yet to be made on account of ships Anglessey and Shenandoah to be made directly to this bank." Upon this letter Simpson, under his signature, indorsed his concurrence in such agreement. It does not clearly appear when the loading of the ships was commenced. The agent who acted for Evans in the matter could not state positively whether it commenced in November or December, nor could he state how far it had advanced when the order relied upon by respondent was presented. In one part of his testimony Simpson stated that he could not say whether any wheat had been loaded at that time, and in another that all the wheat from Woodland was loaded afterwards. It appears that on December 1st 4,854 sacks of wheat, worth $5,997.31, were purchased from one Cerkel; that this wheat was shipped on the Shenandoah and that the first wheat purchased by appellant for loading the ships was purchased on December 11th. There is nothing to show when the wheat purchased by the Yolo County Bank of Savings was purchased or loaded. The loading was completed during the first week of January, 1901.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the order given to respondent was supported by a sufficient consideration. This contention is based primarily on the proposition that respondent agreed to furnish money to purchase the grain for loading the ships if the order was given, and that it failed to fulfill such agreement. It cannot be doubted that Simpson's version of the understanding had with respondent at the time the order was given is at variance with the version of the respondent's cashier; but it is well settled that when the evidence is conflicting the finding cannot be disturbed. Astill v. South Yuba Water Co., 146 Cal. 57, 79 Pac. 594; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 284, 53 Pac. 699; Carteri v. Roberts, 140 Cal. 165, 73 Pac. 818; People v. Wong Chong Suey, 110 Cal. 121, 42 Pac. 420. It is argued in this connection that, as the order was given as collateral security for a pre-existing indebtedness, there was no consideration to support it. This court, however, is not at liberty to depart from the contrary rule, which has prevailed in this state for many years. Civ. Code, § 1606; Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 480, 58 Pac. 910, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195; Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 342; Payne v. Bensley, 8 Cal. 267, 68 Am. Dec. 318; Sackett v. Johnson, 54 Cal. 109; Russ v. Muscupiabe, 120 Cal. 532, 52 Pac. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186. The order was an assignment of whatever moneys might become due to Simpson as commissions or profits from the charters he then held. The fact that no particular amount is specified does not affect its validity, for the method of ascertaining such amount clearly appears. Civ. Code, §§ 1610 et seq. True, it was not negotiable, but it is, nevertheless, a valid contract, having all the earmarks of a novation. Civ. Code, §§ 1530-1532; Wolters v. Thomas (Cal.) 32 Pac. 565; Joyce v. Wing Yet Lung, 87 Cal. 424, 25 Pac. 545; Wheatley v. Strobe, 12 Cal. 92, 73 Am. Dec. 522. It was at least a conditional payment of a part of Simpson's debt, and respondent, by accepting it, impliedly agreed to extend the time of such payment until the amount of the balance due from Evans to the drawer could be ascertained, and this could only be after payment of the address commissions. Indeed, we do not see how the respondent could proceed against Simpson for any portion of the debt due by him to the bank until the balance was at least ascertainable, for it certainly could not prove that there was any balance due from the drawer until the third party, who was bound by his acceptance of the order, had received the address commissions and struck a balance, or had been afforded an opportunity to do so. We think the bank clearly suffered a detriment, and that a distinct benefit was conferred on Simpson, and this was a sufficient consideration. Civ. Code, § 1605. The burden was upon appellant to show a want of consideration, and this it did not accomplish, for the testimony of respondent's cashier is alone sufficient to show a subsisting indebtedness aside from the note introduced in evidence, notwithstanding Simpson's impression that he owed nothing. Civ. Code, § 1615.

It is next contended that, at the time the order was given, there was nothing in existence capable of transfer or assignment, and in the same connection it is urged that in no event could there then be an assignment of anything owing from Evans to Simpson on account of any wheat furnished by appellant. If it be conceded that no wheat owned by appellant had been loaded when the order was given, and that Simpson could not transfer any money which might thereafter become due to appellant on account of wheat furnished and loaded, still we think Simpson then had substantial, tangible property rights which could and did pass by assignment. The balance due on final settlement, including charter commissions collected on Simpson's account, alone was assigned, and certainly appellant could then have had no legal claim to such balance. Simpson then held the charters, and the Cerkel wheat, at least, had been loaded. The loading of the ships was practically insured by Evans' agreement to advance the approximate market value of wheat to whomsoever might furnish it. The charterer then had a vested interest in the charter and address commissions, and this was certainly a tangible, existing, substantive, assignable property right. Under his agreement with Evans, Simpson also had a vested interest in any profits realized on the sale of the cargoes, and this while in a measure speculative, was nevertheless an assignable interest. The rights and things in action arising out of the agreement with Evans, including the profits which would or might be derived therefrom, were in themselves capable of assignment. Civ. Code, §§ 954, 1458; La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 282, 24 Pac. 42, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179; Simmons v. Zimmerman, 144 Cal. 260, 79 Pac. 451; Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 122; Bibend v. Insurance Co., 30 Cal. 86; Bergson v. Builders' Ins. Co., 38 Cal. 544. It mattered not by whom the wheat to load the ships was furnished, nor who furnished the money to buy it. Simpson would still be entitled to charter and address commissions as well as the net profits arising from the sale of the cargoes. In the absence of any levy of legal process, neither appellant nor respondent could have any claim to or lien upon such commissions or profits, save through a contract with Simpson. If there was no assignment to either appellant or respondent, then Evans would be bound to pay any balance in his hands to Simpson. This seems to be admitted; but, whether admitted or not, it stands out as a central, pivotal, incontrovertible fact in this case, from which it follows by simple force of logic that the party who first obtained a legal transfer of his claim or interest in such balance is entitled thereto. As respondent was first in time, it was first in right, unless by force of some legal or equitable rule its right was destroyed or postponed by virtue of the subsequent agreement and acts of appellant and the conduct of respondent with regard thereto.

This brings us to a consideration of the lien claimed by appellant. If we understand the agreement on this point, appellant claims a lien on this fund by virtue of the fact that it furnished the bulk of the cargo loaded on each ship. This fact alone certainly could not, and did not, create a lien on the charter or address commissions, nor on the proceeds of the sale of the grain, which it did not furnish. Nor can we conceive how it could operate to create a lien on any portion of the balance due Simpson from Evans as a result of the venture. Conceding that appellant retained a lien after the warehouse receipts had been surrendered, and during the time the mate's receipts were retained, we think such lien ceased to exist when appellant received 95 cents per cental for grain furnished and delivered the last-mentioned receipts to Evans. Having accepted the approximate market value of the grain, and clothed Evans with every indicia of ownership and right of possession, it retained no evidence or vestige of right to control the property or the proceeds of its sale. Not even the right of stoppage in transitu remained, and the grain was commingled in the common mass composing the cargoes. It was apparently sold in England with other portions of the cargo, indiscriminately, and there is nothing in this record from which it can be ascertained that any definite balance of the purchase price of any part of the cargoes of wheat remained unpaid. No particular portion of the balance in the hands of Evans has been or could be identified as the proceeds of the sale of appellant's wheat, or of the cargoes in bulk; for such balance is less than the charter and address commissions earned, and, inferentially at least, it appears that such balance consists of what remained of such commissions after payment of certain charges. Under such circumstances appellant could have no legal or equitable lien on such balance at common law or under the Code. Civ. Code, §§ 2872, 2875, 2988, 3049; Jones on Liens, §§ 800, 806, 811, 812, 818; Eads v. Kessler, 121 Cal. 246, 53 Pac. 656.

It is said that the agreement between Simpson and appellant gave the latter a contract lien on both cargoes; but our construction of such agreement, and the letter indorsed by Simpson subsequently sent by appellant to Evans, is that Simpson simply assigned to appellant the profits of the venture, less any pro rata due respondent, and that any sum received was to be applied to the satisfaction of a subsisting indebtedness. It is very evident that appellant did not rely on such agreement for security, for throughout the entire transaction it retained the receipts which evidenced its ownership of the grain, and only surrendered them when Evans paid a sum which, under the evidence, was apparently equivalent to the price paid therefor.

Finally, it is urged that respondent was bound to give appellant notice that it held the order, because it knew that appellant was backing Simpson in loading the ships. Our attention has been called to no law requiring such notice, unless the rule embodied in subdivision 3, § 1963, of the Code of Civil Procedure, has such effect. Respondent had seen the letter from Evans wherein he agreed to advance 95 cents per cental for wheat loaded, and was justified in assuming that appellant was pursuing the usual methods followed in such transactions, by taking the receipts as security for the money advanced, and that appellant would not surrender the receipts unless the sum paid by Evans was sufficient to reimburse appellant for money advanced on such security. Under these circumstances respondent was not charged with knowledge that appellant was altering its condition, or would suffer detriment by reason of assistance rendered Simpson in loading the ships, and hence the rule invoked has no application. Besides, appellant knew from the outset that respondent might claim a part of the balance due Simpson, and prudence dictated inquiry as to the nature and extent of such claim. True, it was suggested by Simpson that this claim would be for money due as a pro rata on a little wheat put aboard the ships by respondent; but appellant, having knowledge that there was a claim, cannot excuse its failure to make inquiry by setting up the fact that it was mistaken as to the basis upon which such claim would rest.

Reversal is asked on the ground that the court failed to find on defensive matter pleaded in the answer to the cross-complaint, but we think appellant was not prejudiced by any failure in this regard. The court found all the facts relating to the assignments made by Simpson to appellant and respondent, and it sufficiently appears therefrom that each assignment was supported by a sufficient consideration. We have seen that appellant's ignorance of the existence of the order did not affect respondent's rights under it, and that appellant did not retain possession of the wheat after the receipts evidencing possession and ownership were surrendered. What has been said also clearly indicates that, under the facts proven, the appellant had no lien on any part of the money due Simpson on final settlement, and that its lien on the wheat ended when the mate's receipts were surrendered to Evans. From this it follows that under the evidence any finding in this regard must have been adverse to appellant, and hence no injury resulted to it from a failure to find on such issues. People v. Center, 66 Cal. 564, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; In re Connors, 110 Cal. 413, 42 Pac. 906; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 342, 66 Pac. 309; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 530, 9 Pac. 738.

Error is predicated on the admission of the testimony of the president of the respondent bank to the effect that neither the cashier nor any other agent of the bank had been given authority to finance the vessels or to buy wheat for the purpose of loading them. His testimony, as far as it related to any authority proceeding from him, was certainly competent, and, conceding that the portion of the answer relating to lack of authorization by the board of directors was not the best evidence, we cannot see how such answer resulted in prejudice to appellant. The cashier who dealt with Simpson did not claim to have any such authority. In fact, he denied in toto that any such agreement had been entered into. His authority, or lack of it, was not an essential fact in the case, and, if a finding in appellant's favor on this point was supported by uncontroverted evidence, the result would not be changed. Therefore the ruling, if erroneous, was harmless. Carter v. Meuli, 122 Cal. 367, 55 Pac. 138; Dauphiny v. Red P. Co., 123 Cal. 550, 56 Pac. 451; Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 607, 38 Pac. 443; Chapea W. Co. v. Chapman, 144 Cal. 373, 77 Pac. 996.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BURR v. CROSS.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 10, 1906.)

Frauds, Statute of—Indemnity Contract—Principal Debtor.

Where plaintiff in attachment directed the officer to deliver the property levied on to the plaintiff's servant as keeper, agreeing to save such officer harmless from all liability for any damages that might be done to the property by reason of the keeper's negligence, carelessness, or breach of duty while in charge of the property, such indemnitor was "the principal debtor," within Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2, providing that, where the creditor parts with value or enters into an obligation in consideration of the obligation in respect to which the promise is made, the promise to answer for the obligation of another is deemed the original obligation of the promisor, and was not required to be in writing, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2.

Action by John Burr against A. P. Cross. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Garrett and A. P. Thompson, for appellant. W. C. Petchner and Oscar A. Trippett, for respondent.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,069.30, with interest from August 16, 1900 and costs. There is a statement or bill of exceptions in the record containing the evidence given on the trial, which was that of the plaintiff only; the defendant declining to put in any evidence. The gist of the case as shown by the complaint is: In a suit of the defendant against Laing and others an attachment was issued to the plaintiff, who was then the sheriff of Los Angeles county, and by him levied on certain property of the defendants in the attachment case; and thereupon, on the proposition of the defendant, the attached property was placed in charge of an employé of the defendant as keeper, upon and in consideration of his promise to save the plaintiff harmless from all liability for any damages that might be done to the property by reason of the negligence, carelessness, or breach of duty of such employé while in charge of the property. The attached property remained in charge of the keeper thus employed until January 1, 1899, during which time, by the negligence or misconduct of the keeper, the property, or much of it, was lost, destroyed and otherwise damaged to the amount of $1,000. And thereafter, the attachment having been released, a suit was brought against the plaintiff by the assignee of Laing for damages on account of the loss, consumption, and destruction of the property as aforesaid, and judgment recovered against him for the sum of $1,000 and costs, aggregating $1,069.30, which was paid by the plaintiff.

It appears from the evidence, though not alleged in the complaint, that the defendant was notified of the pendency of that suit and undertook that his attorney should assist in the defense. The court finds that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and this finding, we think, though the contrary is contended by the appellant, is fully sustained by the evidence. The principal point urged by the appellant is, that the promise of the defendant, which was admittedly oral, was void under subdivision 2 of section 1624 of the Civil Code. But we are of the opinion that this contention cannot be sustained. The promise of the defendant was his own, made for his own benefit and upon a sufficient consideration moving to him, and he is therefore to be regarded as "the principal debtor." Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2; section 1605.

Numerous other points are made by the appellant, but none of these, we think, are of any materiality.

The judgment is affirmed.

BILLINGS v. PEARSON.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906. On Rehearing June 15, 1906.)

EJECTMENT—TRIAL—NONSUIT.

Where, in ejectment, plaintiff introduced no evidence tending to show her right to the land, that she had been ousted of her possession by defendant, or that she had any right to eject defendant, a nonsuit was properly granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Ejectment by Miranda S. Billings against James Pearson. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Howard & Wharton, for appellant. J. Frank Brown, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action in ejectment; the plaintiff seeking to eject defendant from a strip of swamp and overflowed land containing 3.19 acres and laying along the bank of the Sacramento river in front of land conceded to belong to the defendant. Appellant introduced her testimony, and when she rested respondent moved a nonsuit, which was granted, and from the order and judgment of nonsuit this appeal is prosecuted.

The defendant's land is in two descriptions, having received it from Johnson by deed at two different times. The calls in the first deed dated April 23, 1867, are as follows: "Commencing at a stake on the east bank of the Sacramento river * * * 150 feet north from the junction of the north bank of the old American river with said last bank of said Sacramento river." The line then runs thence east and thence north and "thence west" to the bank of the Sacramento river; "thence down Sacramento river with the meanderings of said river to the place of beginning, containing 15 acres more or less." There can be no doubt but what the west boundary line of this 15-acre tract is the east bank of the Sacramento river, and the grantor, Johnson, owned no land west of that boundary line. Defendant bought the second piece of 6 acres from said Johnson June 17, 1867, and this is described in the deed as follows: "Commencing at the center of a large oak tree on the edge of the east bank of the Sacramento river about 64 rods north from the junction of the old American river and the Sacramento river; running thence easterly * * * 40 rods; thence south 25 rods to Pearson's north line; thence west * * * to the bank of the Sacramento river; thence to the place of beginning." There is some controversy as to the point of commencement in this last description. The "large oak tree" mentioned as the point of beginning does not seem to have stood on the east bank of the Sacramento river at that time. But the grantor and grantee evidently believed it did, and so intended to include in this conveyance all the land up to the bank of the river. The west boundary of Johnson's land was the east bank of the Sacramento as it existed in the year 1867. From 1867 up to 1898 accretion had formed in front of these lands, and the bank of the river had receded sufficiently to form the land in controversy, as shown by the map introduced by plaintiff. The deed of said Johnson to the plaintiff, made April 16, 1885, contains exactly the same description of the land owned by Johnson prior to his deeds to Pearson, and excepts from such conveyance to plaintiff the land (15 and 6 acres) theretofore deeded to defendant Pearson, the west boundary line being fixed on the east bank of the Sacramento river. The map shows the 3.19 acres in controversy to be located along the east bank of the Sacramento river as it now exists, and immediately in front of the 15 and 6 acres of land of defendant, and is evidently accretions thereto as appears from said map. All these deeds were put in evidence by plaintiff.

The motion for nonsuit was made upon the following grounds: "(1) That the evidence, as introduced by plaintiff, does not show that the land in controversy has at any time ever been owned, or occupied or possessed by the plaintiff. (2) That the evidence does not show that defendant Pearson ever entered upon or ousted the plaintiff from the land in controversy. (3) That the evidence does not show that plaintiff is the owner or possessor, or entitled to the possession, of the land in controversy at the present time, or at the time of the commencement of this action." We do not think there was any testimony at all tending to show plaintiff's right to the land, that she had been ousted of her possession by the defendant, or that she has any right to eject the defendant. There being no testimony tending to show any of these essential matters, we think the nonsuit was properly granted.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

Petition for Rehearing.

BUCKLES, J. We see no reason for disturbing our former opinion in this matter. We think it is clear the west boundary line of defendant's deeds was the Sacramento river, and the calls in his deeds can have no other reasonable construction or meaning.

Rehearing is denied.

CONDE et al. v. DREISAM GOLD MIN. & MILL. CO. et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where complainants assigned a note and mortgage of a corporation to secure money borrowed from a third person, and did not bring suit to foreclose the mortgage until more than a year after incurring the debt for which the note and mortgage were pledged, and until after such debt had been paid, the corporation was not prejudiced by evidence that the corporation was to pay the interest on the money so borrowed, nor by evidence that complainants agreed not to foreclose the mortgage for a year from the time the money was borrowed.

2. PAYMENT—DRAFTS—RETENTION.

Where the maker of a note forwarded a draft for the amount due thereon, which was received and retained by the payee's general agent without any notice that the draft would not be accepted in payment, the retention of the draft operated as payment of the note.

3. PARTIES—MISJOINDER—REMEDIES—DEMURRER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, providing that a defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff may be taken advantage of by special demurrer, and section 434, declaring that if no objection be taken by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same, except as to jurisdiction and insufficiency of facts, defendant waived an alleged misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties by failing to take advantage thereof by special demurrer or answer.

4. JOINT TENANCY—CREATION—SECURITIES—SURVIVORSHIP.

Civ. Code, § 683, declares that a joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, acquired by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared to be a joint tenancy; and section 686 provides that every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common, unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest. Held that, where a note and mortgage were executed in favor of several persons, they held as tenants in common, so that on the death of one the entire title did not vest in the others by right of survivorship.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; Geo. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by James E. Conde and others against the Dreisam Gold Mining & Milling Company and another. From a judgment for complainants, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

John J. Roche, for appellant company. Benj. Healey, for appellant Moulton. J. F. Rooney and Fred Fette, Jr., for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Foreclosure of mortgage executed by defendant company to plaintiffs, the Condes and Leonardini, deceased, in his lifetime, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note for the sum of $9,000, payable to them and made by defendant company. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which, and from the order denying their motion for new trial, defendants appeal.

The court found the following facts: That on May 24, 1899, defendant company executed the note and mortgage in question, payable 30 days after date. James E. Conde's intestate died December 1, 1900, and on March 15, 1902, said Conde was duly appointed administrator of Leonardini's estate. On March 9, 1901, plaintiffs, James E. and Mary K., his wife, borrowed from defendant Mrs. Moulton the sum of $1,500, and executed and delivered to her their promissory note therefor, payable one year after date, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and to secure the payment of the same assigned to her the said promissory note and mortgage first above mentioned. On October 5, 1901, the said Condes paid in full to defendant Moulton the said promissory note for $1,500 and demanded that she execute to them a reassignment of said promissory note and mortgage executed by defendant company, but she neglected and failed to do so. The court further found that defendant Moulton had, at the commencement of the suit, no right or interest in or to said promissory note and mortgage so assigned to her as security, and that plaintiffs are the lawful owners thereof, on which there is due and unpaid the sum of $6,460, with interest from June 24, 1899; that the estate of Leonardini is the owner of one-half the amount of said promissory note and mortgage. The conclusions of law were such as logically followed the facts found, and judgment passed accordingly.

The errors alleged as grounds of the appeal arise out of a rather unusual state of facts not fully disclosed by the findings. It appears that Benjamin Healey was the attorney and general agent of Mrs. Moulton and authorized to act for her as fully as she could act for herself in the matters in controversy. He was also a director and large stockholder in defendant company, and was its attorney at the time mentioned in the transactions involved. In March, 1901, the Condes found themselves in need of money and went to San Francisco to see if they could not induce the defendant company to pay its note or some part of it, then long past due. They went to Mr. Healey, as representing the company, and made known their desire to get at least $3,000. After some delay and some inquiry on his part he informed them that the company could pay them no money, but that he had a client, Mrs. Moulton, who would let them have $1,500, which would tide them over for the present. The Condes were threatening foreclosure of the company mortgage, and Healey was anxious to avoid that and wanted further time. The Condes refused, according to their testimony, to agree to abstain from foreclosing or granting further time, as that would require the execution of new papers. Leonardini was then deceased, and as yet no administrator of his estate had been appointed. The upshot of the matter was the giving by the Condes of the $1,500 note, secured, as found by the court; but it was understood between them and Mr. Healey that they were to pay no interest, which latter was to be paid by the company, and the company did by resolution authorize its payment. It was further understood, according to Conde's testimony, that they might pay the $1,500 note at any time. They returned to their home, and on October 3, 1901, they sent to Mr. Healey for Mrs. Moulton, by their attorney, Mr. Rogers, the draft of the Tuolumne County Bank drawn on the Western National Bank of San Francisco for the sum of $1,500, payable to the order of Mary S. Moulton, which Mr. Rogers stated was in payment of her note, and to meet this draft the Condes deposited with and Tuolumne County Bank this amount, which they never after withdrew. Mr. Rogers also sent Mr. Healey a blank reassignment of the company note and mortgage and requested its execution and return to him with the $1,500 note. Mr. Healey received the draft on October 5th; but, failing to acknowledge its receipt, Mr. Rogers wrote him October 21, 1901, calling attention to the matter. On October 25, 1901, Mr. Healey wrote Mr. Rogers, acknowledging the receipt of the draft and blank assignment, and stated that Mrs. Moulton was out of town, and on her return he would write Rogers. He informed Mrs. Moulton of the draft and talked the matter over with her; but for some unexplained reason Mr. Healey communicated no further, so far as the record shows, with Mr. Rogers or with plaintiffs, but retained the draft, without, however, presenting it for payment, and on March 18, 1902, more than one year after the Conde note was given to Mrs. Moulton, plaintiffs commenced this action to foreclose the company mortgage. Mrs. Moulton was made a party defendant, presumably because she still had possession of the company note and mortgage and was claiming some interest in it. Mr. Healey testified in explanation of the loan by Mrs. Moulton to the Condes as follows: "One object I had then, in furnishing the loan of $1,500 from Mrs. Moulton, so the company could have further time to pay the mortgage, and I bound Mr. Conde, certainly in my own mind, that he could not foreclose inside of 12 months. I had two motives—one to befriend Mr. Conde and the other to befriend the Dreisam Gold Mining Company, of which I was a director and attorney; otherwise, I would not have acted as I did." He testified that the Condes were to pay no interest, and the only material conflict in the testimony was as to the agreement to defer foreclosure of the company mortgage. When pressed to explain why he retained the draft and did not return it, if he did not propose to apply it in payment of the Moulton note, he replied that he could not explain with due consideration for Mr. Rogers, who had died. "Q. You kept it in your possession from October till this day? A. I did not keep it in that sense. It was in my possession. I had it in my possession all the time from the time I got it until I brought it into court (at the then trial). Q. You never said a word to Mr. Conde about returning it, or offered to return it? A. I object to answering that question, on the ground the conversation in regard to that matter occurred with a gentleman now passed away." He also declined to answer whether he had ever offered to return the draft to Mr. Rogers. Being further pressed for an answer, the extent of his reply was: "I have had the check in my possession up to this time. I had no legal duty to perform in returning that check. * * * I considered the security Mrs. Moulton had for the loan of $1,500 was good. * * * I was not anxious about Mrs. Moulton getting her money back. It was not due. We didn't want it. * * * I was acting for the Dreisam Mining Company in this transaction, and it was for its benefit that this transaction occurred."

Mr. Roche, attorney for the company, objected to the evidence of an agreement that the Condes were to pay no interest on the Moulton note. Mrs. Moulton's agent and attorney testified to the fact and made no objection to the evidence. We cannot see of what concern the question was to the company, or, conceding error, how it was injured by the evidence, and without injury there can be no prejudicial error. Nor can we see how either of the defendants was injured by the testimony as to any agreement to defer foreclosure until the time named in the Moulton note had expired, which was one year. The foreclosure suit was commenced March 18, 1902, more than one year after the Moulton note was given. So that every object Mr. Healey had in "befriending" the Condes and the company had been accomplished and the Condes kept faith with Mr. Healey's understanding of the agreement. When this action was brought the Moulton note was past due, and the draft in Mrs. Moulton's hands was available to pay it, and had been for five months. Mr. Healey brought it into court and after the trial obtained leave to withdraw it, indicating that he then, as well as theretofore, expected to make use of it for payment in his own time. Inasmuch as he refused to explain why he retained the draft, or why he did not notify the Condes or Rogers of his unwillingness to accept it as payment, we can only surmise that he wanted the note to run the full year for Mrs. Moulton's benefit, as he regarded the loan as a safe and good one for her. Under all the facts and circumstances disclosed, we think that the draft constituted a payment, and that the court was justified in finding that the Moulton note was fully paid. If the drawer and drawee of the draft should fail before its presentation, after so great a lapse of time, it would hardly be contended that Mrs. Moulton could come back upon the Condes.

It is claimed that there was no legal duty on Mr. Healey to return the draft; citing section 1505, Civil Code, which provides that "if anything is given to a creditor by way of performance which he refuses to accept as such, he is not bound to return it without demand." But in this instance the creditor did not refuse to accept the draft by way of performance. Unless the draft was refused, the duty was on the creditor to return it. Instead of doing so, her conduct indicated its acceptance.

It is further claimed that a draft or check is only conditional, and not absolute, payment of the debt for which it is given, and does not extinguish the debt, unless it is expressly agreed that it shall constitute payment. This is undoubtedly the rule in this state. Comptoir d'Escompte v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28; Dingley v. McDonald, 124 Cal. 90, 56 Pac. 790. But the purpose of the rule is the protection of the creditor, who, if the check be dishonored, may still recover from his debtor. It was said in Blair v. Wilson, 28 Grat. (Va.) 165: "Ordinarily it is only a means of payment, and the debt will not be extinguished unless the check be paid, or unless loss be sustained by the drawer in consequence of the laches of the holder, in which case the debt will be discharged in proportion to the loss sustained. If the check be not paid, and the payee is without fault, his right of action against the drawer for the debt, which has been merely suspended by the giving of the check, revives, and he may have recourse to the drawer, either upon the debt or upon the check, at his option." Mr. Benjamin thus states the rule: "A check is accepted as a particular form of cash payment, and, if dishonored, the vendor may resort to his original claim, on the ground that there has been a defeasance of the condition on which it was taken." Benjamin on Sales (7 Ed.) pp. 755, 772. We do not, however, understand the rule to require that there should be express words or writing of the parties agreeing that the check should be absolute payment. The circumstances and the conduct of the parties taken together may show an express understanding that the check is taken in satisfaction of the debt or estop the creditor from claiming the contrary. As here, for example, the check was sent for the express purpose of payment and was retained under circumstances implying that it was so accepted. It has been held that unreasonable delay in returning a check may make it equal to payment. Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 3 Am. Rep. 690; Mehlberg v. Tisher, 24 Wis. 607. So far as the company is concerned, it has nothing to do with the draft, and is in no wise interested in it or in any question arising out of it. Its sole concern is in the right of plaintiffs to bring the action to foreclose their mortgage.

Upon this branch of the case but one point is made deserving notice, and this goes, not to the merit of the case, but to a technical rule of pleading. The contention is that the company note was owned jointly by James E. Conde, Mary K. Conde, and Luigi Leonardini, and upon the death of Leonardini the cause of action did not pass to his representatives, but vested in the other two by right of survivorship. Section 1431, Civ. Code, is cited, which provides that "a right created in favor of several persons, is presumed to be joint, and not several. * * * This presumption, in the case of a right, can be overcome only by express words to the contrary." Defendant company did not demur to the complaint, and in its answer raised no issue as to the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties plaintiff. Defendant Moulton demurred only on the ground of insufficient facts and as to the pendency of another similar cause of action, as to which there was no evidence. By section 430, subd. 4, Code of Civil Procedure, a defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff is made ground of special demurrer. By section 434 of the same Code it is provided: "If no objection be taken by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same," except as to jurisdiction and insufficiency of facts.

Grounds of special demurrer which were not presented in the trial court will not be considered by the appellate court. Gale v. T. C. Water Co., 44 Cal. 43; Tatum v. Rosenthal, 95 Cal. 129, 30 Pac. 136, 29 Am. St. Rep. 97; Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 42 Pac. 822. See, also, as to misjoinder of causes of action, Roberts v. Eldred, 73 Cal. 394, 15 Pac. 16. See, also, Pomeroy's Code Remedies, *206, *207. Mr. Pomeroy says that a misjoinder of plaintiffs is no defense in an equitable action. Id. *211. See, also, Freeman on Covenants, § 367. Furthermore, the point is not well taken, because the court found, on sufficient evidence, that Leonardini owned a half interest in the mortgage note. We know of no principle by the operation of which his interest would pass to the other payees of the note by right of survivorship. If we should give section 1431 of the Civil Code the interpretation claimed for it, which we should be loath to do, as applicable to an ordinary form of promissory note, still the presumption therein referred to may be rebutted, and, in the present case, the presumption was rebutted by the evidence that Leonardini had a one-half interest in the note and mortgage. Besides, section 683 of the Civil Code provides that "a joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy," etc.; and this section applies to all kinds of property. Denigan v. S. F. Savings Union, 127 Cal. 142, 59 Pac. 390.

Section 686 of the Civil Code declares that "every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common, * * * unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest." Speaking of section 1431, Civ. Code, on which appellant relies, it was said in Denigan v. S. F.

Sav. Union, supra: "This provision has reference, however, merely to the relation between the parties in whose favor the right is created, and the party against whom it is created. It is correlative to the obligation incurred by the party against whom the right exists, but does not purport to determine the interest of the parties in whose favor the right exists as between themselves." Mr. Pomeroy says: "Where two or more persons are jointly interested in the money secured by a mortgage—that is, according to the law prevailing in this country, when they are joint mortgagees, or joint assignees of a mortgage—they must all unite in a foreclosure." Pomeroy's Code Remedies, *255, § 169.

From every viewpoint, as we see the case, the judgment and order should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

BEST MFG. CO. v. COHN.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 25, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court; Beatty, C. J., dissenting. July 23, 1906.)

FIXTURES—ENGINE CONDITIONALLY SOLD TO LESSEE OF LAND.

An engine sold to the lessee of land, the note for the price providing that title should remain in the seller till the price was paid, is personalty, and not a fixture, as between its seller and the lessor of the land, it being removable from the realty without destroying it, and not being necessary to the support of any part of the realty, though it was placed on a solid foundation of cement and bolted thereto and inclosed in a building erected by the lessee, and the lease, providing for the placing of the machinery on the land by the lessee, and for the reversion of the improvements to the lessor in case of breach of covenants, was on record when the engine was furnished to the lessee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; P. J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Best Manufacturing Company against P. C. Cohn. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. S. Wahrhaftig, for appellant. J. J. Scrivner and A. H. Cohen, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action in trover for the conversion by defendant of a gas engine and its attachments and for the recovery of the value of the same.

The action was tried before the court without a jury upon an agreed statement of facts and other evidence, and the court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,400, the value of the engine, and $50 expenses. The findings show that one E. B. Bullock, who was the superintendent of the Prosperity Mining Company, procured of plaintiff one forty-horsepower crude-oil engine, together with the fixtures thereof, consisting of one sparkling dynamo, battery, pulley, shafting and boxes, the price, $2,100, to be paid for in installments, the title to remain in plaintiff until the purchase price was fully paid, and then plaintiff was to sell and convey to Bullock. The agreement was in writing and not recorded. The engine and its attachments were received and set upon land belonging to the defendant but which was then under lease to Prosperity Mining Company. That this machinery was affixed to the said mining land in the following manner: "A solid foundation of concrete or cement was constructed mostly below the surface of the ground. Upon this concrete foundation the said crude-oil engine was placed and securely and solidly bolted thereto and the whole inclosed within a certain portion of a wooden building erected by the said Prosperity Mining Company on the land of defendant." That said machinery could not be removed from the position in which it was placed by said Bullock without the partial destruction of said building and without the removal of said bolts, and consequent injury to said cement foundation. That defendant had no notice or knowledge of the terms and conditions under which said engine and attachments were purchased, and had no knowledge the same was not paid for. The lease between the defendant and said Prosperity Mining Company provided for the erection of certain mining improvements by the lessee, among which was the placing thereon of a mining plant and machinery. The lease also provided that in case of breach of covenants by lessee, the lease might at the option of the defendant terminate, and that the leased land and all the improvements placed thereon revert to the defendant. This lease had been duly recorded prior to the furnishing and setting up of said machinery. That plaintiff directed the placing of said machinery which was placed on said land for mining purposes, and was being so used when this action was commenced. That prior to beginning this action the said Prosperity Mining Company broke some of its covenants in said lease and the defendant terminated the lease and took possession of the land and all the property in controversy. This defendant then commenced proceedings to quiet title to said premises, and procured a judgment, which judgment is now final. That plaintiff here was not a party to said action, as the defendant here did not know plaintiff claimed any interest. That default was made in the payment of the purchase price of said machinery, and on October 17, 1903, the defendant being in possession of said machinery, the plaintiff demanded its return to him, which defendant refused, claiming title thereto and a right to retain possession thereof. The court found the title was in the plaintiff and the value of said property where it is located was $1,400 and that plaintiff had expended $50 in the pursuit of said property.

From these facts and findings it appears that said machinery could have been removed from the realty without destroying it, and that it was not essential to the support of any part of the realty. It was the intention of both the plaintiff and Bullock that this machinery should remain personal property, and there can be no doubt that as between the plaintiff and Bullock the engine and its attachments remained personal property. Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107. The question arose in that case just as it does in this case, can this machinery be regarded as personalty in the hands of the defendant? The court in that case held that such machinery must be so treated, in the hands of the defendant. The facts in Hendy v. Dinkerhoff were identical with the facts in the case at bar, with this exception. In the Hendy Case the plaintiff leased a steam engine to one Lampson with which to run the mining operations on the land of the defendant with whom Lampson had an agreement to purchase the said mining land. At the time plaintiff leased the engine to Lampson he knew nothing of the agreement Lampson had with defendant to purchase the land, and the defendant never knew, until after he had taken possession of the mining land on default of Lampson, of the lease between plaintiff and Lampson, while in the case at bar the lease of the land made by defendant to Bullock was of record when plaintiff furnished the engine and its attachments to Bullock. In Jordan v. Myres, 126 Cal. 565, 58 Pac. 1061, which was an action to foreclose a laborers' and materialmen's lien on a mine and the mining machinery which had been placed there under an agreement with the right to remove the same. At page 567 of 126 Cal., page 1062 of 58 Pac., the court said: "It is settled law that this personal property cannot be treated as part of the realty so far as the owner of the mine and the defendants are concerned," and quotes Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, supra, as authority. But appellant here claims that as plaintiff caused the engine to be placed in the mine in the manner above found and took a note for deferred payments, it thereby consented to the change of the property from personal to realty. But this cannot be, for the note referred to contains the following: "It is admitted and agreed that the said property so intrusted is the property of the Best Manufacturing Company and the legal title thereof is in the said Best Manufacturing Company and shall remain in them until they shall make the aforesaid sale and transfer after the principal and interest aforesaid shall be paid." Whatever may be said by Ewell on Fixtures as to annexation of chattels to realty, can have no application here, where the rule in California seems so well settled. Nor is the rule so harsh a one as appellant seems to think. The defendant recovered back from Bullock all he had given him when he leased him the mine, and in justice could have no right to anything more. If any injury was done to the realty by reason of attaching the engine to it and then severing and taking away, he had his remedy against his tenant. We do not think the suit to quiet title brought by defendant, to which plaintiff was not a party, could affect its right to recover its personal property. Plaintiff at no time made claim of any interest in the premises. Under the rule in the Hendy Case, his property was not a part of the realty, and, therefore, it was not necessary that he should have come into said suit for any purpose.

Judgment affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — EXCAVATIONS IN STREETS—WARNING LIGHTS—NEGLIGENCE —INJURIES TO TRAVELERS—LIABILITY.

Where deceased drove into an excavation in a public street at night, which excavation had been made by defendant street railroad company, and left open without signal, warning lights, or guards of any character to notify the traveling public of its existence, defendant was guilty of negligence justifying a recovery for deceased's death proximately resulting from the injury so sustained.

2. DEATH—DAMAGES—ELEMENTS—LOSS OF SOCIETY.

In an action for death of plaintiff's husband, plaintiff is entitled to recover for loss of deceased's society.

3. SAME — SUPPORT OF FAMILY — PRESUMPTIONS.

Where, in an action for death of plaintiff's husband, it was proved that the domestic relations of plaintiff and her husband for the last 20 years of their married life had been the happiest that could exist, it would be presumed that decedent performed his duty to support his family.

4. SAME—EARNING CAPACITY.

While, in an action for wrongful death, decedent's earning capacity may properly be considered in determining the amount of the verdict, it is not determinative thereof.

5. SAME—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

In an action for the wrongful death of a regular practicing physician 44 years of age, a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $12,000 held not excessive.

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—ILL HEALTH OF WIFE.

In an action for wrongful death of plaintiff's husband, evidence as to plaintiff's ill health was admissible as tending to establish pecuniary loss.

7. SAME—EVIDENCE—COMPLAINTS OF PAIN.

In an action for wrongful death, evidence of complaints, made by deceased of suffering and pain, were admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Felix W. Ewing, Judge.

Action by Annie T. Evarts and others against the Santa Barbara Consolidated Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Trowbridge and Henley C. Booth, for appellant. W. S. Day, E. W. Squier and John Squier, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. Action for damages on account of alleged negligence. Judgment for plaintiffs, from which defendant appeals. The case was tried by a jury upon the testimony of the plaintiffs' witnesses alone; the defendant submitting no evidence. The evidence on the part of plaintiffs tended to show that defendant has caused an excavation to be made in a public street in the city of Santa Barbara, and suffered the same to remain open and unguarded and without signal lights to warn travelers of the danger. That Dr. Evarts, a man about 44 years of age, a practicing physician, who had engaged in such practice for 22 years, while driving upon such public street after dark on the evening of September 18, 1903, was precipitated into such excavation and received injuries from the effects of which death ensued on the 2d day of October following. Dr. Evarts is shown to have been a man of good health previous to the accident, and to have been a kind and indulgent father and an attentive husband to the wife, who was an invalid, and whose physical condition required much personal care and nursing from the husband. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $12,000, for which judgment was rendered.

Appellant's chief contention is based upon specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. An examination of all the evidence discloses ample evidence to warrant a verdict in plaintiff's favor. There was positive testimony and ample facts and circumstances tending to establish that defendant caused the excavation to be made, and there is nothing in the record indicating any authority of the municipality in relation thereto; and, from the record, defendant appears to have made such excavation as a trespasser upon a public street. In addition to this, were we to assume the grant of a privilege for such excavation, no signal or warning lights are shown to have been placed, and no guards placed or precautions taken to notify the traveling public of such excavation; but, on the contrary, their absence is shown. The fact that a witness heard a sudden crash as of "something falling from a height," that there was heard at the same time exclamations and language usually employed by men in the management and driving of horses, and that immediately thereafter deceased, the horse, and a portion of the buggy were found in such excavation, were facts from which the jury might well determine that the deceased had been precipitated into such excavation. Further, that he was in a dazed condition when so found in the excavation; that soon thereafter he complained of pain and injury, was pale, trembling, and unable to attend to his professional duties; that the following day he complained of pain in his left side, of having a smothered feeling, was coughing and spitting up blood; that afterwards, and before his death, bruises about the left side were discovered; that these pains and difficulties increased and continued until his death, which resulted from acute pericarditis, which is shown to be an ailment frequently arising from an injury. From these facts, and from the expert testimony based thereon, it is clear that this man's death was directly attributable to the injury. The jury was fully justified in determining that the death of this man was proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant as charged in the complaint. There is no lack of evidence showing a causal connection between the negligence and the death, as was the case in the numerous authorities cited by appellant.

There was no error in striking from a proposed instruction the words, "nor for loss of the comfort of his society as such." The court had already properly instructed the jury that the loss of his society might be considered in estimating pecuniary damages. The proposed instruction, which was modified, could only be understood as saying that the loss of his society as such was not part of the damages allowable. That such loss of society is a part of pecuniary damages is determined in Dyas v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 296, 73 Pac. 972, and by our Supreme Court in many other cases.

It is also insisted that the amount of the verdict is based upon a mere surmise, conjecture, and guess, and is excessive. This arises from the fact that the actual earning capacity of the deceased was not shown; and it is claimed that it was not shown that he supported his family. As to the last claim, the fact that "the domestic relations for the 20 years of married life had been of the happiest that could exist" certainly indicates that the obligations of support had been performed. As to the question of earning capacity of the deceased, while it may properly be considered in determining the amount of the verdict, the same is not determinative of such amount. Storrs v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 66 Pac. 72. In this case, as in that of Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 96, 34 Pac. 625, and Butler v. Ashworth, 102 Cal. 663, 36 Pac. 922, there was not presented to the jury the value of the services of the deceased to his patients, or the amount of his earnings, yet there was evidence that he was a regular practicing physician, that he possessed a number of patients, some of whom he was attending at the time of his injury, and that he was a strong man in the prime of life; from which facts alone the jury would be authorized to give substantial damages. The amount of the pecuniary loss to the family was for the jury to decide. We cannot say that it was excessive. "It is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the judge is at liberty to interpose his judgment as against that of the jury." Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 164, 47 Pac. 1019. The appellate court is bound by the same rule. Mize v. Hearst, 130 Cal. 630, 63 Pac. 30; Skelton v. Pacific Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 512, 74 Pac. 13.

The evidence admitted as to the ill health of the wife was not improper. Her situation and condition tended in some degree to establish the pecuniary loss sustained. Cook v. Clay Street Hill R. Co., 60 Cal. 609; Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 390, 47 Pac. 139; Keast v. Santa Ysabel G. M. Co., 136 Cal. 260, 68 Pac. 771. The damages to be assessed are plaintiffs' damages; compensation to themselves for pecuniary injury. Webster v. Norwegian Mining Co., 137 Cal. 400, 70 Pac. 276, 92 Am. St. Rep. 181.

There was no error in admitting testimony of witnesses as to complaints made by deceased of suffering and pain. None of the testimony referred to a statement of past condition. Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 390, 47 Pac. 139; Green v. Pacific Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 440, 62 Pac. 747.

There was no evidence of contributory negligence to which instruction 25 was applicable, and it was, therefore, properly refused.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELDRIDGE.

1. HOMICIDE—INFORMATION—CONSTRUCTION.
Where an information charged the unlawful murdering and killing of a human being, to wit, the infant, unnamed female child of defendant and his wife, "the said infant child being the child born to said" defendant and his wife on or before a specified date, the information sufficiently charged that the child was born alive, and was, therefore, not objectionable for uncertainty as to whether the child was killed before or after birth.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS—EFFECT.
In a prosecution for infanticide, defendant's admission or confession of guilt was insufficient to sustain a conviction without independent evidence sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the death of the infant was caused by a criminal or unlawful act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1225, 1226.]

3. HOMICIDE — INFANTICIDE — CORPUS DELICTI.
In a prosecution for infanticide, evidence held insufficient to prove the corpus delicti.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Glover H. Eldridge was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

Alfred Daggett and Chas. G. Lamberson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Daniel McFadzean, Dist. Atty., and R. F. Roth, Deputy Dist. Atty., for the People.

ALLEN, J. The defendant, under an information charging him with murder, was convicted of manslaughter. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial, he appeals.

Appellant contends that the information under which he was tried was uncertain as to the offense charged. This information charged the unlawful murdering and killing of a human being, to wit, "the infant, unnamed female child of said Glover H. Eldridge and Mabel Eldridge, wife of said Glover H. Eldridge, the said infant child being the child born to the said Glover H. Eldridge and said Mabel Eldridge on or about said twentieth day of February, 1905." And it is insisted that such charge might include the killing before birth, and therefore it cannot be determined from the information whether murder or abortion was intended to be charged. The only reasonable construction which can be given to the language employed in the information is to say that it charges that a child born to the defendant was by him unlawfully killed and murdered. That it was born is clearly stated; that it could be killed after birth of necessity implies that it was born alive, and we think the charge of murder was set forth with the degree of certainty required.

Upon the trial of the case, the court properly instructed the jury as follows: "Without independent evidence which satisfies the minds of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the death of the infant referred to in the information here was caused by a criminal or unlawful act, the confession or admission of the defendant of his guilt would not be sufficient to law to warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty." A minute examination of the record, keeping in mind the rule of law above stated, discloses that, independent of the alleged confession, the following facts only were established by evidence which, in any sense, can be termed satisfactory, namely: That a child was born of defendant and his wife; that it died; that before it died, defendant, for the claimed purpose of alleviating the apparent pain of the child, at the instance of his wife, but under protest, administered not to exceed four drops of chloroform, which he dropped upon a handkerchief and placed the handkerchief for a few seconds on the child's face and then removed it; that a moment thereafter the mother requested to see the child, and when the defendant undertook to lift it found it was dead; that thereafter the defendant placed the child in a crude box and buried it in the garden adjacent to the house; that afterwards the body was exhumed and a handkerchief was found over its face, not the same handkerchief, however, used in administering the chloroform. No trace of chloroform was discovered upon the handkerchief found upon the child's face. It is in evidence and undisputed that the amount of chloroform placed upon the handkerchief would not produce death. A post mortem examination revealed nothing as indicating a violent or unnatural death. A few weeks before the birth the mother received an injury from which she suffered pain until the birth of the child. This child had been begotten before marriage. When confinement was imminent, a physician was summoned, but did not arrive until after the birth and burial of the child. An attendant, who was a sister of the defendant, told the physician upon his arrival that it was a premature birth and that the placenta had been removed. The physician, however, visited the sick room and removed what appeared to be a fully developed placenta, or one nearly so. It does not appear that the defendant, although present in the same room, was in a position where he could hear and understand what was said by the attendant to the physician. The foregoing being substantially all of the independent testimony introduced by the people, we are of opinion that the same falls short of establishing the commission of a crime, without the establishment of which no conviction could be had.

Entertaining these views, it is not necessary to discuss the points involved in the admission of the alleged confession, nor of its scope or sufficiency to justify a conviction; nor the many other points raised by the specifications of error. There being no satisfactory evidence of the corpus delicti, the verdict and judgment as a matter of law are erroneous.

Judgment and order reversed.

Ex parte MUNDELL.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 30, 1906.)

INFANTS—CUSTODY—GUARDIANSHIP.

St. 1905, p. 44, c. 43, § 1, relating to the care of dependent children, defines the words "dependent child" to include any child under 16 years of age "found wandering," and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence, or whose home, by reason of neglect, cruelty, or depravity on the part of its parents, guardian, or other person, in whose care it may be, is unfit for such child; and section 3 requires the petition to contain a statement of the facts constituting such dependency, etc. Held, that the fact that a child was without guardianship was only material under such sections as applied to a child found wandering, etc., and that a statement in the petition that her home was an unfit place for her, unsupported by any other statement of negligence, cruelty, or depravity on the part of the person in whose care she was, was insufficient to confer jurisdiction on the court to place her in the custody of another.

Application by Edward Mundell for a writ of habeas corpus to regain possession of his infant child. Writ granted.

Hester & Ladd, for petitioner. D. Allen, Deputy Dist. Atty., and J. C. Rossiter, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Petitioner, the father of a female child, alleges that she is restrained of her liberty by one Dodds, which restraint is unlawful in that the child is so restrained under an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county sitting in special session as a juvenile court under the law of the state relating to dependent children, and that such child is not a dependent child under such act. The return of Dodds shows that, upon the filing of a petition in which it was alleged that said child was of the age of 15 years and was a dependent child under the act approved February 26, 1903 (St. 1905, p. 44, c. 43), in this, "that the said child is without proper guardianship and her home is an unfit place for such child," a warrant was issued, and subsequently upon the hearing the court found said child to be under the age of 16 years, and accordingly ordered the child into the custody of the respondent, as probation officer, to be by him placed in the Home of the Good Shepherd for six months, or until further order of the court; that under such order, and not otherwise, was he restraining such child of her liberty.

The act of the Legislature before mentioned provides (section 1) that "the words 'dependent child' shall mean any child under the age of sixteen years, * * * found wandering and not having any home or any settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence; * * * or whose home, by reason of neglect, cruelty, or depravity on the part of its parents, guardian, or other person in whose care it may be, is an unfit place for such child." The affidavit upon which the proceedings and order were based is insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court. Section 3 (page 45) of the act requires that the petition shall contain a statement of the facts constituting such dependency and shall be verified. The fact that the child was without guardianship is only material under the act as applied to one found wandering. The statement that her home is an unfit place for such child is not supported by any other statement of neglect, cruelty, or depravity on the part of the person in whose care it was. The petitioner's affidavit being insufficient to confer jurisdiction, the order of the court is no justification upon the part of the respondent.

The child, Nellie Mundell, is discharged from the custody of the probation officer, and those in whose charge she has been placed by the said order of the superior court are directed to release her.

PEOPLE v. SULLIVAN.

1. Criminal Law — Evidence — Statements of Third Persons.

In a prosecution for homicide, statements of deceased accusing defendant of inflicting the wounds from which deceased subsequently died, made in defendant's presence, were admissible, not as evidence of the truth of the facts stated, but to show what it was that called for a reply from defendant, and that his silence indicated an acquiescence in the truth of the statements.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 898, 968.]

2. Same—Restraint.

That accused was under arrest at the time the statements were made, and that the police officers refused to permit him to communicate with his companion, who was charged with the same offense, was no excuse for defendant's failure to reply to deceased's accusatory statements.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 898, 949, 968–972.]

3. Same—New Trial—Evidence.

Evidence of accused, given on the trial of his companion, charged with the same offense, after accused had been convicted, was unavailable, on a motion by accused for a new trial, to rebut evidence of witnesses given on his trial.

4. Homicide—New Trial—Newly Discovered Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, accused and his companion were jointly charged with the same offense, but separately tried, and, though accused testified that he did not shoot deceased, he did not testify that his companion did the shooting, it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to refuse to grant accused a new trial for newly discovered evidence, consisting of the affidavit of the companion, after he had been convicted of manslaughter, that he shot deceased in self-defense, and that accused did not aid or abet therein, and was not present, and did not know by whom the shooting was done.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. P. Lawlor, Judge.

Charles Sullivan was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan and W. T. Hume, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree and was sentenced to imprisonment during his natural life. He appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment of conviction.

Joseph M. Sullivan testified: That about midnight of August 10, 1903, defendant and his codefendant, Powell, were fighting one Delehanty near the corner of First and Folsom streets in the city of San Francisco, when Officer Sample came up and separated them, and defendant and Powell went away along Folsom street in the direction of Second street. Sample followed them a short distance, and came back to where he first encountered the parties, and said to witness, "What I should have done was to use my club." The witness told him the affair was over and the best thing to do was "to drop it as it was." Sample said "No," and started after them again. This was the last this witness saw of them. Witness Shanberger, a lodger at No. 545 Folsom street, south side, testified that he heard a noise on the street shortly after 12 o'clock; that he got out of bed and looked out of the window and saw two men standing on the opposite sidewalk; that one of these men shot a pistol twice, and both men ran together along the same side of Folsom street towards Second street and towards the election booth on the street; that one crossed to the south side of the street and the other man on the north side to the election booth, where he lost sight of them. After they had run away witness looked where he first saw them, and he saw a man lying on the sidewalk on the north side of Folsom street. This man was Sample, the deceased, alleged victim of defendant and Powell. There was evidence tending to show that the two men seen by this witness were defendant and Powell, one of whom must have fired the fatal shot. Both were arrested within a very short time after the shooting, and while near to, and in the act of running away from, the scene of the homicide, and were taken to the place where the wounded man was lying. Policeman Nobmann, one of the arresting officers testified without objection that when the prisoners were brought there he asked Sample who shot him, and he replied: "'A man by the name of Sullivan and another man whose name I don't know.' He said: 'The other man I don't know attacked me first.' We asked him—I says to him: 'Are these the two men?' And he says: 'Yes; Sullivan, the smaller man, shot me, and the other man, whose name I don't know, attacked me first.'" This conversation was within hearing of both defendants—standing within four or five feet of Sample—and Nobmann testified that "neither man said anything in response to that." Officer Clark, who arrested Sullivan, gave similar testimony. When first arrested, Sullivan, as Clark testified, pointed to Powell as the man who fired the shots. There was sufficient evidence, as the record stands, to support the verdict, and we do not understand defendant to claim otherwise. His claim is, rather, that the record contains prejudicial error, and particularly that the affidavit of Powell that he, and not defendant, fired the fatal shot, entitles defendant to a new trial, the refusal of which is claimed as error.

1. Immediately following his injuries Sample was removed to the Harbor Receiving Hospital. He was then placed under examination by Dr. Millar, who testified: "I heard a statement by the wounded man in the presence and hearing of the two defendants, while the wounded man was on the operating table. The defendants were in such a position that they must have heard it." Upon being asked what was said by Sample respecting his injuries and by whom caused, in the presence of Sullivan, the defendant, objection was made on the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid, and that the testimony of Police Officer Nobmann "shows clearly it is incompetent." The objection was overruled, and exception taken by defendant. The witness answered: "He said that he went there, was attacked by the two defendants, that they knocked him down and took his revolver away from him, and that Sullivan shot him twice. I don't remember any statement made by the defendant Sullivan, when that statement was made in his presence and hearing. The codefendant Powell, in whose presence and hearing the statement was made, did not, that I remember, say anything." On cross-examination he testified: "Sample talked in an audible voice, distinctly. There could be no misunderstanding of what he said." Witness Flood, assistant warrant and bond clerk in the district attorney's office, was present and endeavored to take down Sample's dying statement. This witness testified somewhat fully to the particulars of the encounter between Sample and both defendants as narrated by Sample. He testified that Sample "positively identified both of the defendants as being the men that were engaged in the struggle with him and the man that shot him. He said, while the grappling and struggling was going on, that Sullivan had shot him. Neither of the defendants made any answer to these statements made in their presence." Witness Duke, lieutenant of police, was present and testified that he heard Sample say that Sullivan shot him and that "Sullivan said nothing in response to that declaration." Officer Nobmann testified to having heard Sample make the statement referred to by the other witnesses and that neither defendant made any reply in response to the accusation of Sample. Defendant does not seriously contend that these witnesses misstated the facts. His contention is that he was under restraint and was not allowed to speak; that he and his codefendant had been roughly admonished by the police officers not to speak; and that the evidence was highly prejudicial as tending to show guilt by remaining silent under circumstances when he was called upon to deny the accusation.

Officer Nobmann was called by defendant as his witness, and, testifying as to Sample's statement and defendant's silence, further said: "I would not permit him or the other defendant to talk together in a whisper or anything I could not hear. These were my instructions from Lieut. Duke, not to allow them to talk in a tone of voice I could not hear. I don't think Lieut. Duke added to these instructions the words 'nor to anybody else.' I told defendants that I would not let them speak among themselves when I could not hear it. Q. Let me refresh your memory upon this point. Page 96 of the testimony in the police court in this case, commencing with the first question at the top of the page: 'Mr. Nobmann, is it not true that Sullivan said, "Hold on, Bob, hold on?" [referring to Sample]. And did you turn around and state: "You shut up, or I will break your face?" A. No, sir. Q. Was anything of that kind said? A. No, no. Q. Nothing at all? A. Nothing at all. Didn't Mr. Sullivan at any time undertake to stop Mr. Sample when he was talking about who shot him? A. No, sir. Q. Did Mr. Powell? A. No, sir. Q. Did Mr. Sullivan or Mr. Powell say anything to any other person there while he was making this statement? A. I couldn't say. Q. You had them in your charge? A. Yes, I had them in my charge certainly; but we wouldn't let them say anything, in fact, to anybody. Lieut. Duke ordered me not to let them talk to themselves.' Did you testify that way in the police court in this city? A. I must have; yes, sir. It was undoubtedly true." Cross-examination (to Mr. Ferral): "As a matter of fact neither I, nor anybody at all, did interfere with their speaking at any time while the statement was being made by the wounded man. Q. (By Mr. Eddy.) Did you, in the court below, testify as follows: 'I had them in charge, certainly; but we would not let them say anything, in fact, to anybody. Lieut. Duke ordered me not to let them talk even to themselves.' Did you so testify in the courtroom? A. I must have. Q. Was it true? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Ferral: Q. Did you in point of fact interfere with them, or either of them, in speaking or saying or doing anything whatever when Robert Sample, the wounded man, was making his statement in their presence and hearing? A. No, sir. The Court: Let me have that testimony. Listen to this, officer: 'You had them in your charge? A. Yes, I had them in my charge, certainly; but we would not let them say anything, in fact, to anybody. Lieut. Duke ordered me not to let them talk to themselves.' You have stated what is down here is true in answer to the question of Mr. Eddy. In reply to the inquiry of the district attorney, you say that you did not prevent them from talking to anybody, except that you would not allow them to talk to themselves. Did you prevent them from talking to any other person? A. Nobody else wanted to talk to them. Q. What do you mean when you say this statement is true: 'Yes, I had them in charge, certainly; but we wouldn't let them say anything in fact to anybody. Lieut. Duke ordered me not to let them talk to themselves?' A. I don't know I don't remember that part of it. The court: Q. Do you modify your statement, then, that you don't recall if they would not let them say anything to anybody? A. The fact is, they were together and Lieut. Duke said: 'Don't let those men talk to each other, except in a tone of voice that you can hear.' Mr. Ferral: Q. Did anybody in any way interfere with them when the statement was made by the wounded man in their hearing? A. Not to my recollection. Q. Would you not recollect it if it occurred? A. I would not be sure as to that—as to whether anybody tried to talk to them or not. Q. Have you any memory of anybody interfering with them or trying to stop them from talking? A. Excepting myself talking between the two of them. Q. I say, in regard to talking in response to what the wounded man said, did you or anybody else interfere with them in any way, shape or manner from answering that? A. Not that I remember; no."

Lieut. Duke was at the bedside of Sample when the statements above referred to were made. He testified: "I asked Sullivan what he knew about this case, and he declined to talk, and shortly after I asked these men the defendants stepped slightly to one side and commenced to talk in an undertone, and I said to officer Nobmann: 'Don't let these men talk unless you know what they are talking about, and, if they have anything to say, let them say it in the open. If they won't speak so that you can hear them, don't let them talk at all.' Officer Nobmann followed that instruction. I then spoke to Officer Sample, and he told me how the thing occurred. It was substantially the same as the statement that he made. He told me in the presence and hearing of these two defendants. I know they were near enough to hear it and did hear it. I took the precaution to tell them, if they could not hear every word that was said, to let us know so that they might hear it. They were seated opposite the body and nearer to the deceased than I was; that is, within a foot or so nearer. I was at the edge of the bed, and Officer Sample's head was at the head of the bed, and they were between Officer Sample and myself. Sample stated that he had received information that a fight was in progress near First and Folsom streets, and he went there; but I don't remember whether he got there before the fight was over or not. But at any rate he felt that it was his duty to place the defendants Powell and Sullivan under arrest, and he was grappling with Powell when the defendant reached for his pocket and took something out of his pocket, and very shortly after that he was shot, and I asked him if it was possible for anybody else to have done the shooting but Sullivan—he mentioned Sullivan's name—and said: 'Do you know Sulivan personally?' and he said: 'Yes.' He said very little else in regard to the shooting. He simply stated that he had been shot and that he knew that Sullivan had done the shooting. He said that Sullivan took something out of his (Sample's) pocket. He did not say anything as to with what pistol he was shot. He did not say anything as to that to me. But his pistol, or rather the pistol, was there in the possession of Officer Nobmann, and I showed him that pistol, and asked him if that was his pistol, and he said that it was, and that it had been in his pocket shortly previous to the time of the fight or the trouble. I can identify the pistol shown me as the same pistol that was shown to Officer Sample, and which he identified as his pistol. I noticed its condition, and there was one empty chamber. I mean to say by that there was no shell in it, and there was three chambers with shells and no bullets, and two chambers with the bullets in that had not been discharged, * * * Sample said that while he grappled with Powell, Sullivan took something out of his pocket and then shot him. When the wounded man made that statement in the presence and hearing of Sullivan, he (Sullivan) said nothing in response to that declaration, and Powell did not say anything to the statement that he (Sample) had grappled with Powell."

Witness Rosa Cozens was a witness for defendant. She testified that, when the defendants were brought to the place where Sample was lying when shot, she heard one of the defendants say that he "didn't do the shooting," and asked an officer if he (defendant) "couldn't send word home," and the officer replied, "No, shut up." Defendant testified that at that time he said to the officer: "I didn't do it. I don't know anything about it"—and was told "to shut up." This, however, occurred some time before the statement was made at the hospital. In his testimony at the trial, defendant said nothing in chief or on cross-examination as to what took place at the hospital. We have only the uncontradicted testimony of the witnesses Duke, Nobmann, Millar, and Flood, who were at the bedside of Sample. On the cross-examination of defendant, the attorney for the people asked him if he did not "hear the officer make any statement that he (Sullivan) shot him while he was grappling with Powell," but defendant's counsel objected, and the objection was sustained, probably because not proper cross-examination.

Powell's trial followed after the conviction of Sullivan and at this latter trial Powell did not testify; but Sullivan, his codefendant, was called as a witness for Powell and gave the following testimony: "Q. Do you remember on the morning of the 11th day of August last? A. Yes, sir. Q. That you were at the Harbor Hospital? A. Yes, sir. Q. During the time that a purported statement came from the lips of Sample—deceased—I will ask you whether or not you were allowed to remonstrate or say anything for or against that statement? A. No, sir; I was not allowed. Q. What was it that the officer said to you? A. They told me to shut up. Mr. Coghlan (Defendant's Attorney): That is all." Why defendant did not give this testimony at his own trial is not explained. The other witnesses, present at the hospital, denied that defendant was told to "shut up." The testimony of defendant given at Powell's trial cannot be considered as rebutting the testimony of the other witnesses as to what took place at the Harbor Hospital. The testimony stands uncontradicted.

We have given this testimony in full, inasmuch as defendant places his claim for a new trial in considerable degree upon the inadmissibility of Sample's statements. Passing, for the moment, the element of restraint alleged to be present in the question, the statements were admissible, not as of themselves evidence of the truth of the facts stated, but simply to show what it was that called for a reply, and the action of the defendant himself under the circumstances, as indicating an acquiescence in, or repudiation of, the truth of the statements. People v. McCrea, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Ah Yute, 53 Cal. 613; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794; People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650. It has been held that silence, when a party is under arrest, does not sustain the hypothesis of acquiescence, because the party is not free to speak. But our Supreme Court holds that an accusation of crime does call for a reply, even from a person under arrest. In People v. Amaya, supra, the question is fully considered by Chief Justice Beatty. So held, also, in People v. McCrea, supra, and People v. Ah Yute, supra.

It remains, then, to consider whether the defendant was prevented from denying the accusation made by the dying officer because of any command to defendant to keep silent by Officer Nobmann, or because of any threatening conduct by Nobmann from which it may be reasonably inferred that defendant did not feel himself at liberty to deny the accusation so circumstantially made against him. It must be remembered that the tragedy occurred some little time before Sample was taken to the hospital. Defendant had full opportunity to reflect upon the course of conduct he would pursue while under arrest. It was not the case of an accusation made by an excited complaining party to an officer in the act of arresting or placing the accused party in confinement, when the circumstances might have accounted for the latter's silence. The wounded officer spoke with the shadow of death resting upon him, and his assailant stood by with all his faculties unimpaired and so situated as to make it most natural for him promptly to deny the charge made against him. He evidently was not a timid person, easily cowed into abject submission or frightened into guilty silence. According to his own testimony, Sample had assaulted him and Powell with a club, and he knocked Sample down just before the latter was shot. The testimony does not show that he was prevented from denying the statement of Sample, or protesting his innocence of having fired the fatal shot. He was forbidden to speak to his codefendant, so as not to be heard by the officers; but we see nothing in the evidence from which it can be inferred that he was prevented from avowing innocence, or denying that he did the shooting, or making any other statement he might have wished to make. He was, on the contrary, invited by Lieut. Duke to state "what he knew about the case, and he declined to talk." His testimony at Powell's trial, that he was told "to shut up," at most is in conflict with the testimony of the other persons present, and is not given in connection with all that occurred at that time, or as to when during the time or in what relation to the attending circumstances he was told "to shut up," if it be admitted that he was so told. And, as above stated, his testimony at Powell's trial has no bearing upon the question here presented. We think the testimony objected to was rightly admitted.

2. It is strenuously urged that a new trial should be granted on the affidavit of codefendant Powell that he, and not defendant, shot Officer Sample. The affidavit of Powell was made after his trial and conviction for the same crime as that charged against Sullivan, and after he was under the protection of the rule of once in jeopardy. He stated that he himself, and not Sullivan, fired "into the body and person of Sample"; that Sullivan "did not aid or abet in any way in the firing of the shots which caused the death of said Sample"; that he did not disclose this fact to any one until after Sullivan's conviction, and that no person knew, prior to Sullivan's conviction, that he, Powell, "would state that he (affiant) did fire the shots that caused the death of said Sample"; that he fired "said fatal shots in self-defense"; that no person other than himself "knew, or could know, that he (affiant) did fire the said shots"; and "that said Sullivan was not there present at the time and place when he (affiant) fired said shots as aforesaid, and could not have known that he (affiant) did fire the said shots." Joseph Mann, bailiff in charge of Powell during the latter's trial, testified that he heard Powell state in the presence of his attorneys that he (Powell) grappled with Sample and in self-defense took his pistol away from him and shot him; that he was asked by his attorneys what he would testify to in his own behalf if he went upon the stand, and thereupon made the above statement. He very prudently refrained from testifying, and was convicted of manslaughter, and when arraigned for judgment requested immediate sentence. At Sullivan's trial, Sullivan testified to the circumstances as they occurred before and after the shooting, as he understood it, and he testified that he and Powell were together when Sample assaulted them; that in the encounter he knocked Sample down, and thereupon he and Powell ran away together; and that the shooting occurred after they had gotten some distance away, as he inferred by some men he saw approaching the place where the officer lay. There can be no doubt but that each of these men knew every circumstance and fact of the affair known by the other. Sullivan testified that he did not shoot Sample, and, whether true or false, he knew whether or not Powell did it. Having this knowledge, it cannot be said that Powell's statement is newly discovered evidence. Powell was intrenched behind his judgment of conviction for manslaughter, which he quickly accepted without moving for a new trial, and was safe from further punishment in his endeavor to serve his codefendant. The trial court was in better position to judge of the truth or falsity of Powell's affidavit than we can be, and the affidavit was to be judged of by the court in connection with all the evidence in the case. People v. Merkle, 89 Cal. 82, 26 Pac. 642.

Defendant's motion for a new trial was addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the presumption is that this discretion was properly exercised in denying the motion; it appearing that Powell's affidavit was in conflict with the testimony of Sullivan and other testimony in the case. People v. Holmes, 126 Cal. 462, 58 Pac. 917. A motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is looked upon with suspicion and disfavor, and a party who relies upon this ground must make a strong case, both in respect of diligence on his part in preparing for the new trial and as to the truth and materiality of the newly discovered evidence. If he fails in either respect, his motion must be denied. People v. Rushing, 130 Cal. 449, 62 Pac. 742. It is true that, with knowledge of what Powell knew, still defendant was in no position to compel Powell to testify, as it would have tended to convict himself. This was an embarrassing situation for Sullivan, and in some respects was similar to the case where a witness is incompetent and subsequently his competency is restored. But the courts have held that in this latter case the disability of the witness subsequently removed would not conclusively entitle the party to a new trial. As was said in People v. Merkle, supra: "Undoubtedly it was the duty of the court below, in passing upon the appellant's motion, to give most careful consideration to those affidavits, and if, when weighed in connection with the evidence given upon the trial, there would be in the mind of the judge a reasonable doubt as to the justness of the verdict, a new trial should have been granted." Each case must be determined by its circumstances, and the new trial granted or refused according to the view taken of the whole evidence, in connection with the alleged newly discovered evidence, as in this case. Granting or refusing a new trial must necessarily rest largely in the discretion of the court in which the trial has been had, and we cannot say, from the record before us, that the court failed to exercise a fair and reasonable judgment in denying the motion.

There are some other assignments of errors in excluding or admitting testimony, but they do not seem to require notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CEDERBURG v. DUTRA.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. Waters and Water Courses — Superior Land Owner—Easements.

The owner of upland has an easement over the land of the lower adjacent proprietor to discharge surface waters over the same, as it is accustomed naturally to flow; the owner of land lower down having no right to interrupt such flow to the injury of the upper proprietor.

2. Same—Water Courses—Sloughs.

Where water flowed in a slough having well-defined banks leading from a river to a creek, such slough constituted a water course, though at some points the channel spread out and the water was quite shallow.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 30.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by S. S. Cederburg against Manuel Dutra. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Bradley & Farnsworth, R. J. Hudson, and J. F. Pryor, for appellant. Irwin & Irwin, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for perpetual injunction restraining defendant from constructing or maintaining a dam in and across a certain channel. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The court, among others, made the following findings: "(4) That there is a water course having its source in Kings river at a point about five (5) miles north of the lands of plaintiff, extending in a southerly direction down to the lands of plaintiff, thence in a southeasterly direction over and across the lands of plaintiff, and down to and over and across the lands of defendant, and thence emptying the waters which flow therein into Cross creek at a point about two miles southeast of the lands of defendant. That at the source or head of said water course, it has precipitous banks ranging from two to five feet in height, and said water course has a well-defined channel from its said course down to and over and across the lands of plaintiff, and down to and over and across and beyond the lands of defendant. (5) That during the irrigating and winter and spring seasons of each year large quantities of water run into and flow along and in and through said channel, and over and across the lands of plaintiff, and thence along and through said channel down to and over and across the lands of said defendant, and that said water course has been in existence and maintained over and across the premises of plaintiff and the premises of said defendant for more than six years last past. (6) That in the northeast corner of said quarter of land owned by said plaintiff there is a depression or swale, and that during the irrigating and winter and spring seasons of each year large quantities of percolating water accumulates and has accumulated in and upon said premises of plaintiff, and that this swale is connected with and forms a part of the channel mentioned and described in finding 4 herein, and that the said plaintiff, in or about the year 1896, for the purpose of draining and freeing his said lands from said percolating waters, and causing the water that flows in the said channel which spreads out in said swale on said plaintiff's land to flow in a more direct and speedy manner over plaintiff's said land and by a shorter route, dug and constructed an artificial ditch, beginning at the east line of his said premises and from a point in said depression or swale extending in a southeasterly direction over and along the lands of one Dorman, connecting said artificial ditch with said water course hereinbefore described, at a point about 200 feet north of the north line of the lands of said defendant, and that said artificial ditch has been kept and maintained by said plaintiff openly, peaceably, continuously, uninterruptedly, and adversely to the defendant and to the whole world for more than six years last past, for the purpose of conducting said percolating water so accumulated in said depression or swale down to and into said water course hereinbefore described. (7) That the defendant threatens to unlawfully, and without the consent of plaintiff, erect, build, and construct across said water course a large dam extending across the entire width of said water course, and of such size and strength and material as to completely obstruct the flow of water running, or which might and will run, in, through, along, and down said water course."

Appellant contends that the evidence fails to show the existence of a natural water course. The court did not, in terms, find the existence of a natural water course, but did find that the channel involved was a water course. The pleadings were framed and the trial seems to have proceeded on the theory that the channel referred to is a natural water course. The distinction is not material, for the definition of a water course, such as is here in question, calls for such a drainway or runoff channel as is the result of natural causes. There was much testimony tending to show that the channel in question has been known in past years as "Burris Slough," and that it formed a natural drainage from Kings river to Cross creek. Witness McQuiddy testified: "I have known that slough for more than 28 years. The head of the slough is on the south bank of Kings river. Its course for a distance is almost south, and then it bears off to the southeast for a mile or so, then runs pretty nearly due south to Cross creek. It [Cross creek] is a natural stream that lays a few miles south of Kings river. Kings river is also a natural stream. This slough received its waters from Kings river and emptied into Cross creek. When I first knew this slough it was a well defined channel." It appeared from the testimony of this and other witnesses that in its course the channel spread out in places and was quite shallow, and again would narrow down to a few feet, with well-defined banks, and so continue on its course to Cross creek, varying in width, but always confining the water in a more or less plainly defined channel to Cross creek, into which it discharged the flood waters coming from Kings river and the rainfall and seepage water which drained into this slough. Many years ago a levee was constructed at the head of the slough on Kings river, which practically shut off the flow into the slough from that river, except in seasons of extreme flood waters; but the slough still remained as a natural drainage for the rainfall and for water seeping or percolating from the bordering land which was being irrigated by artificial ditches. The general character and the natural uses of the slough for drainage purposes were not changed by the levee at its head. The evidence showed that the ditch cut by plaintiff to shorten the channel at the point above defendant's land had for its object the hastening of the flow of water at that particular point, but did not injuriously affect defendant's land. It was stated in Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169, as "settled law in this state that plaintiff as the owner of the upper land has an easement over the lower adjacent land of defendant to discharge surface water as it is accustomed naturally to flow, and defendant had no right to interrupt such flow to plaintiff's injury" (citing cases). It was said in Los Angeles Ass'n v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375: "There must be a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, though it need not flow continually. It may sometimes be dry. It must flow in a definite channel, having a bed, sides or banks, and usually discharge itself into some other stream or body of water. It must be something more than a mere surface drainage over the entire face or tract of land, occasioned by unusual freshets or other extraordinay causes." In Sanguinetti v. Pock, supra, the opinion pointed out the features wanting to make the drainage there involved a water course. But here the features or characteristics of what the law defines to be water course clearly appear, and we think the evidence supports the findings.

It is not necessary to consider whether or not the finding that the ditch cut by plaintiff has been in adverse use for more than the statutory period is sustained by the evidence. The findings as to the water course and its natural adaptation for drainage of the riparian land are sufficient to support the judgment. Appellant calls attention to the recent case of Wood v. Moulton, 146 Cal. 317, 80 Pac. 92. An examination of the facts in that case will show that there was no pretense of the existence of a natural drainage channel by which the water complained of was accustomed to flow across plaintiff's and defendant's lands.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

STATE v. CAMPBELL.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. VENUE — PLACE OF TRIAL — CHANGE OF VENUE—ACTIONS BY STATE.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395, 396, declaring that all actions for the recovery of money must be tried in the county where the defendant resides, unless he directly or impliedly consents to a trial elsewhere, is applicable to an action by the state to recover money which came into defendant's hands in his official capacity as medical superintendent of one of the state insane asylums, notwithstanding Pol. Code, § 433, subd. 16, enumerating the duties of the Controller, and declaring that he shall have the right to institute suits in the name of the state against persons who have become possessed of public money or property and fail to pay over the same, of which suits the courts of "Sacramento county have jurisdiction, without regard to the residence of the defendants."

2. STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — CODES — CONFLICTING PROVISIONS—VENUE OF ACTIONS.

Pol. Code, § 4481, provides that, if the provisions of any title conflict with another title, the provisions of each title must prevail as to all matters arising out of the subject-matter of such title. Pol. Code, § 433, relates to the duties of the Controller. Code Civ. Proc. § 395, relates to the place of trial of civil actions. Held that, if any controversy is created between such latter sections as to the place of trial of an action by the Controller, section 395 must control.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by the state, by E. P. Colgan, as Controller, against M. B. Campbell. From an order changing the place of trial to the county of defendant's residence, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George A. Sturtevant, for appellant. J. W. McKinley, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This action was commenced in the superior court, in and for the county of Sacramento, to recover certain moneys which came into the hands of respondent in his official capacity as medical superintendent of one of the state asylums for the insane. In due time and form respondent, who was at the time the action was commenced a resident of Los Angeles county, made his motion that the place of trial be changed to the county of his residence, and this appeal is from the order granting said motion.

There can be no doubt that as a general rule all actions for the recovery of money must be tried in the county where the defendant resides, unless he directly or impliedly consents to a trial elsewhere. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395, 396. It is, however, contended by appellant that a contrary rule, applying to actions such as the one at bar, is declared in subdivision 16 of section 433 of the Political Code. The provision relied upon is found in a section of the Code defining and enumerating the duties of the Controller of this state, and reads as follows: "To direct and superintend the collection of all moneys due the state, and institute suits in its name * * * against persons who, by any means have become possessed of public money or property and fail to pay over or deliver the same, and against all debtors of the state, of which suits the courts of Sacramento county have jurisdiction, without regard to the residence of the defendants." We can see nothing in this language which changes the general rule, or excepts actions commenced by the state from its operation. There is no hint that the jurisdiction thus conferred is exclusive, nor is it provided that actions therein mentioned must be tried in Sacramento county. The subdivision is entirely silent on this point, and no intention to change the ordinary rule governing the place of trial is manifested. The main, central object of this provision is to give the Controller power to institute certain suits in the name of the state, and it seems to us that, given a reasonable construction, the clause in question simply means that such suits may be instituted in the county where the seat of state government is located, and where the Controller has his official residence. Pol. Code, §§ 145, 852. The section in which the subdivision is found relates to the general duties of the Controller, and that is certainly one of the last places where an attorney or judge would look for a law governing the place of trial of civil actions. On the other hand, section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure is found in a title which deals exclusively with that subject, and it would be a radical departure from cardinal rules of construction to hold that the express and definite provisions of that and the succeeding sections of the same title are modified, controlled, or nullified by implications drawn from a provision which is not only silent on the point, but has no relation whatever to the subject-matter dealt with in said section. Lewis' Sutherland's Statutory Construction, §§ 443, 447, 448, 491; Code Civ. Proc. § 4; Pol. Code, §§ 4, 4480 et seq.; Warner v. Warner, 100 Cal. 16, 34 Pac. 523; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 607, 2 Pac. 418. There can be no doubt that the provisions of section 395 apply directly to all cases not provided for in the three preceding sections, and adopting a construction which avoids conflict, and gives harmonious effect to the provisions of both sections under consideration, we think the court had power, on proper application, to change the place of trial. This power was directly recognized in People v. Plumas, Eureka M. Co., 51 Cal. 566, when the court considered the merits of an application to change the place of trial on the ground of the convenience of witnesses. True, the application passed upon in that case was also based on the ground that the defendant resided in San Francisco; but the court held that the place of residence conferred no right to a change of venue because the action fell within the terms of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, and was, therefore, expressly excluded from the operation of section 395 of the same Code. The distinction between the jurisdiction of courts, and the right to have the action tried in the county of defendant's residence, is exemplified in a number of cases, where it was held that, although the court where the action was commenced undoubtedly had jurisdiction, the defendant was nevertheless entitled to have the place of trial changed. Hancock v. Burton, 61 Cal. 71; Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 604, 38 Pac. 443; Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 314, 57 Pac. 1012; Warner v. Warner, supra; Security L. Co. v. Kauffman, 108 Cal. 222, 41 Pac. 467.

There is another reason why the order of the court must be sustained. Section 4481 of the Political Code provides that, "if the provisions of any title conflict with or contravene the provisions of another title, the provisions of each title must prevail as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such title," and there is a provision common to the Code of Civil Procedure and the Political Code which recites that each establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates. Code Civ. Proc. § 4; Pol. Code, § 4. If appellant's construction of section 433 of the Political Code be adopted, then, necessarily, there is a conflict between that section and section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, if each is to prevail on all matters and questions embraced in the respective titles, then the former controls as to the duties of the Controller, and the latter as to the place of trial of civil actions. Odd Fellows S. B. v. Banton, 46 Cal. 609; People v. C. P. R. R., 83 Cal. 397, 23 Pac. 303; In re Bergin Estate, 100 Cal. 377, 34 Pac. 867; Fessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 487. Appellant seeks to avoid this conclusion by arguing that section 395 does not apply to actions brought in the name of the state; but we think that the words "in all other cases" embrace every form of action, no matter by whom brought, not included in the three preceding sections. Watkins v. Degener, 63 Cal. 500; Thurber v. Thurber, 113 Cal. 610, 45 Pac. 852; Hennessey v. Nicol, 105 Cal. 140, 38 Pac. 649. If we could see anything in the section which would operate to trench upon the sovereign rights of the state, or "injuriously affect its capacity to perform its functions," we would be forced to the conclusion that it could have no application to actions brought by or against the state. But we cannot imagine how the sovereign rights or prerogatives of the state can be impaired by giving every citizen the privilege of having actions brought against him by the state tried in the county of his residence. And we are particularly at sea as to the reasons which would make such injurious consequences attend suits instituted by the Controller, rather than by the Attorney General or other officer authorized to sue in the name of the state. The state, through its legislative branch, has said that all cases not embraced in sections 392, 393, 394, Code of Civil Procedure, must be tried in the county where the defendant resides, and in the absence of some specific provision to the contrary, we think this must be construed as applying to the state, whose consent is at least implied. Green v. U. S., 9 Wall. (U. S.) 655, 19 L. Ed. 806; People v. Blankenship, 52 Cal. 619; Green v. State, 73 Cal. 32, 11 Pac. 602, 14 Pac. 610; People v. Noyo, 99 Cal. 461, 34 Pac. 96; Fink v. O'Neil, 106 U. S. 272, 1 Sup. Ct. 325, 27 L. Ed. 196. Many cases may be found where general laws relating to procedure have been held applicable to the state; but it will only be necessary to refer to a case cited by appellant, where the necessity for service of notice of appeal in cases where the state was appellant is discussed. S. F. L., etc., Co. v. State, 141 Cal. 358, 74 Pac. 1047.

Eliminating section 433 of the Political Code from consideration, it would hardly be contended that section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, does not apply to actions by and against the state, and, as the provision thus excluded from consideration does not declare to the contrary, it results that the rule in this regard is not changed.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BUCKLES, J.

3 Cal. App. 548

In re HEENEY'S ESTATE.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906.)

1. ADMINISTRATORS—ACCOUNT—CREDITS.

Where certain heirs, including the administrator subsequently appointed, paid $250 on debts secured by a mortgage on intestate's family residence for the express purpose of obviating the necessity of probate proceedings, which all the heirs were seeking to avoid, he was not entitled to credit, in his account as administrator subsequently appointed, for the amount of such payment.

2. SAME—CLAIMS—ALLOWANCE TO ADMINISTRATOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1493 et seq., providing that all claims against decedent's estate must be presented and allowed before the administrator could have "rightful authority" to pay them, a payment made by the heirs of an intestate on a mortgage indebtedness owed by the latter, prior to the appointment of one of such heirs as administrator, was not validated by such appointment.

3. ASSIGNMENTS—EQUITABLE ASSIGNEES.

Where two of the heirs of an intestate paid a debt secured by a mortgage on the family residence of the intestate, and procured the note and mortgage to be assigned to their sister, such heirs became the equitable assignees of the mortgage lien and claim.

4. COURTS—PROBATE COURTS—JURISDICTION.

While probate courts in the settlement of estates have all the powers of a court of equity to determine conflicting interests of heirs or lienors, such interest cannot be determined, except in appropriate proceedings under proper pleadings.

5. ADMINISTRATORS — CLAIMS — ESTABLISHMENT.

Claims of an administrator for reimbursement for moneys expended before his appointment cannot be established by his uncontradicted evidence, especially where such evidence and the assignment presented as his voucher show on the face of the record that the legal claim or right is in another, whose rights have not been foreclosed as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1632.

6. SAME—SUITS BY HEIRS—EXPENSES.

Where heirs of an intestate joined in a suit to remove a cloud from the title to their property, expenses incurred in such litigation, though it was successful, did not constitute a proper charge against the estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Judicial accounting by Richard J. Heeney, as administrator of the estate of Richard Heeney, deceased. From a judgment allowing certain credits, certain heirs appeal. Reversed.

J. J. Fitzgerald, for appellants. R. C. Minor, for respondent Merz. Asilley & Neumiller, for respondent Walter.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Richard Heeney died intestate in 1892, leaving five children, who were his only heirs. Of these children Mary E., died in December, 1896, William in April, 1900, Lulia A. in May, 1901, and Walter in April, 1903. The only survivor, Richard J., is a respondent herein, and the husband and child of Lulia A., as her sole heirs, are appellants. William left a widow, but neither Mary nor Walter were ever married. By reason of a tacit understanding or agreement among the heirs, no administration was had upon the father's estate until March 8, 1901, when letters were issued to the respondent. The only property consisted of the family residence or home, and up to May, 1903, it was used as the residence and home of the family under a mutual agreement between them. From May, 1903, until February, 1904, the home was occupied by the appellant and his child. When Richard Heeney died his property was mortgaged for the sum of $500, and in 1895 the two adult sons, William and Richard J., paid the mortgage debt and caused the mortgage to be assigned to their sister Mary under an agreement, and pursuant to the advice of their attorney that it should be assigned to the oldest member of the family. Before her death Mary assigned this mortgage to Lulia, in whose name it now stands of record. Up to the time of William's death he and respondent also paid all taxes levied upon the property, and after the death of William the respondent paid all taxes, except those levied for 1904, which were paid jointly by respondent and appellant pursuant to an agreement had between them. Certain actions to foreclose liens for street work had been pending for some time, and in 1900 respondent employed and paid an attorney to defend these suits and prosecute an action to quiet title brought by the surviving heirs against the Pacific Paving Company, a corporation claiming a lien on the property. The litigation was carried to a successful issue, but certain costs paid by respondent were not recovered by him. In his final account as administrator of his father's estate, respondent claimed credit for one-half of all sums paid by himself and William, and the full amount paid by him individually as above mentioned, and also inserted items of credit for interest on the sums so paid. In the report accompanying his account he alleged that all of these payments were made for the benefit of the estate and with the consent of the other heirs. The appellant in his individual and representative capacities filed exceptions to these items in the account and asked that certain expenditures made by him for the benefit of the estate be also allowed. The court refused to allow the administrator credit for sums paid for taxes on the mortgage, or for constructing a sidewalk on the premises, and also disallowed all charges for interest on these and other amounts expended by respondent. He was, however, credited with the amount paid by him in satisfaction of the mortgage, and for taxes on the property, and also for sums paid out by him for attorney's fees and costs in the litigation with the paving company. The contestant appeals from the order settling the account upon a bill of exceptions containing all of the evidence presented at the hearing. This evidence consists wholly of the testimony of respondent, and tax and other receipts, which, with the written assignment of mortgage to Mary E. Heeney, were presented by him as vouchers. No claim for any of the amounts was ever presented by the administrator, and the appellant contends that the court erred in allowing the various items above mentioned.

It is claimed by respondent that his appointment and qualification caused his letters or authority to relate back to the time of his father's death, thus validating all of his acts before such appointment, which were, in their nature, beneficial to the estate, and which would come within the scope of an administrator's rightful authority. That this rule obtains in many jurisdictions cannot be doubted. Schuler on Executors, § 195; Woerner's Am. Law of Administration, § 173; 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (1st Ed.) p. 193. But, in view of our specific and comprehensive Code provisions regulating the settlement of estates, there can be very little room for the application of such a rule in this state. Granting, however, that it can have force here under proper conditions and circumstances, we are of the opinion that the court erred in allowing the item of $250 paid on the debt secured by mortgage on the property. To begin with, the testimony of respondent himself shows that such payment was not made with any thought of a subsequent administration of the estate. On the contrary, according to his version, the very object for which this and other payments were made, was to dispense with the necessity of probate proceedings which all of the heirs were seeking to avoid. It would indeed be passing strange if acts done with deliberate intent to avoid compliance with the forms of law could receive the sanction of the law whose mandate the actor sought through such acts to evade. Great stress is laid upon the alleged fact that this desire and agreement was mutual and that all heirs consented to the payments made and further agreed that the money should be refunded. Waiving the self-evident fact that the minor heir could neither lend assent to the payment nor to an agreement of any kind, the most formal agreement could not dispense with the usual and ordinary procedure fixed by law for settling the estate of a deceased person. Estate of Strong, 119 Cal. 667, 51 Pac. 1078. We have found no case, and believe none can be found, where the rule invoked was applied under the circumstances disclosed by this record. There are other cogent reasons why the item under consideration should not have been allowed as a credit in the administrator's account. Under the system obtaining in this state there can be no doubt that all claims must be presented and allowed before the administrator can have "rightful authority" to pay them. Code Civ. Proc. § 1493 et seq. It is possible that after an action to foreclose a mortgage has been commenced, as provided in section 1500, of the aforesaid Code, the administrator might be authorized to compromise or fully pay the demand without such presentation or allowance. But, even if this be true, this single exception to the general rule that no action against an estate will lie unless a claim has been presented cannot be construed as conferring upon an administrator sweeping general authority to pay all debts secured by mortgage without either presentation or suit. Therefore, under the rule invoked, and certainly under the provisions of our Code, no payment made by a person without authority can be validated when the same payment, if made by a duly qualified administrator, would not be sanctioned or allowed in his account. Taking the view most favorable to respondent, he and his brother William became the equitable assignees of the mortgage lien and claim, when they paid the debt and procured an assignment of the note and mortgage to their sister. If a stranger had paid the money and procured the assignment of the mortgage and debt to another, there could be no question that he would at least be required to present his claim or proceed under section 1500, supra. In fact, a suit to which the legal assignee was a party would be indispensable to a proper adjustment of rights involved and to the protection of the estate. If this be true, then certainly the mere fact that the legal as well as the equitable assignees were heirs cannot operate to dispense with formalities required in the matter of simple claims attended by no such complications. Considering the fact that the mortgage now stands unreleased in the name of one of the deceased heirs, and that the heir of William has an equitable interest as great as that held by respondent, it must be apparent that the respective rights of heirs and the estate could not be adjudicated or conserved in a proceeding like the one under review. While probate courts have all the powers of a court of equity in the settlement of estates, the conflicting interests of heirs or lienors, no matter what their nature or origin, can only be determined in an appropriate proceeding under proper pleadings. Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 26 Pac. 206; Guardianship of Breslin, 135 Cal. 22, 66 Pac. 962; Thellar v. Such, 57 Cal. 459; Buckley v. Superior Court, 102 Cal. 8, 36 Pac. 360, 41 Am. St. Rep. 135. The necessity for such a proceeding is very apparent here. In the proceeding for the settlement of the final account the rights of the parties could not possibly be conserved or adjusted. It is manifestly unjust that respondent have an opportunity to recoup, while the heirs of William get nothing, and it is equally as unjust to credit him with taxes paid and deny appellant a like credit. It is said that no claim for the outlay made by William was ever presented, but the obvious answer to this is that, if the presentation of a claim was necessary to secure reimbursement for the widow of William, then respondent as his coassignee can occupy no more favorable position. One thing is certain, and that is that the law does not contemplate that the claims of an administrator for reimbursement for moneys expended before his appointment can be established by his uncontradicted evidence, especially when such evidence and the assignment presented as his voucher, show that on the face of the record the legal claim or right is in another whose rights are not foreclosed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1632; Horton v. Jack, 115 Cal. 29, 46 Pac. 920.

We cannot see how the expenses incurred in the suit brought by the heirs can be considered or allowed as charges against the estate. If heirs choose to bring suit to remove a cloud from their title to property, no one can object; but the expenses of such litigation are to be adjusted and paid by the parties to the action, and not by the estate of which the property forms a part. To hold otherwise would be to make an estate liable for expenses and costs which could not be controlled or measured by an administrator or executor, and invite confusion, if not absolute waste, in the settlement of estates. It may be that attorney's fees paid by the administrator in defending the suit brought in his father's lifetime were properly allowed. The evidence is meager as to the time and circumstances of such payments. If the liability therefor was incurred after his father's death, and the employment of an attorney was necessary to safeguard the interests of the estate, they should be allowed under the rule first considered herein. The same may be said of taxes paid by the administrator; but it may be remarked that in our opinion the probate court may, under proper petition, adjust the rights of the other heirs who are equitably entitled to reimbursement for taxes paid by them or those under whom they claim.

The order is reversed.

3 Cal. App. 619

TITLE GUARANTEE & TRUST CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 16, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 13, 1906.)

1. TAXATION — MONEY HELD BY ONE AS AGENT OR TRUSTEE.

Money given by one having a contract for purchase of land to plaintiff, employed to pass on the title, to be paid to the vendor or returned to the purchaser, with deduction for charges, according to the result of the search, and which is deposited by plaintiff in a bank, is in plaintiff's possession and control, within Pol. Code, § 3628, providing for assessment of property to one in whose possession or control it is.

2. SAME — ASSESSMENT TO AGENT OF UNKNOWN PARTIES.

An assessment to plaintiff, "Escrow money in Merchants' National Bank, $55,000," is in effect to him as agent or trustee of parties unknown to the assessor, as is proper under Pol. Code, § 3628; plaintiff not having in his statement to the assessor disclosed the facts as to the money, as under section 3629 he should have done, so as to enable the assessment to be made under section 3639 to plaintiff as agent or trustee of the various persons interested in the money.

3. SAME—DEDUCTION FOR DEBTS.

The obligation of one on account of money in his control as agent or trustee is not that of debtor, so as to require a deduction of the amount thereof from his assessment.

4. SAME—CORRECTION OF ASSESSMENT.

One who is assessed with money in his control as agent may, after he has paid the tax under protest, have the assessment corrected by the supervisors to show the principal ultimately liable for the tax.

Action by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company against the county of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and W. P. James, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., for appellant. John D. Pope, for respondent.

SMITH, J. This is a suit to recover taxes paid under protest. The case as shown by the admitted allegations of the complaint and stipulations of the parties, is: A verified statement of property for taxation for the year 1904, showing deposits to the amount of $3,650, and no more, had been given in to the assessor by the plaintiff; and afterwards there was included in the plaintiff's assessment by the assessor the following item: "Escrow money in Merchants' National Bank, $55,000." The latter amount was held by the plaintiff as agent or trustee for the owners and purchasers of various tracts of land (22 in number) whose titles it had been employed to pass upon, and was to be paid to the owners or returned to the purchasers (with deduction of charges), according to the result of the search.

The question involved is whether this property was assessable to the plaintiff; and this question, we think, must be answered in the affirmative. The money was undoubtedly in the possession and control of the plaintiff as agent or trustee of the various parties interested in it. It was, therefore the duty of the plaintiff to return it in its statement, and the duty of the assessor to assess it to the plaintiff, or the equitable owners, if accessible. Pol. Code, §§ 3639, 3628; People v. National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co., 123 Cal. 52, 55 Pac. 685, 45 L. R. A. 747, 69 Am. St. Rep. 32; Bode v. Holtz, 65 Cal. 106, 3 Pac. 495. In the case of Weyse v. Crawford, 85 Cal. 196, 24 Pac. 735, it was, indeed, held that goods on storage in a warehouse for which warehouse receipts had been issued were not subject to what is called an arbitrary assessment to the warehouseman under the provisions of section 3652 et seq. of the Political Code. But this did not affect the right and duty of the assessor to assess this property as required by section 3628 of that Code. People v. Nat. Bank of D. O. Mills & Co., supra. The case is also different from this in other essential circumstances; for here the property assessed was not tangible property that could have been asesssed to unknown owners and siezed and sold by the assessor, but was a fund consisting of credits due from the bank to the plaintiff, over which it had in fact absolute control as agent or trustee of the parties interested in the fund.

Nor was the property taxed subject to any deduction on account of debts due from the plaintiff. Its obligation to the various parties interested in the fund was not that of debtor, but of agent or trustee. Hence, had the facts been disclosed to the assessor by the plaintiff, as under the provisions of section 3629 they should have been, the assessment should have been made to it as agent or trustee of the various parties interested in the fund. Pol. Code, § 3639. But in the absence of this information, the assessor had no other resource than to assess the property to the plaintiff, as required by section 3628, as agent or trustee of parties unknown to him which he in effect did. Nor are we prepared to hold that, under the circumstances, the failure of the assessor to designate the plaintiff's principals or beneficiaries was sufficient to invalidate the assessment. It had the opportunity of correcting the defect, if in any way harmful to it, by application to the assessor while the assessment roll was still under his control, or afterwards by application to the board of equalization, which had power to correct the plaintiff's assessment, either by adding the names of the parties ultimately liable or by transferring the whole amount taxed to the assessments of the several parties interested in the fund. Pol. Code, § 3681; Henne v. County of Los Angeles, 129 Cal. 297, 61 Pac. 1081.

Nor do we think it material that the plaintiff had no opportunity of applying to the board of supervisors until after its property was levied upon and the tax paid under protest. All the relief it was entitled to was to have the assessment corrected so as to show the parties ultimately liable, and this could have been done by the supervisors as effectually after payment as before.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

PEOPLE v. STAPLES. (Cr. 1310)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Pleading—Not Guilty—Withdrawal—Right to Move.

A defendant is entitled notwithstanding a plea of not guilty to move at any time before trial for leave to withdraw it for the purpose of demurring to, or moving to set aside, the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 687.]

2. Same—Motion.

Where, after accused had pleaded not guilty, he moved for a continuance and for leave to withdraw the plea for the purpose of moving to set aside the indictment, but the motion contained no showing that any ground existed on which such motion might be based if an opportunity to present it were granted, the denial of the motion to set aside the plea was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 687.]

3. Same—Renewal of Motion.

Where a motion for leave to withdraw a plea of not guilty for the purpose of attacking the indictment was denied, accused was not entitled as of right to renew the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 687.]

4. Same—Proof.

A second motion for leave to withdraw a plea of not guilty for the purpose of attacking the indictment was properly denied where there was no showing of ignorance on the part of counsel of the facts on which the second motion was based when the first one was made.

5. Same—Discretion.

A motion to set aside a plea of not guilty, and for leave to attack the indictment is within the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 687.]

6. Same—Change of Venue—Hearing—Provisional Denial.

Where the court denied a motion for a change of venue with leave to renew the same if the facts disclosed on the impanelment of the jury should further warrant the same, defendant's failure to renew his motion operated as an abandonment or waiver thereof.

7. Homicide—Corpus Delicti—Evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide circumstantial evidence held insufficient to establish the corpus delicti.

8. Same—Motive.

Where, at the time of an alleged arson, defendant's wife was not at the place where the fire occurred, and knew nothing concerning the same, evidence of the destruction of certain premises rented by defendant by fire was inadmissible for the purpose of establishing a motive for the killing of his wife.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; R. C. Rust, Judge.

F. N. Staples was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

Wm. G. Snyder and A. Caminetti (William J. McGee, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, and C. P. Vicini, for the People.

LORIGAN, J. The defendant was indicted for the murder of his wife in Amador county, convicted, sentenced to death, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Many grounds are urged for a reversal, but it is mainly insisted that the verdict of the jury was not warranted from the evidence.

Before we approach the consideration of this claim, however, it is necessary to dispose of other points raised by defendant prior to the actual trial, which were ruled on adversely to him, and upon which he predicates error. These points are that the court erred in refusing to grant the motion of defendant to be permitted to withdraw his plea of not guilty, so that he might move to set aside the indictment filed against him, and also erred in denying his motion for a change of venue.

As to the motion to permit a withdrawal of his plea. It appears that upon the arraignment of defendant, March 9, 1905, he was represented by an attorney, and the time for receiving his plea continued until March 11, 1905, at which date he entered a plea of "not guilty," and the time for trial, by consent of said attorney, was fixed for April 10, 1905. Neither at that time, nor prior thereto, was any suggestion made that defendant desired to move to set aside the indictment, nor was any motion of that character interposed. Subsequent to the arraignment and plea, defendant having procured additional counsel, they gave notice that on March 27, 1905, they would move the court to grant a continuance of the time of trial for a month and to permit defendant to withdraw his plea of "not guilty," and make such motion relative to the indictment as he might be advised, said motion being based on the grounds that defendant could not prepare for trial on the day set, and that the plea of "not guilty" was inadvertently entered. The motion was based upon affidavits which were addressed mainly to a showing for a continuance, although as to the motion for leave to withdraw the plea it appeared therefrom that the attorney representing defendant on the arraignment, and at the time he pleaded was inexperienced and unacquainted with the practice in criminal procedure, and for that reason it was claimed failed to make a motion to set aside the indictment before the defendant pleaded. Upon the hearing the court granted the motion for a continuance, but denied the motion to allow a withdrawal of the plea. As there was no proper showing addressed to the motion to withdraw the plea of "not guilty," and be permitted to interpose a motion to set aside the indictment—nothing to show that there existed any ground upon which such motion might be based if an opportunity to present it were granted—the order denying the motion to set aside the plea was correctly made. Undoubtedly a defendant has a right, notwithstanding a plea of not guilty is interposed, to move at any time prior to the trial for leave to withdraw it for the purpose of demurring or moving to set aside the indictment (People v. Villarino, 66 Cal. 230, 5 Pac. 154), but he has no absolute right upon motion to have the order made, and whether it shall be granted or not is a matter resting in the discretion of the court, to be exercised upon proper and sufficient showing, and it cannot be said that such discretion is abused where a bare motion to be permitted to withdraw the plea and attack the indictment is presented without any suggestion or showing that, if granted, the defendant has any grounds whatever upon which to base the motion which he claims he desires to interpose. It would be an idle act upon the part of the court to further delay the trial of a cause, which has advanced so far as to have the plea of the defendant entered, by granting a motion to withdraw that plea, and permit an attack upon the indictment, without any showing at all that valid, reasonable or even any disputable grounds existed upon which an attack could or would be based. While inexperience of counsel may supply a reason why the motion to set aside was not made before the plea of defendant was entered, it in no wise tends to show that there then existed any grounds upon which a motion could have been based had he been more experienced in criminal procedure. The showing of inexperience should have been supplemented by some showing by affidavit of the existence of facts or grounds upon which a motion to set aside the indictment could have been based had his counsel been advised of the legal right of defendant to do so, or at least by proffer for filing of a motion to set aside the indictment upon specified grounds should the motion to withdraw the plea be granted. As no affidavit was presented and no proffer made, there was, hence, nothing to indicate that any grounds existed upon which to predicate a motion should the plea be withdrawn, and, under these circumstances, there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying the motion for leave to do so.

The motion of March 27, 1905, having been properly denied, the defendant, through the same counsel who had presented the original motion, but without any leave or permission of the court to do so, on April 27, 1905, again moved the court to permit the withdrawal of defendant's plea and for leave to file a motion to set aside the indictment upon a number of specified grounds. The motion was based upon affidavits setting forth that certain of the grand jurors participating in finding the indictment against defendant were biased and prejudiced; that others were not citizens of the United States; that others were not on the assessment roll, and also setting forth other grounds as a basis for the contemplated motion to set aside. It was also accompanied by a proffer of a motion to set aside the indictment upon all these grounds. We are not advised, from anything appearing in the briefs of appellant, where he found authority in law warranting him in making this second motion. Possibly the court upon application could have permitted the defendant to renew his motion, but we know of no rule of procedure which entitled the defendant as a matter of right to renew it. Independent of this, however, the affidavits which accompanied the second motion do not show that counsel and the defendant were not fully advised of the existence of all the facts recited in their affidavits accompanying the renewed motion when the original motion was made; nothing to show their inability to present these facts upon that motion. For all that appears upon the renewed motion and affidavits accompanying it the defendant and his counsel were in possession of all the facts when the first motion was made as ground for setting aside the indictment urged on their second application. Not a particle of excuse, if any existed, is suggested why they did not then present them. In the absence of any showing by counsel of ignorance of the facts upon which the second motion was based when they made the first one, it is only reasonable to infer that they knew of their existence, and that by failure to present them at that time they waived them. Treating the second motion as in the nature of an application to set aside the previous order, and to allow an additional or further showing, the refusal of the court to do so cannot be said to be error. As the granting of a motion to set aside a plea is discretionary with the court, if, on the original application, there is nothing at all to warrant the order then applied for, or such weak showing as to justify its refusal, it cannot be said to be an abuse of discretion to refuse to set aside the order so as to allow another different or additional showing. If such a rule could obtain, the right of counsel to renew such motions and predicate error upon their denial would be unlimited and unrestrained. Of course, no such right exists. For these reasons the second application was without warrant and properly denied.

As to the denial of the motion of defendant for a change of venue: The affidavits on this motion were directed to the point whether defendant could obtain a fair and impartial trial in Amador county where the alleged crime was committed. Those presented on the part of the defendant tended to show such a general prejudice existing in that county against him that he could not; those on the part of the prosecution tended to show that no prejudice existed sufficient to preclude him from having a fair trial. We think from a perusal of the affidavits, without detailing the facts disclosed by them, that the defendant made a very strong showing in support of his motion, but upon settled principles of law we do not think that he is in a position to claim any error in the action of the court in regard to it. When the motion was made the court did not make final disposition of it, but denied it temporarily, saying: "The rule involved has been in existence in this state from the ninth California down to the present time—nearly an unbroken line of authorities—and is to the effect that the court may compel, if it so desires, at least an attempt to draw a jury before passing upon a matter of this kind finally. * * * The order of the court is that the motion for a change of venue be denied temporarily. You understand, of course (addressing counsel for defendant), that the denying of the motion temporarily means that hereafter if it develops that there is any ground for it the court will entertain the motion again." Of course, counsel were familiar with the case referred to by the court (People v. Plummer, 9 Cal. 298) and the subsequent cases of People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161, and People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 554, 39 Pac. 944, holding that it is no error for the trial court to postpone the consideration of an application for a change of venue until an attempt is made to impanel the jury, where leave is granted to counsel to renew his application if the facts disclosed on the impanelment should further warrant it, and that where counsel fails thereafter to renew his motion, he cannot claim that error was committed by the court in failing to order a change of venue. In those cases it was held (notably in the latter case) that the failure to renew his motion, where it was denied temporarily only, was an abandonment and waiver of the whole question, and fatal to any claim based upon the original application. In the case at bar, no ultimate disposition of the motion was made, and defendant was accorded the right to subsequently renew his motion. He did not do so, and he cannot, within the rule of the above cases, now insist that the court erred, when his right to move was only postponed, and he did not see fit to avail himself of his opportunity to subsequently renew the motion.

Having disposed of these objections we now come to a consideration of the principal point insisted upon by appellant, that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence. Giving a general outline of the evidence, preliminary to a particular consideration of it when we reach the salient points in the case, it appears that defendant, a physician, and his wife, a trained nurse, took up their residence in Amador City, in 1902, where defendant engaged in the practice of his profession. In June, July, and August of 1904, there was an epidemic of typhoid fever in that city, and defendant was employed professionally in many cases growing out of it, his wife assisting him in the care of his typhoid patients. In August of that year, while nursing a little girl suffering from that disease, his wife was taken ill, it is claimed on the part of the defense from an attack of typhoid fever, a matter which will be considered later, and took to her bed on the 14th of that month. Next morning defendant employed a Mrs. Reeves as housekeeper, and on August 17th engaged Miss McCarthy, a professional nurse, to take charge of his wife, called Dr. Gall of Amador City into consultation, and at the time Miss McCarthy came as nurse called in Dr. Quinn, who prescribed for her and attended her thereafter until the morning of August 29th. On August 30th, Mrs. Staples having become somewhat convalescent, she discharged Miss McCarthy as nurse, telling her that, as Dr. Quinn was not coming any more, she thought she could also dispense with her services. The nurse left, and Mrs. Reeves thereafter regularly attended to Mrs. Staples. During the night, after the nurse left, Mrs. Staples became worse; nervous, with a slight rise in temperature which increased as the night advanced, so that about the middle of the night defendant was required to call up Mrs. Reeves, who had retired, to assist him. Enemas having been administered by the defendant, Mrs. Staples became apparently stronger and better, in which condition she remained practically during the daytime of the 31st and until about 7:30 in the evening. At that hour, while defendant was in the yard, Mrs. Reeves called him, saying that his wife was worse. When he entered the sick room he found her very weak and in a semiconscious condition. He sat down beside her bed, felt her pulse, and immediately reached up to the bureau for a whisky glass which was resting there, containing a colored liquor, which he administered to her little by little with a spoon, and then placed the glass back on the bureau. She did not rally or become conscious, and about a quarter past 8 died. Within a little over an hour after her death her body was embalmed by John Daneri, an undertaker and embalmer of Amador City. He was sent for by defendant to prepare the body for burial. Nothing was said to him by defendant about embalming the body, only to prepare it for burial, and this he proceeded to do, as he says, in his own way. He opened the femoral artery in the right leg and injected into it in the direction of the heart two quarts of embalming fluid. The body was still warm while the fluid was being injected, and there was no impediment, after the fluid started, to its flow through the artery; the flow was continuous and unimpeded, until the required quantity was injected. Daneri, when he came to the house, had asked the defendant if he intended shipping the body east, and receiving a reply in the negative, had given simply an arterial embalmment. No puncture of the stomach nor any of the organs of the body was made, nor was there directly injected therein any embalming fluid, a process which the embalmer said he would have employed had the defendant intended to send the body away. The embalming fluid used consisted of chloride of zinc, bichloride of mercury, alum water, arsenic, formaldehyde and salt. The body of deceased was buried in one of the cemeteries in Amador county. The defendant remained in Amador City for a month subsequent to the death of his wife, disposed of his property in that place, and in the latter part of September left for San Francisco, where he opened an office in the Galt House in that city.

Immediately prior to the time when defendant's wife was taken ill he had built a house in Amador City, which they occupied at the time of her death. Near them resided a family named Hoxie, consisting of a husband and wife and young daughter. On September 13th Mrs. Hoxie deserted her husband and child, and subsequently went to live at the Galt House with the defendant, as his mistress. This conduct on the part of the defendant doubtless awoke the indignation of the residents of Amador City against him, and generated a suspicion as to the cause of his wife's death. At least, investigation was put on foot to determine it, and on the 18th of October, 1905, the body of Mrs. Staples was exhumed, and an autopsy held. The exhumation was made by Daneri, the undertaker who had embalmed and buried the body, and it was found in an excellent state of preservation. The autopsy was held about the center of the cemetery, a hedge surrounding the place precluding any observation from the outside, and was made by Doctors Gall and Endicott, physicians of Amador county. As to that examination, the testimony of Dr. Gall was quite general. It was to the effect that he examined all the vital organs of the body except the interior of the stomach, and could find no apparent cause of death; that he examined internally about two feet of the intestines in the vicinity of the ileocæcal valve, and found no indications of any disease from such examination. Dr. Endicott testified with more particularity. He stated that they examined the brains, heart, kidneys, liver, intestines and all the vital organs of the body; used the knife and made their examination with the naked eye; examined the intestines externally throughout their full course, and internally for about two feet above and below the ileocæcal valve; that neither of them made any chemical tests or microscopic examinations, nor did they take any cultures. They removed the stomach, sealed it, and sent it to Price & Son, chemists in San Francisco for examination and report. Thomas Price of that firm, an analytical chemist and toxicologist of large experience in his profession, made tests to discover the presence in the stomach of veratrum viride, strychnine or arsenic. The stomach when opened by him for that purpose was entirely empty, containing no fluid —simply a moisture and no solids. He first tested for veratrum viride and then strychnine, but found neither of these two compounds. He then tested for arsenic, and the test disclosed the presence of 1.26 of a grain. So much for the general facts in the case.

The theory of the prosecution is that the death of Mrs. Staples was occasioned by the administration to her by defendant of veratrum viride or arsenic or both. The evidence as to these matters was, it may be said, almost entirely circumstantial, and consisted of the testimony of experts called upon both sides, whose opinions as to the essential facts in the case were at radical variance.

At the outset it may be said that there is no room for doubt but that the illness with which Mrs. Staples was prostrated on the 14th of August was typhoid fever. This is abundantly shown from the evidence, not only of the defendant, but of disinterested witnesses who were actually in attendance on her, and whose testimony and opinions in that respect are not questioned. It was established by the testimony of the trained nurse, by Dr. Quinn, who was attending physician from the time of her illness until two days before her death, and by the testimony of Dr. Gall, one of the autopsy physicians who had been called into consultation with defendant when his wife first took ill, and diagnosed her case as one of typhoid fever. It was futher confirmed by the testimony of experts on the trial, who declared that some of the symptoms specified were marked evidence that the disease was typhoid fever. However, we do not understand this to be contested by the prosecution, its position being that, though the disease with which Mrs. Staples was prostrated was typhoid fever, yet that disease was not the cause of her death; that her death was caused by the poisons specified administered by defendant while she was suffering from that disease.

Now, as to the evidence that the death of Mrs. Staples was occasioned by either of these poisons, and, first, as to the claim that it occurred from veratrum viride. Half an ounce of that drug contains, as testified to by the druggist who sold it, about 580 drops, and would not fill an ordinary whisky glass quite one-half full. The druggist who sold it testified that veratrum viride is of a reddish brown color and translucent. The official dose of the drug is from two to five drops, and the evidence shows that anything over that might be fatal, and in some cases it might take 30 drops to cause death. The only evidence in the case upon which the theory of the prosecution can be based with reference to the administration of veratrum viride is that in the afternoon of the day upon which Mrs. Staples died the defendant purchased it, and when she became semiconscious before her death he administered to her from a glass a liquid which had the appearance of veratrum viride. There is nothing else in the evidence to indicate poisoning from this drug. Neither the autopsy nor the chemical analysis of Dr. Price revealed its presence at all in the body of deceased, nor was there any evidence of any clinical or pathological symptoms or conditions indicating that death had been occasioned from it. On the contrary, as to these symptoms and conditions, the direct evidence, if it does not show that she did not die from the effects of veratrum viride, at least very strongly indicates that she did not, and the preponderance of the expert evidence tends to confirm this conclusion. The purchase by defendant of veratrum viride was not, of itself, an incriminating circumstance, As to that purchase the defendant testified that, "about 4 o'clock in the afternoon (August 31st) I felt of her pulse, and examined her thoroughly. This rapid pulse gave me a suggestion of the disease of uræmia, which I have known to follow cases of typhoid fever, and led me to examine Mrs. Staples' urine; I found the urine contained albumen, and this strengthened the theory that uræmia might set in as a complication. In uræmia with convulsions I always use veratrum viride, tincture of veratrum viride, and in order to be prepared for this complication, if it arose, I went to the drug store about five or a little after, and purchased one-half ounce of veratrum viride." He purchased it at the drug store where he was accustomed to deal, and the druggist testified, as did the defendant, that when the defendant entered the drug store and asked for the tincture of veratrum viride, the former inquired of him how Mrs. Staples was; the defendant said she was worse and that he wanted the tincture of veratrum viride for her. The druggist asked if he should label it and defendant answered: "Yes, you had better, because I might want it for some of my other patients." These are the conditions and circumstances under which the purchase was made; openly, and with the declared object for which it was purchased. The undisputed medical testimony in the case shows that while poisonous when administered in excessive doses, tincture of veratrum viride is a well-recognized official drug, administered principally in cases of uræmic convulsions which sometimes arise in cases of typhoid fever. So that as far as the purchase of the drug is concerned, under the circumstances detailed—to meet possible complications in Mrs. Staples' case—it not only appears that the drug was a proper remedy, openly purchased for the purpose the defendant claimed and desired it, but as a physician, fearing the complications he indicated, it was his professional duty to get it, and give it should they arise. Defendant testified the complications he feared did not arise, and that he did not administer any of the drug to his wife.

It is insisted, however, that the liquid was administered when Mrs. Staples was in a semiconscious condition. This is the time when it is claimed by the prosecution that it was given—at about 7.30 p. m., and that the liquid administered at that time was veratrum viride. But that the liquid administered then was this tincture, is, under the evidence, purely conjectural. The defendant testified that the liquid he then gave his wife was whisky and water. Mrs. Reeves, who was present when he was giving it, testified that the liquid was in a small whisky glass, and had the appearance of whisky and water. It was given without any secrecy, in the presence of the housekeeper, and it is not contended that whisky or water in her then condition was not a proper stimulant to give her.

Now, as to the clinical symptoms and pathological conditions. Dr. Morgan, a physician and chemist and toxicologist of many years' experience, called on behalf of the defense, testified: "Veratrum viride, when taken in poisonous doses, acts upon the system, first, the same as mustard and water, it being a powerful irritant. It irritates the lining membrane of the stomach, and causes vomiting. After that, if it is absorbed into the system, the patient becomes depressed, becomes weak, and is covered with a cold perspiration. In case that death follows veratrum viride poisoning, it is not until quite a time after the administration of the drug. The shortest time in which death has occurred following veratrum viride poisoning being 13 hours, and it has been prolonged until death has occurred, 24 hours after having taken the dose. * * * The first symptoms of veratrum viride taken in poisonous doses is the irritation of the stomach and vomiting." Dr. Endicott for the prosecution testified that, "the symptoms of veratrum viride, when given in poisonous doses, is a partial collapse, then slight pulse, usually covered with a cold perspiration, and as a usual thing suffering from nausea. Vomiting does not frequently accompany it, but if taken internally vomiting would accompany it in a large majority of cases, but not immediately; sometimes produces intense burning in the stomach."

This is a fair embodiment of all the testimony in the case as to the effect of veratrum viride upon the stomach when administered in poisonous doses. From it it appears that veratrum viride is a slow poison, and that death would not result from it within at least 13 hours after it was given. This is the only evidence in the case as to the time within which death would earliest ensue. Defendant obtained the drug about 5 p. m. Assuming that he administered it, or commenced doing so, immediately after obtaining it (which is not claimed), still, as Mrs. Staples died at 8:15 p. m., it would appear from the only expert evidence on the subject that a sufficient time (three hours and a quarter) had not elapsed for the poison to have occasioned her death. Respondent insists that owing to the weakened, debilitated condition of Mrs. Staples the administration of a poisonous dose of veratrum viride, administered at the time it is claimed it was (7:30 p. m.), would cause death in a much shorter time than if administered to one in good health. This may or may not be true. Whether veratrum viride in poisonous doses would operate more speedily on Mrs. Staples, on account of her debilitated condition, so as to cause her death, and within what time it would so operate, were pertinent and essential matters of proof in the case, and neither jury, counsel, nor this court, can indulge in a speculation on the subject contrary to the only evidence in the case upon that point. But aside from this, there was an absence of the symptoms which accompany poisoning from veratrum viride. There was no vomiting. This is testified to by the defendant, but laying his testimony aside, it is also testified to by Mrs. Reeves, the housekeeper, who was present from the time the liquid, which is claimed by the prosecution to have been veratrum viride, was administered, until Mrs. Staples died. Whatever may be said of the testimony of the defendant, the integrity of Mrs. Reeves as a witness, and the accuracy of her observations, in the sick room, are not questioned. She testifies that during that period there was no vomiting and the evidence clearly shows that at no period during Mrs. Staples' sickness was there any. To meet this testimony, it is again insisted by respondent that the slight vitality of Mrs. Staples prevented the exhibition of these symptoms. But it nowhere appears from the evidence that this debilitated condition would prevent this characteristic symptom of the poisoning from appearing. No witness testifies that it would, but, on the contrary, all testified that it is a symptom which will appear. The position of counsel seems to be that while the death of Mrs. Staples was occasioned by the administration of the poison, yet, before the symptoms showing that she was so poisoned appeared, she died. Whatever merit there may be in this position, nothing in the evidence in the case furnishes any basis for it being taken. If she was poisoned by veratrum viride, the expert evidence shows that this symptom of it would have manifested itself; as it did not, it is evidence strongly tending to show that she was not so poisoned.

We now come to the autopsy, and will consider its bearing, first, on the matter of poisoning by veratrum viride. The exhumation of the body was 48 days after death. As to the autopsy itself, the testimony of the two autopsy physicians is that they found no pathological or diseased condition sufficient in their opinion to account for the death of Mrs. Staples; there was no apparent cause of death that they could ascertain, which, of course, must be taken to include that they did not find any evidence of poisoning by veratrum viride or any other poison. Prof. Price, the chemist, to whom the stomach was sent, testified that as far as veratrum viride was concerned, he found no evidence of its presence in the analysis of the stomach which he made. This evidence, if the presence of veratrum viride could have been discovered by an autopsy, or by chemical test after death, would be almost persuasive proof that veratrum viride had not been administered to the deceased. To meet this, however, the prosecution introduced the evidence of the autopsy physicians, testifying as such, and not as chemists or toxicologists, to the effect that veratrum viride being a vegetable drug, if administered, all traces of it would disappear between two and three weeks after death. To be specific, Dr. Endicott was asked: "Q. How long after it (veratrum viride) would be administered could it be found? A. It could not be found any great length of time after death in my opinion, because it is a vegetable compound; it would decompose. Q. How long would it take this particular drug to decompose, being a vegetable matter, after being administered? A. I could not state a definite period of time. Q. Well, can you give about the time? A. Well, I should say in two weeks anyway, that there would not a trace be found." On the subject Dr. Gall testified: "Q. How long would it take, being a vegetable drug—how long would it take to decompose? A. Well, I don't know; it is a difficult question to answer; it would depend a good deal. Q. Just about? A. Oh, about two or three weeks I should think." And on cross-examination he stated: "I never saw any one die from it (veratrum viride). I never saw any sample that would demonstrate to me that it would decompose or disappear in two or three weeks; only say from my own general knowledge, because when decomposition sets in generally those vegetable properties decompose. Well, you would allow about two or three weeks for decomposition to start, that is all; there was a certain amount of decomposition in this body. But for a body that had been buried seven weeks it was remarkably well preserved; no evidence of decomposition in the heart."

Now, it will be observed from this testimony that the evidence of the physicians as to inability to detect the presence of veratrum veride poisoning in a body proceeds upon the theory that veratrum viride in their opinion is a vegetable drug and disappears with the decomposition of the body; otherwise, it could be detected. But there was no evidence that the body was decomposed at the time of the autopsy, or that decomposition had set in. Dr. Gall's own evidence largely negatives that proposition, and the testimony of Daneri, the embalmer, is that when he exhumed the body for the autopsy it was just as natural as the day he put it down and buried it; almost petrified; that to the touch it was like putting your finger on a piece of iron. If, then, the only reason why veratrum viride, if administered, could not be discovered in a dead body would be because decomposition had set in, as it had not set in on the body of deceased, there was no reason why a proper examination or analysis to discover it would not have revealed its presence. The evidence of the autopsy physicians is the only evidence in the case that veratrum viride disappears within a few weeks. In fact, this testimony and that of the two following witnesses is the only evidence on the point.

Prof. Price, the chemist and toxicologist, testifying as to his analysis of the stomach, was asked whether veratrum viride administered 50 days prior to an autopsy could be discovered in then making an analysis of the stomach, to which he responded: "I have no personal experience myself to enable me to say how long this veratrum viride will remain in the stomach after death, and from all my investigation among the authorities they are silent on that subject." He also designated veratrum viride as an alkaloid. Dr. Morgan, a physician, and also a chemist and toxicologist of experience, testified that, "there is no evidence upon which we can base a positive opinion as to how long veratrum viride taken into the stomach would remain before decomposition would set in; it is an alkaloid; morphine will remain in the human body one or two years after death, and strychnine as long as ten years. Morphine, strychnine and veratrum viride are all alkaloids, and we could reasonably expect to find them in the body for a period of a year or two, any one of the three."

Before proceeding to a further consideration of the case, it is proper at this point to say that when the defendant was on the stand he did not state, nor did his counsel make inquiry of him as to what had become of the veratrum viride which he purchased. This doubtless, was an oversight on the part of defendant's counsel, and, at best, only shows that he did not account for it. His failure, however, to testify on direct examination on this subject did not preclude the prosecution from making inquiry in that direction, if it so desired; hence, it was a possible oversight on the part of both the defense and prosecution that the subject was not gone into.

We do not think that any further discussion of the evidence upon this branch of the case is necessary, and without commenting upon it further than we have, we now pass to a consideration of the evidence bearing upon the claim of the prosecution that the deceased came to her death from arsenical poisoning.

This branch of the case, in our judgment, requires less discussion than we have devoted to the claim of poisoning by veratrum viride. There is no evidence that defendant had procured or had in his possession any arsenic. As a physician, he may have had it, but there is no proof that he did. Neither at any time during her illness did Mrs. Staples exhibit any symptons of arsenical poisoning. As to those symptons there is no dispute. Dr. Morgan testified: "The first symptons of arsenical poisoning is a burning sensation in the throat and stomach, and an intense desire for water, then follows vomiting, which is so severe that it cannot be controlled, the patient constantly desiring water, and as often as it is given constantly vomiting it. After that we usually find a diarrhoea, and the vomiting becomes streaked with blood; the diarrhoea is of a peculiar character known as the rice water stools, and contains patches of mucous membrane from the intestines. The patients, if they die, usually die in from six hours to two days." Dr. Tiffany said: "Arsenic irritates the lining membrane of the stomach and intestines, and it creates more or less vomiting and purging, running off condition of the bowels. Vomiting takes place when it is used beyond physiological action to a poisonous extent, as soon as there was enough irritation of the stomach. The administration or receipt of arsenic in poisonous doses in the stomach would cause irritation within a few hours. In the case of taking by the mouth of arsenical poisoning, the irritation would leave on the internal organs a congested condition, an aridness, an inflamed condition. * * * If one poisonous dose was administered at a time it would produce vomiting."

The sickness of the deceased covered a period of over two weeks, and there is no evidence whatever that at any time the symptons attending arsenical poisoning exhibited themselves. There was no vomiting or purging. Neither did the autopsy or the chemical analysis of the stomach show any irritated condition of either the stomach or of any other internal organ of the body. Arsenic, it is true, was found in the stomach. But the evidence shows that its presence there could have resulted through the process of embalming, and, as far as the evidence on that point is concerned, it is quite apparent that it did. There is only one witness (Dr. Morgan), who testifies upon this subject. Prof. Price, who made the analysis, nowhere says (and there is no pretense that any other witness testified on the subject) that it could not have gotten into the stomach as the result of embalming. The most that can be claimed for his testimony (which is the deduction that the prosecution arrives at from it; but not what the professor said) is that as the chemist did not find chloride of zinc, bichloride of mercury, formaldehyde or alum, but only arsenic, in his analysis, that therefore the arsenic could not have gotten into the stomach from the embalming fluid; that if it did, the other ingredients of the fluid would also be found there. The professor did testify that he found no chloride of zinc or bichloride of mercury, but did not say why he did not find them. He testified also that he found no trace of formaldehyde or of alum, but the reason for this, as he says, is because he did not look for them. As to the presence of arsenic in the stomach, he did not testify that it could not have gotten into the stomach from the embalming fluid. His only testimony on that point was that he found there the quantity of arsenic stated. Dr. Morgan, an equally reputable chemist, stated his belief that the arsenic in the stomach came from the embalming fluid and in addition said: "My experience has taught me to believe that it is impossible for an organ in the human body to be within a few inches of the embalming fluid for the period of 48 days without absorbing some of the arsenic. The embalming fluid injected into the right femoral artery would travel up the femoral artery a few inches and reach the aorta which is the largest artery in the body, and being mixed with blood would pass on up to the heart. Now, the stomach lies right over the aorta, not being separated from the interior of the aorta by more than an inch, and it would only have to travel that small distance of tissue in order to reach the stomach." He further testified, giving his reasons therefor, which space prevents quoting, that it was possible for arsenic to pass from the embalming fluid to the stomach without the chloride of zinc or bichloride of mercury showing itself there; that arsenic when injected into a dead body will commence diffusing itself through the tissue at once, which the other salts will not immediately commence to do so, nor will they, "until such time as the body turns to liquid," when they will also travel. In addition to this he made an experiment with the embalming fluid of Mr. Daneri upon the stomach of a deceased person, which actual experiment confirmed the opinion he entertained and expressed. The opinion of Dr. Morgan with respect to these matters was not disputed by any medcal or other opinion given in the case. So much for the evidence relating to arsenical poisoning.

In addition to these particular facts relative to the claim of the prosecution that the death of deceased was occasioned by poisoning there was other evidence, to be referred to generally. Reputable expert physicians testified that the autopsy made by the autopsy physicians was incomplete, and was not sufficient to determine whether the deceased had died from typhoid fever or not, while the same physicians testified that from the symptons attending the sickness of deceased, they were satisfied that she had died of typhoid fever. It was further shown by the evidence of disinterested parties that defendant and his wife had lived happily together, and that during her illness he treated her kindly, and seemed to do everything that he could to help her, and alleviate her sufferings. This is as far as we deem it necessary to state the evidence in the case. We do not concern ourselves with many suggestions, more of an argumentative character than otherwise (but even as such quite cogent), made by counsel for appellant which he claims are inconsistent and incompatible with the theory of the prosecution that the death of deceased was occasioned through poisoning. We content ourselves with the evidence as we have stated it, which in our judgment did not warrant the verdict of the jury. It will be perceived that the evidence in the case relied on to establish the guilt of the defendant is practically circumstantial, and it is elementary law that where the evidence is of such a character it must be not only consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but inconsistent with any other rational hypothesis. The deduction to be drawn from these circumstances is, ordinarily, one for the jury, but where, in a case such as this, every circumstance relied on as incriminating is equally compatible with innocence, there is a failure of proof necessary to sustain a conviction, and the question presented is one of law for the court. The prosecution has the burden of proof. The defendant is presumed innocent until the proof satisfies the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. The right of a jury to return a verdict of guilty is not an arbitrary right. The sufficiency of their verdict must be tested by determining whether the evidence upon which that verdict is framed was of such a character that they could say from it that in their judgment no reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt existed. Now, considering the evidence in the case at bar under these elementary rules of law, there was no proof in the case that the wife of defendant died from arsenical poisoning, in fact, the evidence is not only consistent with the claim of defendant that she did not, but it may be said that the preponderance of evidence in the case is to the effect that she did not. As to poisoning by veratrum viride: Aside from the opinion of the experts that Mrs. Staples died of typhoid fever, from which she was concededly suffering, the clinical and pathological conditions tend to show that she did not die from the administration of that poisonous drug. The only evidence at all as to veratrum viride is that the defendant got it and that he administered to her a liquid which looked like it. The most that can be said of his particular evidence is that it might have been sufficient to have raised a suspicion in the mind of the jury that he did administer it. Certainly it was not effective for any other purpose. This, however, could only be a suspicion, and no jury has a right to declare forfeited the life of a defendant upon mere suspicion. Especially is this true when the facts upon which the suspicion might have been generated are entirely consistent with innocence; and could exist without the defendant being guilty of the heinous offense of which he was accused. No man can be convicted of murder upon evidence which, at best, leaves the question of criminal agency in causing death, if not reasonably doubtful, at least merely conjectural.

We are not unmindful of the claim of the prosecution that there existed a motive for the death of Mrs. Staples; a desire on the part of defendant to get rid of her so that he might enjoy the society of Mrs. Hoxie. Assuming (which the evidence does not clearly show) that a meretricious relationship between them existed prior to Mrs. Staples' death (the evidence is clear enough of its existence a month afterwards) and giving to the claim of the prosecution the full force which such a relationship or desire might disclose, still this, of itself, was not sufficient to warrant the conviction of the defendant. It is a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the jury, but not sufficient, of itself, to warrant a conviction. A motive being shown, there must still be evidence of the fact of death by poisoning established to a moral certainty, and conceding that there was sufficient proof upon which the jury could deduce a motive in this case, still, as we have endeavored to point out, the evidence was otherwise insufficient to prove the corpus delicti; it was entirely insufficient to warrant the jury in finding to a moral certainty that deceased died of poison administered by the defendant. Motive, while a potent factor in the sum of evidence proving guilt, is not in itself sufficient to sustain a conviction in the absence of other proof tending clearly to show criminal agency on the part of defendant causing death.

The same may be said of what is denominated by the prosecution evidence of the flight of the defendant. No doubt but that the jury had the right to consider this evidence, and its potency was for their determination. That evidence, however, simply amounted to this, that a month after Mrs. Staples' death defendant took up his residence in the Galt House in San Francisco with Mrs. Hoxie; that he had his office for the practice of his profession there, and his professional sign prominently displayed; that on October 22, 1905, Mrs. Hoxie, being fearful that her husband had discovered her whereabouts, and fearing injury from him, prevailed on defendant to take her away from San Francisco; that they left hurriedly in the nighttime and went to Ensenada, Lower California, where defendant engaged again in the practice of his profession under his own name and professional sign; that he remained in Ensenada about two months, and then, in company with Mrs. Hoxie, went back into the country about 30 miles to the ranch of a man named Blackwell, where they were arrested. The evidence shows that the defendant during all these times kept his true name, did business under it, made no effort, as far as these matters are concerned, to hide his identity, and there was no evidence to show that he ever knew till after his arrest, that any suspicion existed as to the cause of his wife's death, or that any autopsy upon her remains had been held.

We think we have mentioned every claim of the prosecution, and discussed all the important evidence addressed to each, and our conclusion from a consideration of the whole case is that the evidence as we have recited it did not warrant the jury in the verdict against the defendant, and for that reason the judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed.

Aside from the contention that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury, it is insisted by the defendant that the court committed error in its rulings relative to the admission of evidence, in denying challenges to the jury interposed by defendant, and in its refusal to give certain instructions. We think there was no error as to the rulings concerning challenges to the jurors, and as to the particular rulings relative to the testimony of certain witnesses, we do not think they disclose any error.

The court admitted under the claim of motive, evidence of the destruction of rented premises occupied by the defendant in Amador City in 1902. This evidence was admitted on the theory that it supplied an additional motive for the murder by defendant of his wife because she knew that his destruction of these premises was incendiary, and might have prosecuted him for arson. In our judgment, all the evidence was inadmissible. In this regard it is sufficient to say that when this alleged arson was committed the wife of the defendant was not in Amador City, knew nothing about the fire, and that the evidence introduced to show arson on the part of defendant wholly failed to prove it. We do not perceive that the court erred in refusing to give the instructions tendered by defendant. They were all substantially given in the charge of the court.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded that a new trial may be had.

7 Cal. Unrep. 273

PEOPLE v. COLLINS. (Cr. 1358.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1906.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CUSTODY OF ACCUSED—PERMISSION TO VISIT CLERK'S OFFICE—AUTHORITY TO GRANT.

A single justice of the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to grant the application of an attorney, convicted of perjury and confined in the county jail, to visit the clerk's office of the county in charge of an officer, for the purpose of examining the records in the case in order to enable him, while acting as his own attorney, to prepare an appeal to the appellate district court.

In Bank. George D. Collins was convicted of perjury and pending the taking of an appeal, he applied to a single justice of the Supreme Court for permission to visit the office of the county clerk for the purpose of examining papers and records. Application denied.

LORIGAN, J. This is an application addressed to me, as one of the associate judges of the Supreme Court, for an order, directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, to permit petitioner, who is in his custody pending appeal from a judgment of conviction for perjury, to visit, in charge of a deputy sheriff, the office of the county clerk of said city for the purpose of examining certain papers and records therein.

The application sets forth that the petitioner was convicted and sentenced, and that he has appealed from the judgment to the District Court of Appeals for the first appellate district, where such appeal is now pending; that a bill of exceptions on said appeal was presented, settled, certified, and filed; that in settling the same the judge of the superior court before which he was tried refused to allow a large number of important and substantial exceptions to be incorporated therein in accordance with the facts; that petitioner desires to apply to the Supreme Court of this state, under section 1174 of the Penal Code, to prove said exceptions; that the original bill is on file in the county clerk's office, and that to prepare his petition to the Supreme Court it will be necessary for him (acting as his own attorney) to inspect the same and the other records and papers in the case; that he has applied to the trial judge for permission to visit the county clerk's office for that purpose, which was denied him, hence this application.

I am not advised of any provision of law which confers upon an associate justice of the Supreme Court any authority to entertain or grant an application of this character. If it exists, it rests in the Supreme Court as a court, and is not reposed in the individual justices constituting that tribunal.

It may also be suggested in this connection that, as the appeal of petitioner from the judgment of conviction to which his bill of exception pertains is pending in the District Court of Appeal for the first appellate district, that tribunal would appear to be, at least in the first instance, after refusal by the trial judge, the proper one, as matter of procedure, in which to make this application. I do not pass at all upon the merits of the application of petitioner, concluding, as I do, that, as an associate justice, I have no authority to entertain the petition. For that reason, let it be dismissed.

Ex parte SPENCER. (Cr. 1,332.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1906.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DISCRIMINATION—EMPLOYMENT OF MINORS.

St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the employment of children under 14 years "in any mercantile institution, office, laundry, manufactory, workshop, restaurant, hotel, or apartment house or in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages," does not manifestly discriminate against the enumerated occupations, so as to violate Const. art. 1, § 21, prohibiting the granting of special privileges to any class of citizens.

2. SAME—RIGHT TO ACQUIRE PROPERTY.

St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the employment of children under 14 years old in certain employments, does not unduly and without reasonable cause restrict the right of minors to work at any occupation they wish, and thus deprive persons of the right to acquire and possess property in violation of Const. Cal. art. 1, § 1; and Const. U. S. 14th Amend.

3. STATUTES—SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the employment of children under 14 years of age in any mercantile institution, office, laundry, manufactory, workshop, restaurant, hotel, or apartment house, or in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages, violation of which is made a misdemeanor by section 4 (page 14), cannot be said to make an improper classification, and so to be special legislation, in violation of Const. art. 4, § 25, subds. 2, 33.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DISCRIMINATION—EMPLOYMENT OF MINORS.

The proviso to St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the employment of children under 14 years of age in certain employments, that on the sworn statement of the parent that the child is over 12 years old, and that the parent or parents are unable, from sickness, to labor, the judge of the juvenile court may permit such child to work for a specified time, does not discriminate against orphans and abandoned children; the exception being for the sick parent.

5. SAME.

The proviso to St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the employment of children under 14 years of age in certain occupations, that during the time of the regular vacation of the public schools a child over 12 years old may work at any such occupation, on a permit from the principal of the school attended by the child during the immediately preceding term, does not grant principals of public schools the exclusive power to give such permits, and so discriminate against pupils of private schools, but the permit, while it is to extend only to the time of the public school vacation, is to be given by the principal of the school which the child has attended, whether public or private.

6. SAME.

The provisions of St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, that no child under 16 years old shall work at certain kinds of employment between 10:00 a. m. and 6:00 p. m., and no child under 16 years old shall work at any gainful occupation during the hours that the public schools are in session, unless he can read English at sight and write simple English sentences, or is attending night school, are reasonable, and so not unconstitutional.

7. SAME.

The exemption of domestic labor and the several kinds of farming from the operation of St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, § 2, prohibiting the employment of children under certain ages, is not an unreasonable discrimination.

In Bank. Application of J. M. Spencer for writ of habeas corpus to be directed against J. F. Dinan, chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco. Petition denied.

W. F. Williamson, for petitioner. W. H. Langdon, Dist. Atty., and R. W. Harrison, Asst. Dist. Atty. (Jno. M. Ehleman, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The petitioner was arrested and confined upon a charge of violating sections 2 and 4 of the act of February 20, 1905, regulating the employment and hours of labor of children, and prohibiting the employment of illiterate minors and of minors under certain ages. St. 1905, pp. 11, 14, c. 18. The return to the preliminary writ shows that the petitioner was arrested and taken into custody upon four several complaints, relating to four different children, each complaint charging him with employing a child under 14 years of age in the workshop and boiler room of a steamer; the child not then having a permit to work from the judge of the juvenile court of the county, and the time of such employment not being the time of the vacation of the public schools. The second clause of section 2 of the act provides that no child under 14 years of age shall be employed in any mercantile institution, office, laundry, manufactory, workshop, restaurant, hotel, or apartment house, or in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages; provided that, upon the sworn statement of the parent that the child is over 12 years of age and that the parent or parents are unable, from sickness, to labor, the judge of the juvenile court, in his discretion, may issue a permit allowing such child to work for a specified time, and provided, further, that during the time of the regular vacation of the public schools of the city or county, any child over 12 years of age may work at any of the prohibited occupations, upon a permit from the principal of the school attended by the child during the immediately preceding term. Section 4 of the act declares that a violation of any of the provisions of the act shall be a misdemeanor. The complaints charge violations of these provisions. Several objections on constitutional grounds are made to the validity of the act. It is claimed that it is a special law for the punishment of crime, where a general law could be made applicable, and, therefore, contrary to section 25, subds. 2 and 33, art. 4, Const.

Cal.; that it is not of uniform operation, but is discriminatory, and hence in conflict with sections 11 and 21 of article 1; and that it would deprive persons of the right to acquire and possess property, thus violating section 1 of article 1 of the state Constitution and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The presumption always is that an act of the Legislature is constitutional, and when this depends on the existence, or nonexistence, of some fact, or state of facts, the determination thereof is primarily for the Legislature, and the courts will acquiesce in its decision, unless the error clearly appears. Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 184; University v. Bernard, 57 Cal. 612; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 310, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 37 Am. St. Rep. 106; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 718, 25 L. Ed. 496; 1 Tiedeman on Police Power, p. 10, note; Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 228. "Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt. One branch of the government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule." Sinking Fund Cases, supra. "The delicate act of declaring an act of the Legislature unconstitutional and void should never be exercised unless there is a clear repugnancy between the statute and the organic law. * * * In a doubtful case the benefit of the doubt is to be given to the Legislature; but it is to be remembered that the doubt to which this rule of construction refers is a reasonable doubt as distinguished from vague conjecture or misgiving." Bourland v. Hildreth, supra. From their tender years, immature growth and lack of experience and knowledge, minors are more subject to injury from excessive exertion, and less capable of self-protection, than adults. They are, therefore, peculiarly entitled to legislative protection, and form a class to which legislation may be exclusively directed without falling under the constitutional prohibition of special legislation and unfair discrimination.

The first objection to the validity of the part of the section above stated is that it is discriminatory and special because it does not prohibit such employment of minors in all occupations, but only in those specifically mentioned; that work at other places, of which saloons, barber shops, railroads, ferries, and warehouses are specified by counsel as instances, would be equally injurious, and that in order to be general and uniform they should be included in the prohibition. The objection is two-fold: First, that the legislation constitutes an unfair discrimination against the particular trades mentioned; second, that it unduly and without reasonable cause restricts the right of minors to work at any and every occupation in which they may wish to engage. There is nothing in the act to indicate a purpose on the part of the Legislature to make use of the laudable object of protecting children as a mere pretense under which to impose burdens upon some occupations or trades and favor others. It appears to have been framed in good faith and for the purpose of promoting the general welfare by protecting minors from injury by overwork and by facilitating their attendance at schools. The Legislature may undoubtedly forbid the employment of children under the age of fourteen years at any regular occupation if the interests of the children and the general welfare of society will be thereby secured and promoted. The power to forbid their employment in certain occupations and not in all depends on the questions whether or not any appreciable number of children are employed in the callings not forbidden, and whether or not those callings are injurious to them, or less injurious than those forbidden. If certain occupations are especially harmful to young children and others are not so, there can be no serious doubt that it is within the power of the Legislature to forbid their employment in one class and permit it in the other. The difference in the results would justify the classification with a view to the difference in the legislation. Also, if children are employed in certain occupations to their injury, and are not employed at all in others, or so infrequently that the number is inappreciable and insignificant, the occupations regularly employing them have no ground to complain of discrimination. They compose the entire class to which the legislation is directed, the class which causes the injury to be prevented. And upon the facts assumed, neither the children nor the persons engaged in the occupations in which they are not employed would be affected by the prohibition as to other occupations. The preliminary question as to the effect of the specified occupations on the children, and as to the number of children engaged therein, are questions of fact for the Legislature to ascertain and determine. It has determined that the facts exist to authorize the particular legislation. If any rational doubt exists as to the soundness of the legislative judgment upon the existence of the facts, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the legislative action and the law must accordingly be held to be valid in these respects. The specifications of forbidden callings are broad and comprehensive. Even of those which, as counsel assert, are omitted from the classification, we cannot say that a saloon is not a "mercantile institution," it being a place where merchandise is sold; nor that a barber shop is not a "workshop," it being a place where a handicraft is carried on; nor that ferries and railroads are not engaged in the "distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages." At all events, in view of the rule that a statute must be liberally construed to the end that it may be declared constitutional rather than unconstitutional (People v. Hayne, 83 Cal. 117, 23 Pac. 1, 7 L. R. A. 348, 17 Am. St. Rep. 211; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 640), we would not give the description of forbidden occupations this narrow construction in order to make the law invalid. The decision of the Legislature that the specified occupations are more injurious to children than others not mentioned, and hence the subject of special regulation, and that they constitute practically all the injurious occupations in which children are employed at all, and therefore the only cases in which regulation is needed, is not so manifestly incorrect, not so beclouded with doubt concerning its accuracy, as to justify the court in declaring it unfounded and the law, consequently, invalid.

There is a proviso to this clause of the section, to the effect that if either parent of such child makes a sworn statement to the judge of the juvenile court of the county that the child is over 12 years of age, and that the parent or parents are unable, from sickness, to labor, such judge, in his discretion, may issue a permit allowing such child to work for a time to be specified therein. There is no force to the objection that this discriminates against orphans and abandoned children. The exception allowed by the proviso is not made for the direct benefit of the child, but for the sick parent. It is a burden put upon the child because of the special necessity of his case which justifies the different provision respecting him. The Legislature deems the necessity of allowing the child to work to aid in the support of the sick parent sufficient to outweigh the benefits which would otherwise accrue from the education and protection of the child during such inability. If there are no parents whose necessities the child's labor could alleviate, the reason for this exception is wanting. The provision seems a reasonable one in view of the conditions upon which, alone, it can apply. There is a further proviso or exception, to the effect that any child over 12 years old may work at the prohibited occupations during the time of the regular vacations of the public schools of the city or county, upon a permit from the principal of the school attended by the child during the term next preceding such vacation. This does not, as counsel contends, give the principals of the public schools the exclusive power to give the contemplated permits. Its true meaning is that the permit is to be given by the principal of the school which the child has attended, whether the school is public or private, but that it can extend only to the time of the public school vacation. This act was approved February 20, 1905. Its provisions relating to attendance upon schools, and those of section 1 of the act of March 24, 1903 (St. 1903, p. 388, c. 270), with the amendment of March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 388, c. 333), to said section 1 must be considered together. The act of 1903, in effect, requires all children to attend, either the public schools, or a private school, during at least five months of the time of the sessions of the public schools. The amendment of March 20, 1905, extends the time of such compulsory attendance, so as to embrace the whole period of the public school session. Therefore, if the parents, guardians, or custodians of a child choose to send it to a private school, is must attend thereon at least during the time the public schools are in session. A permit may then be obtained for it to work during the vacation of the public schools, if its interests or necessities so require, without subjecting it to conditions substantially different from those affecting the children attending the public schools. There is no discrimination. The Legislature has the power to make such reasonable regulations as these with respect to the time of the vacations of schools, whether public or private, in the interest of the public welfare and the welfare of the children.

A third clause of section 2 declares that no child under 16 years of age shall work at any gainful occupation during the hours that the public schools are in session, unless such child can read English at sight, and write simple English sentences, or is attending night school. The first clause of section 2 provides that no minor under 16 shall work in any mercantile institution, office, laundry, manufacturing establishment, or workshop, between 10 o'clock in the evening and 6 o'clock in the morning. Section 5 (page 15) of the act further provides that nothing in the act is to be construed to prevent the employment of minors at agricultural, viticultural, horticultural, or domestic labor, during the time the public schools are not in session, or during other than school hours. The petitioner's contention with respect to the first and last clauses of section 2 is that they constitute such important parts of the statute that it cannot be presumed that the Legislature would have adopted the other parts thereof if it had been aware of the invalidity of these particular provisions, and hence the whole act must fall. We cannot accede to this proposition. They are separable and independent provisions, and are not so important to the entire scheme as to justify us in concluding that the Legislature would have refused to adopt the other parts without these, and thereby to declare the entire statute invalid. Nor can it be conceded that these provisions are invalid. The principles already discussed apply with equal force to the first clause of the section. The proviso concerning illiterate children is a reasonable regulation to prevent those having control of such children from working them to such an extent as to hinder them from acquiring, or endeavoring to acquire, at least the beginning of an education before arriving at the age of 16 years. The exemption of domestic labor and the several kinds of farming from the operation of the act is not an unreasonable discrimination. Such work is generally carried on at the home and as a part of that general home industry which should not be too much discouraged, and it is usually under the immediate care and supervision of the parents or those occupying the place of parents, and hence is not liable to cause so much injury. These circumstances distinguish them from the prohibited industries and is a sufficient reason for the exemption. We find no reasonable ground for declaring the law invalid.

The petition is denied, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the officer.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, and in what is said by Mr. Justice SHAW in his opinion; but I do not concur in some of the quotations which he makes from other cases, and particularly in that quotation in which it is stated that the presumption in favor of the validity of a statute "continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt." This is, in my opinion, too strong a statement of the rule.

PEOPLE v. FERNANDEZ.

1. CRIMINAL LAW—REQUEST TO CHARGE—REFUSAL.

It is not error for the court to refuse accused's requests to charge which are fully covered by instructions given.

2. SAME—REMARKS OF TRIAL JUDGE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where all the testimony of a witness was adverse to accused, he was not harmed by an observation of the trial judge that the witness had been giving nothing but opinions for the last hour.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1526-1530; vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 3125.]

3. SAME—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—EXAMINATION OF JURORS.

Accused was not entitled, during the taking of testimony and after the jury had been impaneled, to interrogate several of the jurors in open court as to whether they had read any reports of the trial in the newspapers.

4. SAME—NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JUROR—READING NEWSPAPERS.

An affidavit that a juror read in a newspaper "reports of the progress of the trial" was insufficient to show misconduct justifying a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Feliz Fernandez was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank C. Prescott, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. M. Sprecher, Dist. Atty., for the People.

GRAY, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment convicting him of burglary, and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. The testimony of Inez Dominguez, corroborated as it was by the other members of her family, made out a clear case of burglary in the first degree against the defendant, and there is no merit in the contention that the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

2. The defendant urges that instructions offered by him were refused. One of these instructions related to the degree of certainty with which circumstances should be proved and that they should point conclusively to defendant's guilt; and the other instruction related to the presumption of innocence. The first instruction given to the jury covered the proposition of the presumption of innocence fully and was as favorable to defendant as he had a right to demand. So, too, the required certainty of circumstantial evidence and the law covering that question was clearly and fully stated to the jury. Hence there was no error in refusing the requested instructions.

3. Complaint is made of some oral expressions of the trial judge in the presence of the jury, to the effect that the testimony of a certain witness, elicited on cross-examination, as to the defendant having secreted matches in the bedclothes in a certain room amounted to nothing more than the opinions and beliefs of the witness. These statements of the witness were, in fact, nothing but opinions or conclusions drawn by him from certain discoveries he claimed to have made. To call them opinions and to say that "the witness had been giving nothing but opinions for the last hour" could in no way harm the defendant, for all the testimony of the witness was adverse to the defendant; and to say that he was only giving his opinions could only lessen the force of his testimony. If the court had intimated that the witness was confining himself to facts, the defendant might have properly complained.

4. During the taking of testimony and after the jury had been impaneled, defendant requested the privilege of asking the several jurors some questions in open court as to whether they had read any reports of the trial in the newspapers. The court refused the request, stating that this was not the time or place for any such inquiry. We think the court was right, and that there is no merit in the objection to the action taken.

We are also satisfied that there is no showing made by the affidavit filed on motion for a new trial that required the granting of the motion. What the jurors read in the newspaper does not appear even in substance.

Nor does it appear from the affidavit that the newspaper contained anything that could have possibly prejudiced the reader against the defendant or his case. All that affirmatively appears from the affidavit is that a juror read in the paper "reports of the progress of the trial." Being a juror, he knew all about "the progress of the trial" and it could not hurt him to read what he already knew.

Some other points are urged by the appellant, but they are not considered of sufficient importance to warrant special treatment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

3 Cal. App. 691

RIVERSIDE COUNTY v. YAWMAN & ERBE MFG. CO.

1. COUNTIES—CONTRACTS—SUPPLIES—BIDS—DUTY TO ADVERTISE.

County government act (St. 1897, p. 459, c. 277, § 25, subd. 8) confers express authority on the board of supervisors to furnish a courthouse without requiring competitive bidding. Section 4 (page 452) gives the board general authority to purchase such personal property as may be necessary in the exercise of its powers; and section 25, subd. 21 (page 464), declares that the board shall annually advertise for bids for furnishing the county with stationery, clothing, bedding, groceries, provisions, drugs, medicines, "and all other supplies." Held, that the term "other supplies" had reference to ordinary supplies which the board was required to keep for use and replenish annually, if needed for distribution among the county officers, and did not include furnishings for the courthouse, which the board was authorized to purchase without advertising for bids.

2. PLEADING—DEMURRER—EFFECT.

A demurrer to a complaint only admits material matters.

3. COUNTIES—CLAIMS—ALLOWANCE—ACTIONS.

An allegation in a complaint that the board of supervisors had passed upon and allowed a bill for furniture purchased for the courthouse constituted an allegation that the board acting in a judicial capacity had determined the correctness of the claim.

4. SAME—ALLOWANCE—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where a board of supervisors has passed on the validity of the claim against the county, the board's findings on questions of fact cannot be collaterally assailed.

5. SAME—RECOVERY OF PAYMENT.

Where the county board of supervisors purchased furniture for the courthouse, paid for the same, and retained and used it, the county was not entitled, without returning the furniture, to recover the amount paid with penalty under the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 452, c. 277, § 8), declaring that whenever any county officer has drawn any warrant in favor of any other person without being authorized by the board of supervisors, or by the law, and the same shall have been paid, the district attorney of such county may institute suit to recover the money so paid and 20 per cent. damages for the use thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; B. F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Riverside county against the Yawman & Erbe Manufacturing Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lyman Evans and A. A. Adair, for appellant. Gill & Densmore, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint and judgment thereon in favor of defendant.

The material facts involved are these: The board of supervisors of Riverside county purchased, without preliminary publication or competitive bidding, certain furnishings for use in the county offices in the courthouse of that county. The agreed price and value thereof, as shown by a verified claim, was by the district attorney certified as a proper charge against the county. The board allowed the claim, and the same was regularly paid by the treasurer. A grand jury of the county subsequently determined that such payment was without authority of law and directed the district attorney to institute this suit for the recovery of the amount paid, together with a penalty of 20 per cent. Their action and this suit is based upon section 8 of the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 452, c. 277), which provides: "* * * Whenever any county officer has drawn any warrant * * * in favor of any other person, without being authorized by the board of supervisors, or by the law, and the same shall have been paid, the district attorney of such county is hereby empowered * * * to institute suit, in the name of the county, against such person or persons, to recover the money so paid, and twenty per cent. damages for the use thereof." And upon the construction of subdivision 21 of section 25 (page 464) of such act, which provides: "The board of supervisors of the several counties shall annually advertise, for at least ten days in a newspaper of general circulation in the county, for sealed bids for furnishing the county with stationery, clothing, bedding, groceries, provisions, drugs, medicines, and all other supplies. All bids shall be on a schedule, showing all articles needed in the several offices and departments, prepared by the clerk of the board, shall state separately the price of each article to be furnished. and any person may bid upon any article separately."

It is insisted that furnishings for a courthouse are "other supplies" within the meaning of the law, and that there being no publication or bids therefor, or schedule prepared as provided, the purchase and payment was therefore without authority of law. We are of opinion that from a reading of the whole subdivision it is apparent that the term "other supplies" has reference to ordinary supplies which the board is required to keep for use and replenish annually, if needed, for distribution among the county officers; that furniture for courthouse is not in the contemplation of such act ordinary supplies. This construction is accentuated by subdivision 8, sec. 25 (page 459), of the same act, which confers express authority upon the board to erect, rebuild, or furnish a courthouse, and with reference to which furnishing no publication or competitive bidding is expressly required. In addition, the board by virtue of section 4 (page 452) of the act is given authority generally to purchase such personal property as may be necessary in the exercise of its powers. This construction of subdivision 21 is in line with the construction given by the Supreme Court of subdivision 8 in McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 183, 40 Pac. 231, where it was held that repairing and altering a courthouse, or improving the grounds around it, was not included in the subdivision having reference to the publication and bids for the erection and construction of a building; the doctrine of which case being that the general power to contract may be exercised unless there is an express mode provided by statute. Nor have we involved here any such question as was involved in Swasey v. County of Shasta, 141 Cal. 394, 74 Pac. 1031, in which it was held that the erection and construction of a fence around a courthouse was included in the term "building," no doubt upon the theory that the building, fence, and property became real estate and was, in effect, one holding and a single entity. This cannot be said of the furniture in a house. Nor does the dictum in the case last mentioned affect the question here involved; the statement there being that "ordinary county supplies shall be bought after advertisement." The board of supervisors of a county, then, in the absence of statutory restrictions, may purchase personal property in the open market in like manner as other purchasers, and, unless there be some mode of purchase which shall be held the measure of their power, such purchase is not without authority of law, and warrants issued therefor are not issued without authority of law.

It is insisted, further, that the demurrer to the complaint admits that a part of the furniture purchased and paid for had not been delivered when the board approved the bill. A demurrer only admits matters material. The allegation of the complaint that the board had passed upon and allowed the bill is an allegation that the board, acting in a judicial capacity, had determined its correctness. It was the peculiar province of the board to pass upon the questions of fact involved in this purchase, and having determined the same it cannot be assailed collaterally. County of Alameda v. Evers, 136 Cal. 133, 68 Pac. 475. The same observations may be made with reference to the form in which the claim was presented. It affirmatively appears from the complaint that the board of supervisors has purchased, paid for, and retained the use of certain personal property, and a court is asked to compel restitution with penalty in favor of such purchasers. The Legislature never contemplated conferring such power upon a public corporation when it enacted section 8 of the county government act. The right there sought to be conferred was to recover money paid without authority of law. To say that one who receives property under a contract with the owner and retains and uses it is not authorized by law to pay for it would be to say that a public corporation may take and use property for public purposes without compensating the owner, provided they can once get possession of it under the guise of a contract; and to say that they may recover the purchase price actually paid without tendering back that which they have received would be to say that our Legislature intended to discourage common honesty as applied to public corporations, and that the courts were to be made "handmaidens of iniquity." We think, therefore, that this contract was valid in its inception, that the payment was regular, and that under no circumstances could the county recover this money while retaining the fruits of its bargain.

Order and judgment affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

NEWTON v. UNITED ELECTRIC, GAS & POWER CO.

APPEAL — NEW TRIAL — REVIEW — ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

The appellate court will not set aside an order of the trial court granting a new trial, unless it appears that it was erroneous, or that there has been an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Lyman Newton against the United Electric, Gas & Power Company. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve, A. S. Longley, and J. P. Chandler, for appellant. Cochran, Williams & Phillips, and Hunsaker & Britt, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The following is the opinion of the trial judge referred to in the decision of the court:

"In this case the facts are briefly these: Defendant maintains a transformer, which is attached to cross-beams. The cross-beams are fastened to piers under the approach to the Long Beach wharf and pavilion. The transformer and cross-beams are about 14 feet from the ground. From the shore side, two wires run to the transformer carrying a large voltage of electricity. Two wires run from the transformer, carrying a much lower voltage, to supply lights for the wharf and pavilion. At the time of the injury complained of, the plaintiff was employed by the city of Long Beach to sweep the wharf and pavilion, and perform other duties in line with such work. Early in the morning of the accident, plaintiff's attention was attracted to the fact that smoke was coming from one of the cross-beams. Plaintiff thereupon placed some boxes alongside of a small shack standing near, and by the aid of these boxes climbed upon the flat roof of the shack. A woman, who had attracted plaintiff's attention to the smoking cross-beam, passed him a small bucket of water which he threw at or upon the beam. Thereupon plaintiff fell or was thrown from the shack to the ground. He was soon in a partially unconscious condition. An examination, made soon afterwards, showed a loss of skin upon the backs of his hands and an injury to his back. One of the issues was whether these wounds were bruises caused by his fall from the shack to a board walk or whether they were electric burns. The plaintiff's theory of the case is that when he threw the water upon the cross-beam, a circuit was formed thereby, through the agency of the water, electricity then escaping at the cross-beam, was conducted to the plaintiff and through him and the shack to the ground. It was a wooden shack, and it is hardly supposable, though admitting this to have been a damp, foggy morning, that the wooden shack could have been a sufficiently good conductor of electricity to have completed the circuit so that plaintiff could have been shocked, even if it be assumed that the electricity would leave the cross-beam, and travel to plaintiff through the medium of a column of water or through the air saturated with water the distance from him to the beam. But plaintiff testified that as he was climbing up, he received quite a severe electric shock when he first put his hand upon the shack. If this is true, it would seem that the shack was 'grounded,' for, had it been 'grounded,' there could have been in it no accumulation of static electricity from a leakage of the service wires that ran into it. And if it was not 'grounded,' plaintiff, when standing upon it, could not have received through his body a current from the cross-beam either by the agency of the water or otherwise. But it seems quite improbable that the electricity would leave the cross-beam to take a path afforded by such a poor conductor as a column of water, even if it be conceded that, for an instant, there was a continuous column of water from the bucket to the cross-beam, which is also improbable. And it seems still more improbable that the electricity would travel to plaintiff through a column of aqueous atmosphere, created by the agency of the water thrown toward the beam. The injuries found upon the plaintiff's body are as well explained as bruises suffered in consequence of his fall as electric burns. Further, assuming that defendant was negligent in not properly insulating its wires, it is a grave question whether it can be said, as a legal proposition, that plaintiff's injuries (if he was injured in consequence of an electric shock) were a natural and probable consequence of defendant's negligence.

"Barrows on Negligence, at page 13, says: 'The tendency of the courts would seem to be that, negligence being established, the person guilty of it is liable for its consequences whether they be such as he could or ought to have forseen or not.' It has been held that one negligently causing a fire is liable only for damages or injuries caused by the fire, and that he is not liable for personal injuries received by persons in voluntarily attempting to extinguish the fire. As to this matter the cases of Liming v. Ill. Cent. R. Co., 81 Iowa, 246, 47 N. W. 66, and Pike v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (C. C.) 39 Fed. 255, may be cited as illustrating the conflicting views of the courts. But while courts have differed as to what are 'natural and probable' consequences of negligence in given cases, the principle that consequences of negligence to be actionable must be 'natural and probable' has not been denied. In this case, while the evidence may justify the conclusion that it is possible that plaintiff received an electric shock, it falls far short of showing a probability of such result under like circumstances. And a remotely possible consequence resulting through the agency of an unusual and peculiar set of cooperating circumstances fails to satisfy the requirements of a definition of a natural and probable consequence. In this case, the wires were suspended 14 feet from the ground, and were securely fastened. There was no apparent danger of anyone coming in contact with them in their position high above the ground and several feet below the plank walk overhead. There was no negligence in placing or securing these wires in their place. And as the only explanation of the very slight charring of the cross-beam, on the morning of the accident, is to be found in the fact that one of the insulators, on this beam, was broken, I think it should be held that plaintiff's injuries (conceding them to have resulted because of an electric shock) are not a natural and probable consequence of the breaking of this insulator. And I so hold, not upon the theory that in attempting to extinguish what he believed to be an incipient fire, plaintiff acted as a mere volunteer, but upon the theory that it was his right and duty to extinguish any fire that he believed might spread and injure or destroy the wharf and pavilion. And I do not find that plaintiff was guilty of any contributory negligence. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 679.

"But I do not think the evidence shows that defendant was negligent. The only substantial fact in the case upon which to predicate negligence is the fact that an insulator upon this cross-beam was broken. There is no satisfactory evidence showing when or how this insulator broke, nor any act or omission of defendant whereby it was broken or maintained for any time in a broken condition. There is no satisfactory evidence to show that defendant did or failed to do anything whereby it was remiss in its duty. And unless it can be held that the fact of the breaking of an insulator is itself proof of negligence, no negligence has been established in this case. On the other hand, the evidence introduced by defendant tends to show that it exercised all necessary and usual precautions."

"The defendant's motion for a new trial is granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and on the ground that the verdict is against law; and as to all other grounds, the motion is denied. D. K. Trask, Judge."

This appeal is from an order granting the motion of the defendant for a new trial. The case is stated and the grounds for granting the order appear in the opinion of the judge of the lower court—which will be found in the statement of the case.

We find nothing in the record to exclude the case from the established rule that the appellate court will not set aside an order of the trial court in granting or refusing a new trial, unless it appears that it was erroneous, or that there has been an abuse of discretion. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024; Cutten v. Pearsall, 146 Cal. 697, 81 Pac. 25.

The point chiefly urged by the appellant is, that the opinion of the court "is the opinion of the judge as an electrical expert, and not a judicial opinion." But assuming, for the purposes of the decision only, that we may look to the opinion of the judge as constituting the exclusive grounds of his decision, yet it is admitted that there was expert evidence on both sides of the question involved, and there is nothing in the opinion to indicate that the judge's decision was not based upon the expert evidence given pro and con.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SECURITY SAVINGS BANK v. SCOTT et al.

1. BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—RELEASE OF MORTGAGE.

A mortgage is not discharged by the mortgagor's adjudication and discharge as a bankrupt.

2. SAME—LIABILITY OF SPOUSE.

Where a mortgage was signed by the mortgagor's wife and contained an express agreement on her part to pay the note secured by the mortgage according to its terms and conditions, she was not discharged from liability by the mortgagor's adjudication and discharge as a bankrupt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Security Savings Bank against Arthur Scott and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hugh T. Gordon, for appellants. Shankland & Chandler, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff. The suit was brought on a mortgage executed by the defendants to secure a promissory note of the defendant Arthur Scott. The defendant Arthur suffered default. The defendant Colista sets up in her answer a conveyance of the property to her by her codefendant and a subsequent discharge of the latter in bankruptcy; and as to her a judgment was entered on the pleadings in favor of the respondent.

The only point urged by the appellants is that the mortgage was discharged by the adjudication in bankruptcy. No direct authority is cited for this proposition, nor do we think any argument in its favor can be drawn from the authorities and provisions of the law cited. The contrary seems to be established by the provisions of the bankruptcy act and the authorities cited in respondent's brief. The appellants' contention is, we think, without merit. Were it otherwise, there appears in the mortgage an express agreement upon her part "to pay said note according to the terms and conditions thereof"; and this, at least, was not discharged by the adjudication.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

KRAMM v. STOCKTON ELECTRIC R. CO.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 15, 1906.)

1. DEATH—COMPLAINT—NEGLIGENCE—WILLFULNESS.

A complaint charging that defendant, by its agents and servants, carelessly and negligently and willfully and wantonly ran one of its street cars upon, knocked down, ran over, and killed, plaintiff's intestate, was not demurrable for uncertainty because it could not be ascertained therefrom whether plaintiff claimed damages for negligence or willfulness; the gist of the action being the actual damages for the personal injuries inflicted by defendant's moving cars without reference to the manner in which the injury was inflicted.

2. NEGLIGENCE—WILLFULNESS.

While carelessness does not necessarily imply wantonness, wantonness may include negligence, since wantonness may exist without an intent to injure.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 86 Pac. 738. Petition denied.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Respondent petitions for a rehearing on two grounds: First, the insufficiency of the complaint; second, insufficiency of the evidence to entitle the case to be submitted to the jury. Upon the second of these points we are still of the opinion that the court erred in granting defendant's motion for nonsuit. Upon the first point it is perhaps due to defendant that we express an opinion, inasmuch as it is claimed that at the oral argument attention was called to it, although in respondent's brief the point was not alluded to and might, for that reason, be disregarded. People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 635, 19 Pac. 865, 20 Pac. 129; Phelps v. Mayer, 126 Cal. 551, 58 Pac. 1048. The complaint charged that defendant by its agents and servants "carelessly and negligently and willfully and wantonly * * * ran one of its street cars upon, knocked down, ran over and killed said Philip Kramm." There was a demurrer to the complaint for insufficient facts and also for uncertainty because it could not be ascertained therefrom whether plaintiff claimed damages for the alleged careless and negligent conduct of defendant or whether damages were claimed for the alleged willful and wanton conduct of defendant. The demurrer was overruled and the case went to trial on the complaint and answer. It is now urged "that plaintiff cannot recover in any event by reason of her complaint, which does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In other words, that there cannot be carelessness, negligence, willfulness and wantonness at the same time." No question as to ambiguity or uncertainty being urged in the petition for rehearing, we need not consider that ground of the demurrer.

In Esrey v. Southern Pacific Company, 103 Cal. 541, 37 Pac. 500, the complaint at the first trial (88 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. 211) charged that defendant carelessly and negligently "ran one of its cars against plaintiff," etc. When the cause was tried the second time, the complaint was amended so as to charge the acts of defendant to have been also "willfully and wantonly" done. The court said: "In view of the suggestion of the court made at the time the case was previously before us, the plaintiff prior to the present trial in the court below amended her complaint, by charging the acts of the defendant to have been willfully and wantonly done. Conceding this form of allegation necessary to support the judgment—and the law of the case would seem to so declare—still we do not think the cause of action has been materially altered by the amendment, and consequently the plea of the statute of limitations is not well taken. That amendment pertains wholly to the manner in which the injury was inflicted, and actual damage is all that is sought to be recovered. The gist of the action is a claim for actual damages for personal injuries inflicted by defendant's moving cars, and these are the facts found stated in the original complaint." And it was held that the form of the action was uncharged by adding to the charge of simple negligence and carelessness the element of wantonness. To constitute wantonness in the eye of the law, it is not necessary to allege or show an intent to injure. Gross negligence, or what is sometimes called the "last" negligence, may be the equivalent of willful or wanton negligence; and where the conduct of defendant exhibits reckless indifference to probable consequences, with knowledge of facts and circumstances likely to result in injury, it becomes wanton negligence. Harrington v. L. A. Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85. The claim that there cannot be carelessness, negligence, willfulness, and wantonness at the same time cannot be maintained. It is true that carelessness does not necessarily imply wantonness, but as wantonness may exist, without intent to injure, it certainly may imply carelessness. To do an act in reckless disregard of consequences, though not intending thereby to do injury, is to do the act in a careless and negligent manner, and would also, under some circumstances, be wantonly done. It was not necessary to sustain the action that the act of defendant be shown to have been wantonly and willfully as well as carelessly and negligently done. The fact that the manner of doing the act was charged in the conjunctive, did not deprive plaintiff of the right to show what happened and to recover accordingly. We violate no rule of pleading in holding that the complaint was sufficient as we understand the case of Esrey v. S. P. Co., supra.

The petition is denied.

PIPHER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AMADOR COUNTY et al.

1. APPEAL—FINAL JUDGMENT—SPECIAL PROCEEDING.

The presentation of the claim of an official court reporter to the judge or court for allowance is neither an action, nor a special proceeding, within Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1, authorizing an appeal from a final judgment entered in an action or special proceeding commenced in the superior court or brought thereto from another court.

2. MANDAMUS — STENOGRAPHERS — FEES—ALLOWANCE—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 274, provides that in criminal cases the fees for reporting and for transcripts ordered by the court must be paid out of the county treasury on the order of the court, etc. Held, that the action of the judge in passing on the claim of an official stenographer for fees earned in a criminal case was not final in the sense that it was conclusive or beyond review if erroneous; the duty of the judge after services have been performed under his order to direct the issuance of a warrant being ministerial and subject to control by mandamus.

3. SAME—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Where, on presentation of an official stenographer's claim for fees in a criminal case, the judge allowed a portion of the claim, but disallowed a claim for a transcript because it had not been ordered by him, as contended by the stenographer, mandamus would not lie to compel the judge to make a different finding of fact as to the order of such transcript and to compel the allowance of the balance of the claim.

Mandamus on petition of Joseph E. Pipher against the superior court of the state of California in Amador county and R. C. Rust, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

R. Platnauer, for petitioner. C. P. Vicini, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandate. The petition shows that plaintiff is an official reporter of the superior court and that defendant is judge of the superior court of Amador county. On May 1, 1905, defendant appointed petitioner as the official reporter, pro tempore, of said court, and he thereupon entered upon the discharge of his duties as such reporter. From May 1 to May 17, 1905, both inclusive, plaintiff, under order of said court, took down in shorthand all the proceedings at the trial then pending in said court in the case entitled, "The People, plaintiff, v. F. N. Staples, defendant," charged with the crime of murder. During the trial, upon the order of the court, plaintiff transcribed and made two copies of the testimony of certain witnesses taken at said trial and delivered to the district attorney and to the attorney for the defendant one copy each of such transcription, containing 1,200 folios of 100 words per folio, and also transcribed excerpts of certain other testimony, and delivered one copy each to the district attorney and defendant's attorney, said transcription containing 150 folios of 100 words per folio. On May 17, 1905, plaintiff presented to defendant a demand for the amount claimed to be due him for said services and for his reasonable traveling expenses from the city of Sacramento to the town of Jackson, and the amount of such demand for such services has by order of the court been paid to plaintiff. On May 17, 1905, defendant directed plaintiff to write out and transcribe and furnish defendant for transmission to the Governor a complete transcription of his shorthand notes of all the testimony taken and proceedings had at said trial, and also to furnish to the district attorney and attorney for defendant each a copy of said transcription, "other than that of the testimony of those witnesses whose testimony had theretofore been transcribed by affiant." Thereafter plaintiff complied with said order by making the transcription so ordered and furnished copies as ordered. "The transcription of affiant's shorthand notes of the whole of the proceedings in said action contained 3,450 folios of 100 words per folio, and that the transcription delivered to said district attorney, and to the attorney for the defendant in said action, each contained 2,250 folios of 100 words per folio. That the total amount of transcription performed by affiant subsequent to said 17th day of May, 1905, pursuant to said order aforesaid. was as follows: 1 copy of 1,200 folios, being 1 copy of the testimony of certain witnesses which had been transcribed during the trial, prior to the 17th day of May and 3 copies of 2 250 folios each, being the transcription of the balance of said shorthand notes excepting the testimony transcribed during the trial, said folios being 100 words each and said 3 copies having been made by affiant at one time." That subsequently, on June 23, 24, and 25, 1905, on the order of said court, plaintiff attended said court and reported the proceedings had in said case, and that his traveling expenses from Sacramento to Jackson and return were $5.50. That the fees allowed by law, including traveling expenses, for such services are the sum of $1,018. That plaintiff has received $500 and no more, which sum was paid on June 24th, and there remains due the sum of $518. That on February 14, 1906, plaintiff demanded of defendant in writing that said court make an order directing the payment of said last-named sum out of the county treasury of said Amador county as due plaintiff for his said services, and "defendant refused and still refuses to make such order, or any other than one directing the payment to affiant out of said county treasury of the sum of $113."

Defendant answered by a sworn statement. After stating the fact as to the transcription which was made during the trial and paid for, the answer denies that defendant made any order in the matter other than as follows: "At the conclusion of the said trial defendant ordered said plaintiff as such official reporter pro tempore to complete the transcription of the testimony taken and proceedings had at said trial by transcribing two copies of his notes excepting the portions already transcribed and which had been paid for. so that the court could file one copy with the clerk of the court and forward the other to the office of the Governor of the state and that plaintiff proceeded to do so and procured the return from the district attorney and from the attorney for the defendant of the testimony transcribed during the trial and incorporated it into the two copies of the transcript ordered by the court, but without any order or authorization therefor he made a complete copy of the entire record and sent it to this defendant with a statement that he made it for transmission to the Governor, and also his bill for it, and for the two copies ordered by the court. That defendant refused to accept the copy not ordered and notified plaintiff that he would hold the copy subject to his order. That said copy has never been accepted or used and is still in the chambers of defendant as judge of said superior court, subject to plaintiff's order. The bill presented by plaintiff was for $1,029.50, and on June 24, 1905, defendant ordered paid thereon the sum of $500 which plaintiff on said date received. That on July 29, 1905, defendant as such judge passed upon and allowed on said bill the further sum of $113 and ordered the county auditor to draw his warrant on the treasurer of said Amador county for said sum in favor of plaintiff," which he refused to accept. Defendant further "avers that he has acted upon plaintiff's claim and allowed it in the sum of $1,193.50, all of which plaintiff has received except the sum of $113, and that such allowance is a full, fair, and adequate allowance to plaintiff for all his services, expenses, and transcriptions." Defendant demurred to the petition for want of facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the relief demanded.

It appears from the petition, as well as from the answer, that plaintiff presented his bill for allowance for the full amount claimed to the judge of the court who acted upon it, made an allowance, and ordered a warrant drawn for the amount in his judgment found to be due. The fees allowed the official reporter are provided for by section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it is provided: "In criminal cases, the fees for reporting and for transcripts ordered by the court to be made must be paid out of the county treasury upon the order of the court: provided that when there is on official reporter in attendance, and a reporter pro tempore is appointed, his reasonable expenses for traveling and detention must be paid and allowed by the court and paid in like manner."

It is claimed by plaintiff that the rule for determining whether a writ should issue in any particular case is stated in Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, as follows: If the determination of the tribunal was not intended to be final, and there is no other adequate remedy, the writ must issue. And it is stated that the sole issue of law here is as to the power of the court to compel a judge of the superior court to act in a specified manner. It is contended that the court has such power (Wood v. Strother), and that the demurrer should be overruled and that the questions of fact raised by the answer should be tried by this court, in accordance with sections 1089 and 1090 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant contends that the proceeding pointed out by section 274 is either an action or a special proceeding under sections 20, 21, 22, and 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the judgment of the court therein was appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963), and thus there was furnished "a plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law," within the meaning of section 1086 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is also claimed that the court having acted by making its order, mandamus will not lie to compel it to reverse its order and act differently, because plaintiff has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law; also, that the duty performed by the court was judicial, and, whether or not the court erred, its action cannot be reviewed by mandamus. Section 963, subd. 1, gives an appeal "from a final judgment entered in an action, or special proceeding commenced in a superior court, or brought into a superior court from another court." We do not think that the presentation of his claim by the reporter to the judge or court for allowance is either an action or a special proceeding such as is contemplated by the Code sections referred to by defendant, and therefore no appeal lies under section 963. Indeed, the language of this latter section refers only to final judgments entered in actions or special proceedings "commenced in a superior court, or brought into a superior court from another court." The making up and presenting the bill of the official reporter for his services can hardly be said to be an action or special proceeding. It is only when the court refuses to act at all, or, acting, allows less than is claimed, that any cause of action can arise.

Nor is the action of the judge in passing upon the claim final in the sense that it is conclusive and placed wholly beyond review or correction if erroneous. If the record showed beyond dispute that an order had been made by the judge to perform the service for which the claim was presented, and that the service was performed as ordered, we do not think the judge could arbitrarily refuse to direct the auditor to draw his warrant for the amount due. The statute fixes definitely the compensation, and, where the services have been performed under the order of the judge, his further duty to direct the warrant to issue is ministerial and we think could be compelled by mandate. It would be no sufficient answer that the reporter had an action at law in the proper court for his services. But in the case here it appears from the answer of the judge that he made no order authorizing the plaintiff to perform the services charged for. He allowed all items for services in any way authorized by him. If there was a minute order entered in the records of the court, the plaintiff has failed to present it. We have only his general statement that he was ordered to make the transcription for which he makes the charge. To the contrary the defendant sets forth specifically what the order was, and, being the judge of the court who made the order, we think we must accept it as the true statement of the fact, and this is the only fact in controversy.

But, aside from this view of the matter, it is undisputed that the judge had the whole subject before him and acted upon it. He passed upon the fact and decided that there was no order made by him authorizing the transcription for which alone the claim is made. He also passed upon and allowed all other items, and as to them there is no dispute. The authorization is the foundation of plaintiff's claim, and this fact is found against him and is conclusive upon us. We must presume that the court speaks either from the minute entry or from his notes as to what the order in fact was. The court has the power to direct the minute entry to be made to conform to the fact (Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 43 Pac. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139), and we must presume that the court would make the entry to correspond with its sworn statement here. No rule of the law of mandamus would justify this court in ordering the judge to make a different finding of fact. Conceding that we may direct him to act in a particular way the rule laid down in Wood v. Strother, supra, does not go to the extent of holding that we may compel the exercise of his judgment or discretion in a particular way. The county was liable for such transcription only as was authorized by order of the court. Richards v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 38, 78 Pac. 244. If, as has been said, the facts were undisputed that services, for which the law fixed a definite compensation, had been rendered pursuant to the order of the court, mandamus would lie to compel the court to allow the claim and direct the warrant to issue. To this extent the judge would be compelled to act in a particular way. But the rule cannot be so extended as to authorize this court to compel the judge to find a fact in a particular way against his conception and judgment of what the fact was. It was said in Rundberg v. Belcher, 118 Cal. 589, 50 Pac. 670: "While mandamus will lie to compel judicial action and in some instances even specific action (Wood v. Strother, supra), and is an appropriate remedy in a proper case to obtain the relief here sought (People v. Norton, 16 Cal. 436), it may not be invoked to require a judicial officer to act in a particular way, except it appear by necessary legal deduction from the facts stated that the aggrieved party has been denied a right which it was the plain legal duty of the officer to grant and without his proper discretion to refuse." To compel the court to find the fact in a particular way would be to constitute this court the tribunal to hear and determine as a court of first instance the very questions committed to the judge of the superior court, or would convert this court into a court for the correction of errors of both law and fact by writ of mandamus. This is not and never was the office of mandamus.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County.

Appeal by the people from an order sustaining a demurrer to the indictment on a prosecution against D. O. Druffel. Affirmed.

Dist. Atty. Campbell, for the People. Nicholas Bowden, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to the indictment. The order also directs that the case be submitted to the next grand jury.

The transcript on appeal contains no bill of exceptions, but consists of: (1) The indictment; (2) Demurrer of defendant to indictment; (3) Minute order allowing demurrer; (4) Notice of appeal; (5) Certificate of clerk of trial court. It is objected by respondent that without a bill of exceptions there is no proper record before this court, and in support of this contention cites us to People v. Long, 121 Cal. 494, 53 Pac. 1097, which was an appeal, without a bill of exceptions, from an order sustaining a demurrer to an indictment, and ordering the case submitted to the grand jury. It was there held that without a bill of exceptions no review of the action of the court in sustaining a demurrer to the indictment could be had upon an appeal by the people from the order sustaining the demurrer. The procedure followed in this case is identical with that of the Long Case, and the doctrine laid down in the latter case governs this case.

There being no legal record before us from which we can determine whether the court erred, the order appealed from is affirmed.

HALL, J. This is a companion case to People v. Druffel (Cr. 35; this day decided) 86 Pac. 907.

The transcript contains no bill of exceptions, and upon the authority of People v. Long, 121 Cal. 494, 53 Pac. 1097, the order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal — Mandate — Correction of Judgment—Jurisdiction of Lower Court.

Where a judgment for costs had been docketed in conformity with Supreme Court rule 23 (78 Pac. xi), on the remand of the case, and as provided by Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Actions by W. S. Chapman against Thomas Hughes and others. From an order vacating a judgment, plaintiff and E. W. Chapman appeal. Reversed.

T. M. Osmont and Garrett McEnerney, for appellants. L. L. Cory, F. H. Short, and H. Hawes, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. The above-entitled actions were consolidated and tried as one, but the court in deciding entered separate findings, judgments and decrees. On appeal from the judgment, or judgments, so entered, the Supreme Court rendered two opinions, and it will be necessary to quote from each at some length in order to explain the question here presented for decision. In the main opinion, filed April 7, 1900, the opinion in department was expressly approved and made a part of the opinion in bank, and we quote from the decision therein as follows: "It is to be remembered that, while this was originally a simple action by Chapman against Hughes for an accounting, it subsequently became complicated by supplemental pleadings and the addition of new parties defendant. Of these, one was the defendant E. W. Chapman, against whom Hughes was seeking an accounting, and others were grantees and transferees of parts of the land and of mortgages, and of mortgage notes. Although those actions were consolidated and tried as one, and a single judgment entered, yet between these defendants there was no privity nor common interest. It would therefore be unjust to force a defendant who has established the validity of his purchase to litigate the matter anew because the findings of the court in some other respect not material to his rights have been successfully attacked. Therefore, in subservience of the ends of justice and the right of the parties, it is ordered that the judgments appealed from be vacated. It is further ordered that a new trial be had upon the issues touching the right of Hughes to an accounting with E. W. Chapman; that, if after such hearing the court shall determine that Hughes is entitled to an accounting, it shall take or order taken an account, to the end that the sum found due, if any, from E. W. Chapman to Hughes, may be set off against the sum found due, if any, from Hughes to W. S. Chapman. It is further ordered and adjudged that the accounting between W. S. Chapman and Thomas E. Hughes be affirmed in all respects as settled by the court, and that his sales, transfers, and assignments of parts of the land, and of the proceeds of sales of parts of the land, be affirmed in all respects as found by the court, saving as to those matters and as to those findings hereinabove considered as to which it has been declared that the findings are not sufficiently supported by the evidence. As to such transactions, a further accounting shall be had in accordance with the rulings of this court, upon which accounting proper evidence addressed by any of the parties shall be received and considered." Upon a rehearing touching the single proposition of the validity of the deed from Thomas E. to Matilda B. Hughes, the court said: "To the end, therefore, that the record in this case, or in these cases, may be free from uncertainty, it is ordered that the judgments appealed from be reversed, and the cause or causes remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the views here expressed and with those expressed in the opinion of this court rendered April 7, 1900." Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 644, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982. When the remittitur was filed in the court below, the appellants, there and here, filed their memorandum of costs incurred on that appeal, and the clerk of the trial court thereupon docketed judgments for such costs against all of the defendants in the three actions included in the order of consolidation. Upon motion, the lower court entered an order that no portion of the costs included in the memorandum were properly chargeable against the defendants Annie E. Hughes, O. J. Woodward, H. U. Maxfield, First National Bank of Fresno, T. W. Patterson, Fresno National Bank, H. D. Colson, Fresno Loan & Savings Bank, and James Dungan, and that the judgment so docketed against said defendants be vacated and set aside. It was further ordered that the judgment docketed against Thomas E. Hughes, W. M. Hughes, and L. E. Patterson be likewise set aside, their liability for such costs to abide a future determination by the trial court. The plaintiff and defendant E. W. Chapman appeal from the order so made and entered.

The attorneys for respondents have not favored us with their views touching the questions to be decided, but counsel for appellants contend that the trial court was without jurisdiction in the premises, inasmuch as the Supreme Court by reversing the judgments had fixed the liability for costs on all of the defendants. It needs no citation of authorities to show that where a judgment for costs has been docketed, in conformity with rule 23 of the Supreme Court (78 Pac. xi) and section 958 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the trial court is without power to vacate or set aside such judgment. But it does not follow that the trial court is without authority to make a judgment entered on its records or docket conform to the directions of the higher court. This power certainly exists when the cause has been remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of the supreme tribunal, and it has been impliedly recognized even where there was a simple reversal. Long v. Superior Court, 127 Cal. 687, 60 Pac. 464; Baker v. Southern Calif. Ry. Co., 130 Cal. 114, 62 Pac. 302. It follows that so far as the order here assailed conforms to the decision of the Supreme Court it is valid, and that any portion thereof contrary to such decision is void.

It is clear, from the deciding clauses quoted from the opinions of the Supreme Court on the former appeal, that said court intended to and did affirm the findings of the trial court as to all defendants claiming by purchase or assignment from Hughes, save where it was expressly declared that the findings were not sufficiently supported by the evidence. It is also very clear that it was not intended that there should be a new trial as to any of such defendants, and that it only remained for the trial court to enter a judgment in their favor upon the findings expressly approved. The plain purpose of the general clause reversing the judgments, found in the last opinion filed, was to free the record from any uncertainty that might otherwise exist, and clear the way for the entry of judgments in conformity with the opinions. It follows that the judgments for costs docketed against the First National Bank of Fresno, Fresno National Bank, H. D. Colson, Fresno Loan & Savings Bank, O. J. Woodward, T. W. Patterson, and James Dungan was void, and that the order under review as to them was and is valid. And we think this also applies to defendant H. U. Maxfield, for, while it was said that there should have been a finding that the transfer to him was made as collateral security, and that upon a satisfaction of his debt any balance should go into the trust fund, it clearly appears that the finding as to his right as an innocent transferee was held good. As to the other defendants named in the order, we think the same was void as in conflict with the decision of the higher court, and the judgment for costs contained in the remittitur. The judgment was affirmed in part and reversed in part as to defendant Thomas E. Hughes, and this under the rule touching a modification of the judgment made him liable for costs. We do not think his discharge in the insolvency proceedings relieved him from this liability, and in any event it is certain that the trial court was powerless to relieve him from the effect of the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court.

The order as to the Fresno National Bank First National Bank of Fresno, Fresno Loan & Savings Bank, and defendants Colson, Woodward, Patterson, Maxfield, and Dungan is affirmed. As to the defendants Annie E. Hughes, Thomas E. Hughes, W. M. Hughes and L. E. Patterson, the order is reversed, appellants to recover their costs from said defendants as to whom the order is reversed.

DORRIS et al. v. McMANUS et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1906.)

1. Quieting Title—Defenses.

In a suit to quiet title, a defense that, if defendant B. prevailed in a pending suit, he intended to bring another action on indicated legal grounds, the judgment in which might enable creditors of a firm at the time of a conveyance of the land in controversy to plaintiff's grantor to subject the property to seizure and sale in satisfaction of their demands, was insufficient.

2. Cancellation of Instruments—Deeds—Fraud.

Parties seeking to annul a conveyance of land for fraud must both plead and prove facts constituting legal fraud, either actual or constructive.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, § 78.]

3. Fraudulent Conveyances — Consideration.

Where, in a suit to quiet title, one of the defendants claimed that a conveyance to plaintiff's grantor was fraudulent as to the creditors of the firm making such conveyance, the inadequacy of the consideration for the conveyance to plaintiff was immaterial; the creditors of the firm being only interested in the bona fides and validity of the deed from the firm.

4. Action—Right to Begin—Another Action Pending.

Where defendant was prosecuting a suit to judgment with a view, after recovering the judgment, of instituting other proceedings to set aside conveyances of certain land to plaintiff as a fraud on the creditors of plaintiff's prior grantors, plaintiff was entitled at once to commence a suit to quiet title, and was not compelled to suspend the trial thereof until the suit defendant had brought and the one he intended to bring had been determined.

5. Quieting Title—Injunction—Effect.

Where, in a suit to quiet title, the court, in addition to decreeing that plaintiffs owned the land and that defendants had no interest therein, awarded a perpetual injunction restraining defendants from setting up or maintaining any action or proceeding under which they asserted any claim to the property, such injunction was merely ancillary to the principal relief granted, and, if unnecessary to make the relief to which plaintiffs were entitled effectual, it was not prejudicial to defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by P. S. Dorris and another against Laura J. McManus and others. From a judgment in favor of complainants, defendant Charles Bohnert appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Magaffey and E. C. Bonner, for appellant. G. F. Harris, Jamison & Adams, and Gillis & Tapscott, for respondents.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Action to quiet title. The complaint contains the averments usual in this class of actions, all of which are denied in the answer. In addition to such denials, the answer contains affirmative allegations, reciting that on the 11th day of January, 1901, appellant commenced an action in the superior court of Modoc county, against P. A. Dorris and C. J. Dorris, a copartnership styled "P. A. Dorris & Bro.," upon a promissory note executed to appellant by said partnership, for the principal sum of $2,780 and interest thereon, which action was then pending and undetermined. That appellant, in the event that he obtained judgment in said action, which had then been pending more than two years and nine months, intended to and would institute another action to set aside the transfer of the property in dispute to plaintiffs, on the ground that at the time such transfer was made said property belonged to and was owned by said partnership, and the members thereof, who procured the execution of said transfer to plaintiffs, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of said firm. The facts which might render such transfer fraudulent were not stated, nor was there any attempt to show that an action to set it aside would rest on a substantial, or even plausible, basis. There was no positive statement that the partnership, or any individual member thereof, ever owned any part of the land; nor was there any averment tending, in the remotest degree, to show that the debt, evidenced by the promissory note sued upon, accrued, before the transfer was made, or that appellant was or could be in a position to bring an action to set it aside. First National Bank v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 490, 77 Pac. 1043, 103 Am. St. Rep. 95. No light was thrown on the probability of appellant's success in the pending suit, and surmise was left groping as to the likelihood of his obtaining a favorable judgment in the action which would be commenced at some indefinite future date, if the stated contingency arose, and appellant did not recede from his then existing intention. In short, the affirmative defense contains nothing to show that the transfer to plaintiff was probably, or even possibly, void or voidable as to appellant. Boiled down to its essence, it amounts to no more than a bald statement that, if appellant prevailed in a pending suit, he intended to bring another action upon indicated legal grounds, the judgment in which might, perchance, enable creditors of the firm at the time the transfer was made to make the property in controversy subject to seizure and sale in satisfaction of their demands. It is apparent that this cannot be distorted or twisted into any semblance of a claim of title, present or future, vested or contingent, and that imagination must be given full rein, in order to draw therefrom an inference that respondent's title can ever be affected or impaired through appellant's agency. In order to reach the conclusion that appellant's rights, whatever they may be, will ever assume tangible form as a chain of title adverse to respondents, we must indulge in conjecture upon conjecture, without any statement of facts justifying a random guess. Pleadings are construed most strongly against the pleader; but, if the rule was reversed, the affirmative matter pleaded in the answer would still lack many elements necessary to constitute an equitable or any form of defense. The only issue, therefore, was whether respondent's claim of ownership was well founded when tested in the crucible of appellant's admitted assertion of right. The court, however, not only found on such issue, but also found that the transfer to plaintiffs was not fraudulent, and added specific findings reciting certain facts and circumstances preceding and attending the execution of such transfer. Appellant assails the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, but as they all relate to the main issue of title, and the validity of the transfer to plaintiffs, which was not, properly, an issue in the case, nothing will be lost if we proceed to an analysis of the evidence without more particular mention of the objections urged.

The title to more than 2,800 acres of land is here involved, and the evidence shows without conflict that neither P. A. nor C. J. Dorris, nor the firm of which they were members, ever had any apparent, tangible, legal, or equitable right or title to more than 320 acres thereof. Title to the bulk of this large area was acquired through letters patent issued in 1881 and 1882 by the state of California to Jerome Churchill, the immediate grantor of the plaintiffs. The greater portion of the remainder was conveyed to said Churchill prior to the year 1885, by parties who held under patents from the general government. P. A. and C. J. Dorris acquired title to 320 acres of the land in dispute, through patents from the last-mentioned source, but conveyed the same to Churchill in 1882 for a stated consideration of $7,013. It will thus be seen that plaintiff's grantor acquired title to most of the land from primary sources, and that he held and possessed all of it for many years before the deed to plaintiffs was executed. On June 29, 1900, Churchill, as party of the first part, and P. A. and C. J. Dorris, of the firm of P. A. Dorris & Bro., as parties of the second part, entered into an agreement, the preamble of which recites that the parties thereto had for years past had unsettled accounts, and that the second parties were indebted to the first party in a large sum of money, and that they mutually desired to effect a full and final settlement of all business matters between them. It was further recited in said preamble that the said second parties theretofore had a "contingent interest in certain property in the possession and owned and controlled" by the party of the first part, and that in an agreement entered into in 1898 the first party agreed to sell, and the second parties to buy, certain real estate for the sum of $30,000, payable on a date mentioned, and that the latter desired to be relieved from the obligation thus assumed. Following these preliminary recitals the second parties agreed to "release, remise and convey" to said party of the first part all claim, right, title, and interest held by them, in or to all property, real, personal, and mixed, to which said second parties had theretofore made any claim, contingent or otherwise, and particularly all claims accruing under the agreement of 1898. Thereupon the party of the first part agreed to release the second parties from all claims, demands, and indebtedness of every kind and nature, and all parties mutually agreed that this would constitute a full settlement of all demands between them. On the same day the said second parties executed a quitclaim deed to the lands here in question to Churchill, and the latter conveyed the same to plaintiffs for a stated consideration of $10. Churchill testified that he had been dealing with P. A. and C. J. Dorris, as partners, for 25 years, and that at the time of the settlement they owed him about $350,000. He further stated that in the settlement he took all of their property, consisting of 6,000 cattle, 600 horses, and certain ranches in Modoc and Siskiyou counties, of the aggregate value of about $218,000. His testimony was corroborated by his son, and plaintiff P. S. Dorris testified as to the annoyance and detriment suffered by reason of claims against the land made by creditors of P. A. and C. J. Dorris. This was all the evidence presented by respondent, and appellant offered no evidence whatever.

The mere statement of the evidence is sufficient to demonstrate that the finding in favor of respondents' title and against appellant's claim must be upheld. And assuming that the case was tried upon the theory that the fraudulent nature of the transfer to plaintiffs was in issue, we think the finding against appellant on this point is fully sustained by the evidence. Indeed, we think there is no evidence to the contrary. Fraud is odious and is never presumed. The parties seeking to annul any contract, and particularly a transfer of real property, on that ground, must fully and clearly plead and prove the facts constituting legal fraud, actual or constructive. Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 693, 82 Pac. 327; De Galindo v. De Galindo, 147 Cal. 81, 81 Pac. 279; People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 436, 51 Pac. 630; Gray v. Galpin, 98 Cal. 635, 33 Pac. 725. Here there was not only a failure to plead, but an utter dearth of evidence to prove fraud of any kind. It is said that the consideration mentioned in the deed from Churchill to plaintiffs was clearly inadequate, and hence an inference or presumption of fraud arose from that fact alone. But appellant is not concerned with the adequacy of the consideration passing to Churchill from plaintiffs, but with the bona fides and validity of the deed from P. A. and C. J. Dorris to the former. If that transaction was not tainted by fraud, actual or constructive, then it could not matter to appellant whether any consideration good or valuable passed to Churchill from his grantees. In testing the validity of the deed to Churchill; the interest of the firm or its members in the land, the reasons underlying the equitable interest, which was all they could have therein, and many other facts showing why the transfer of such equitable interest to a creditor holding the legal title was fraudulent, would have to be pleaded and proven. The answer leaves us perplexed and doubtful as to the nature of the pleading and proof upon which his assault on the tranfers will be made, and perplexity gives way to bewilderment when appellant, though afforded an opportunity, submitted his case without affording any enlightenment on this point.

It is next contended that an action to quiet title cannot lie against appellant's asserted right, and that the court should have deferred the trial of this cause until the suit which appellant had brought, and the one he intended to bring, had both been determined. Waiving the fact that the answer admits that appellant was claiming an estate and interest in the land adverse to appellants, it seems quite clear to us that this contention cannot be sustained. Code Civ. Proc. § 738; Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 149; Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 447, 21 Pac. 946; Withers v. Jacks, 79 Cal. 300, 21 Pac. 824, 12 Am. St. Rep. 143; Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 5, 81 Pac. 121; Dranga v. Rowe, 127 Cal. 509, 59 Pac. 944. It would indeed be strange if persons in the position of respondents could not compel the adjudication of asserted claims as strenuously urged and tenaciously defended as those here contended for by appellant. In addition to decreeing that respondents owned the land, and that appellants had no right, title, or interest therein, the court awarded a perpetual injunction restraining all of the defendants from setting up or maintaining any action, proceeding, or claim under or through which defendants asserted any claim, right, interest, legal or equitable, in or to the property or any portion thereof; "whereby they, or any or either of them, could or might throw any cloud upon the title of said plaintiffs." It is argued that this clause, of itself, is so palpably erroneous as to necessitate reversal, because it prohibits appellant from bringing an action to test the validity of the tranfers through which plaintiffs obtained title. Haggin v. Kelley, 136 Cal. 481, 69 Pac. 140, and Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 416, 80 Pac. 517, are cited in support of the position assumed; but we can find nothing in either case sustaining the proposition. We have neither the right nor the inclination to pass upon questions not before us, and therefore refrain from any comment touching the effect of the judgment here, as an estoppel against further litigation between the same parties touching the title to the premises. It is enough to say that the injunction is merely ancillary to the principal relief, and, if it was unnecessary to make the relief to which respondent was entitled effectual it could not injure appellant. Kittle v. Bellegarde, 86 Cal. 556, 25 Pac. 55; Brooks v. Calderwood, 34 Cal. 566; Axtell v. Gerlach, 67 Cal. 484, 8 Pac. 34; Jones v. Jones, 140 Cal. 591, 74 Pac. 143.

SCHREINER v. GRANT BROS.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 29, 1906.)

1. Master and Servant—Injuries to Servant—Action—Pleading.

Plaintiff alleged that at the time of his injury he was employed by defendants as a foreman of a steam shovel gang in the construction of a roadbed; that, while engaged in blasting, by reason of the negligence of "the defendants and their servants," he received the injury complained of, but there was no specific allegation as to the servant chargeable with the negligence. Held, that the complaint did not allege that plaintiff himself was not the servant whose negligence caused the accident, and was therefore demurrable.

2. Same.

Such defect was not supplied by other allegations that defendants did not employ a competent powder man, and that they employed plaintiff without telling him of the danger, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by John Schreiner against Grant Brothers. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Nattingly, for appellant. Isidore B. Dockweiler, for respondents.

SMITH, J. The suit was brought to recover personal damages suffered by the plaintiff while in the employment of the defendants, and alleged to have been caused by their negligence in numerous particulars specified, or some of them. The judgment was on demurrer to the complaint.

The complaint is very confused and unsatisfactory in its allegations, and, indeed, seems to have been drawn with the view of concealing the actual facts in the case. The facts, however, as gathered from the complaint, seem to have been: The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as foreman of the steam shovel gang in the construction of a roadbed which defendants were building. As preliminary to the doing of this work some blasting was required, and plaintiff was employed by defendants to take charge of this work, or, as expressed in the complaint, was ordered to do so. And, while so engaged, by reason of the negligence of "the defendants and their servants" he received the injury complained of. From these allegations non constat that the plaintiff himself was not the servant whose negligence caused the accident; and from the careful omission of any more specific allegation as to the servant chargeable with the negligence, it may be surmised that such was in fact the case. The demurrer to the complaint was rightly sustained.

There are numerous other allegations—such, e. g., as that the defendants did not employ a competent powder foreman, and that they employed the plaintiff without telling him of the danger, etc.—but these do not, we think, supply the essential defect in the complaint.

Judgment affirmed.

McAULAY v. TAHOE ICE CO.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Undertaking—Amount.

Where plaintiff appealed from an order that judgment be entered in favor of defendant on defendant's payment to the clerk of the sum of $92 and from the judgment entered pursuant to such order, only one undertaking on appeal was required.

2. Same—Filing—Time.

Where an undertaking on appeal was filed on the same day on which the notice of appeal was served, it was in time.

3. Courts — Appellate Jurisdiction — Amount in Controversy.

Where the amount claimed was in excess of $2,000, an appeal was properly taken to the Supreme Court, which alone had jurisdiction, as provided by Const. art. 6, § 4.

4. Appeal—Undertaking—Validity.

Const. art. 6, § 1, vests the judicial power of the state in a Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 940, declares that an appeal is taken by filing a notice with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, stating the appeal from the same, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party or his attorney, and the filing of an undertaking, within five days after service of such notice. Section 941 provides that the bond must be to the effect that the appellant will pay all costs which may be awarded on the appeal, or on a dismissal thereof, not exceeding $300. Held, that where a notice of appeal recited that plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, and an undertaking recited that it was to cover an appeal to the "Appellate Court for the Third District of the State of California," a court which did not exist, such undertaking was insufficient to sustain the appeal.

5. Same—Dismissal.

Const. art. 6, § 4, declares that no appeal taken to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal shall be dismissed for the reason only that the same was not taken to the proper court, but the case shall be transferred to the proper court on terms. Held, that such section merely saved appeals taken to one court when the jurisdiction was in another, but did not save an appeal from dismissal where the undertaking was insufficient to sustain an appeal to the court to which it was attempted to be taken.

6. Same—Undertaking—Validity.

Where an undertaking on appeal described an appeal to a court which did not exist and which was different from the court to which the notice of appeal recited the appeal was taken, it was fatally defective, though under Code Civ. Proc. § 941, providing the terms of an appeal bond, it was unnecessary that it should recite the name of the court to which the appeal was taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Thomas McAulay against the Tahoe Ice Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss. Granted.

J. M. Walling, for appellant. Morrison & Cope and Thos. S. Ford, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for personal services as agent of defendant. The cause was tried before a jury and, after deliberation, the jury returned into court and, being asked if they had agreed upon a verdict, answered they had. Before the amendment or recording thereof, the judge of the court ordered the plaintiff to pay the jury fees of $92, whereupon "counsel for plaintiff stated that plaintiff was unable to pay said jury fee." The court then "ordered that plaintiff be granted ten days within which to pay the jury fee, and, if not paid during that time, the court would enter a judgment in favor of the defendant because of the failure of said plaintiff to pay said jury fee. The jury were then excused from further service." There was no rule of court regulating the payment of jury fees, although it was the practice of the court to require payment of the jury fee by the prevailing party before the verdict was read. Upon April 25, 1905, counsel for defendant gave notice of a motion to be heard on May 1, 1905, to dismiss said action and enter judgment for defendant upon the grounds, among others, that "ten days have elapsed since said court ordered plaintiff to pay the jury fees, and the same have not been paid." Said motion was continued to May 20, 1905, on which date, on motion of defendant, the court made and entered an order "* * * that judgment in said action be entered in favor of the defendant upon payment by the defendant to the clerk of this court of said sum of $92." And on the 20th day of May, 1905, judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his action. Thereafter, to wit, on June 6, 1905, plaintiff served notice in the said action that he "appeals to the Supreme Court of the state of California, from the judgment therein entered, in said superior court, on the 20th day of May, 1905; * * * also from the order of said court entered herein, dated May 20th, 1905. * * *" On June 6, 1905, plaintiff filed with the clerk of the court an undertaking in said action entitled "In the superior court, county of Nevada, state of California. Thomas McAulay, Plaintiff, v. Tahoe Ice Company, a corporation, Defendant. Undertaking on appeal." The body of the undertaking reads as follows: "Whereas, the plaintiff, Thomas McAulay, in the above-entitled action intends to appeal to the Appellate Court, for the Third District, of the state of California, from a judgment and order made and entered against plaintiff in said action, in the superior court, in favor of defendant, Tahoe Ice Company, in said action, entered on the 20th day of May, A. D. 1905: * * * Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and of such appeal, we, the undersigned, * * * undertake and promise * * * that the said appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal or on a dismissal thereof, not exceeding three hundred dollars. * * *" Respondent has filed a motion to dismiss the appeals on the following grounds: First, that no undertaking was filed within five days after the service of the notice of appeal; second, that no undertaking has been filed at any time; third, that the pretended undertaking is not an undertaking on appeal to the Supreme Court, but pretends to be an undertaking on appeal taken to a court having no existence, namely, to the Appellate Court for the Third District of the state of California, and the notice of appeal given was that appellant appealed to the Supreme Court; fourth, that but one undertaking for $300 was given, whereas there were two appeals, each requiring such undertaking.

The undertaking was filed on the same day on which the notice of appeal was served and was in time. We think, also, one undertaking for $300 was sufficient. Wadleigh v. Phelps, 147 Cal. 135, 81 Pac. 418. A more serious question remains. The notice of appeal was that plaintiff appeals to the Supreme Court, and properly, because that court alone had jurisdiction; the amount claimed being in excess of $2,000 Section 4, art. 6, of the Constitution. The undertaking recites that plaintiff "intends to appeal to the Appellate Court, for the Third District, of the state of California." There is no such court known to our judicial system by that title or name. Section 1, art. 6, of the Constitution declares that "the judicial power of the state shall be vested * * * in a Supreme Court, District Courts of Appeal," etc. Section 4 divides the state, by counties, "into three Appellate Districts," provided that "in each of which there shall be a District Court of Appeal consisting of three justices." The county of Nevada, whence comes this case, is embraced within this "the third district." Throughout the Constitution, where reference is made to this court, it is designated a "District Court of Appeal." "An appeal is taken by filing a notice with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, * * * and serving a similar notice upon the adverse party or his attorney, * * * the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of the appeal, an undertaking be filed. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. 940. "The undertaking on appeal must be in writing, and must be executed on the part of the appellant, by at least two sureties, to the effect that the appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded on the appeal, or on a dismissal thereof, not exceeding three hundred dollars. * * *" Id., § 941. The undertaking contemplated can be for no other purpose than to indemnify the respondent, i. e., "that the appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal." The appeal referred to is and can be none other than the appeal referred to in the notice. The appeal is declared to be "ineffectual for any purpose unless the undertaking be filed." The undertaking referred to in sections 940 and 941 is obviously the same undertaking. The indemnity attempted to be given was not against damages and costs that might be incurred in the Supreme Court, to which plaintiff gave notice of appeal, and if one may regard the designation of the court given in the undertaking as sufficiently certain, it would not have been a compliance with the statute, for the requirement is that the undertaking shall be "to the effect that the appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal," which, as we have said, means only the "damages and costs awarded" in the judgment rendered in the court to which the appeal is noticed.

Appellant cites the following provision of section 4, art. 6, of the Constitution: "No appeal taken to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal shall be dismissed for the reason only that the same was not taken to the proper court, but the case shall be transferred to the proper court upon such terms as to costs or otherwise as may be just, and shall be proceeded with therein as if regularly appealed." And it is claimed to be of no consequence whether the case is appealed to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal." We do not so understand this provision. It means simply where an appeal is taken to one of these courts, and the jurisdiction is in another, it must be transferred to the proper court, and shall not be dismissed because appellant had mistaken the court to which he has appealed. But where the appeal is taken to either one of these courts, whether it has or has not jurisdiction, the appeal to such court must comply with the law relating to appeals to that court in respect to the undertaking precisely as though no other court was in existence; if the court is referred to in the undertaking, it must name the court to which the appeal is noticed. Under the provisions of the Constitution, when the case is properly appealed to the Supreme Court, it may transfer the case to this or some other district court of appeal, and by such order of transfer, and not otherwise, does the District Court of Appeal acquire jurisdiction. But it is claimed that section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not require that the undertaking should mention the court to which the appeal is taken, and that the designation of the court as it appears in the undertaking may be rejected as surplusage; that the undertaking is entitled properly, and correctly refers to the judgment and order from which the appeal is taken, and this is sufficient. Citing Wadleigh v. Phelps, 147 Cal. 135, 81 Pac. 418. In that case the question here did not arise. The notice was that the "defendant * * * appeals to the Supreme Court," and the undertaking stated that the defendant "is about to appeal to the Supreme Court." It may be that an undertaking would be sufficient that states an intention to appeal from the judgment (describing it) without mentioning the court to which the appeal is to be taken, although the practice, we believe, is to name the court; and there are strong reasons why the court to which the appeal is taken should be mentioned in the undertaking. On this point we express no definite opinion. But where the undertaking mentions the court to which the appeal is taken, whether correctly designated or not, the sureties cannot be held on such an obligation if the appeal is in fact taken to another and different court from that designated. The sureties may rely on the strict terms of their obligation. Brandt Suretyship & Guaranty, § 106. It was said in Hibernia, etc., Soc. v. Freese, 127 Cal. 70, 59 Pac. 769: "It is required by a valid undertaking upon appeal that it shall refer with definiteness to the particular appeal to which it relates." See, also, Zane v. De Onativia, 135 Cal. 440, 67 Pac. 685. An appeal bond was conditioned for the prosecution of an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace to the Anne Arundel county court. There was, in fact, no such court. Held, the sureties were not estopped to deny the existence of the court by the recital in the bond. The court said: "Whether the court exists or not is something more than a mere question of fact, as to which parties may agree or be concluded by admissions. It must depend upon the Constitution or laws, and, when the court can see that the supposed tribunal is not known to these, it must so decide, no matter what the parties may have admitted by estoppel or agreement." Tucker v. The State, 11 Md. 322.

It must be conceded that there is no court such as is described in the undertaking. It must also be conceded that the attempt made was to describe a court other than the one to which the appeal was in fact taken or noticed to be taken. On no principle can the recitals in the undertaking be rejected in order to hold the sureties to the payment of damages awarded in a different court from that referred to in the undertaking. It cannot be doubted but that the intention of the party who drew the undertaking was to describe properly the District Court of Appeal for the Third District, and the sureties may have supposed the designation correctly given or so intended to be given. But, this admitted, it only shows that there was no undertaking "on the appeal" which was to another and different court.

The question of appellant's right to have a proper undertaking approved by a justice of the Supreme Court, under section 954 of the Code of Civil Procedure, does not arise. as no such request has been made. Besides, such substituted undertaking must "be filed in the Supreme Court before the hearing upon the motion to dismiss the appeal." (Ibid.)

The appeal is dismissed.

4 Cal. App. 25

Ex parte BAKER.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 25, 1906.)

1. Bigamy — Elements of Offense — Evidence.

Where. in a prosecution for bigamy, there was no evidence before the magistrate that the woman to whom it was charged accused had been previously married was living at the time of his second marriage, his commitment was unauthorized.

2. Habeas Corpus—Return.

Where, in habeas corpus proceedings, the sheriff returned that he held petitioner by virtue of a warrant and commitment issued after the writ had been granted, and before the hearing thereof, and annexed to his return what purported to be a copy of the order for petitioner's arrest for a different offense, and a commitment by the magistrate, but neither the original warrant nor commitment was offered at the hearing, and no evidence was given that such documents existed, the return was insufficient to show that the officer legally held petitioner in custody.

Habeas corpus by George Baker. Petitioner discharged.

Geo. W. Waldorf, for petitioner.

HARRISON, P. J. The petitioner was arrested in the city of San José upon a charge of bigamy, and upon the hearing of the complaint thereon was held to answer before the superior court, and a commitment for his detention pending such hearing was issued to the sheriff, by which he was taken into custody, and has applied for a writ of habeas corpus, upon the ground that the evidence at the hearing before the magistrate was insufficient to show that any crime had been committed by him. There was no evidence before the magistrate that the woman to whom it was charged he had been previously married was living at the time of his second marriage in the county of Santa Clara, and for that reason the order for his commitment was unauthorized.

In the return of the sheriff he sets forth that, in addition to the warrant of commitment issued upon the aforesaid charge, he holds him by virtue of a warrant and commitment issued after the writ herein had been granted, and before the hearing thereon, and annexes to his return what purports to be a copy of an order for the arrest of the petitioner for a different offense, and a commitment of the petitioner by the magistrate to the custody of the sheriff upon said arrest. The sheriff, however, has not produced the original of said warrant or commitment, and no evidence has been offered that such documents exist. No application has been made on behalf of the people for an amendment of the return, or for a continuance of the hearing for the purpose of producing competent evidence of the existence of the documents. The return is therefore insufficient to justify the sheriff in holding the petitioner in his custody.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner be discharged.

WOMBLE et al. v. WILBUR et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1906.)

1. Cancellation of Instruments — Land Contract—Forfeiture.

Where a contract to convey land bound the vendee to pay the interest on deferred payments after July, 1901, and bound the vendor to pay a specified rent for the agricultural portion of the land, the vendor, not having paid such rent, was not entitled to a cancellation of the contract because of the failure of the vendee and his assignee to pay interest installments.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, § 29.]

2. Specific Performance—Contract to Convey Land—Rights of Assignee.

A contract to convey land obligated the vendee to pay the price in certain installments during a series of years with interest on deferred payments, the deed to be delivered on full payment of the price. The contract was made May 24, 1900, but was not recorded until December 8, 1902, though on May 24, 1901, the deed was deposited in a bank pursuant to the terms of the contract in escrow. The escrow agreement was signed by both vendor and vendee in the bank, and authorized the surrender of the deed on payment of installments without reference to interest. The vendee paid all the installments due to July 10, 1901, but paid no interest, which was not demanded, and on September 7, 1901, assigned his interest in the contract of sale to B. Held, that B. was not bound to inquire beyond the escrow agreement to ascertain the terms of the sale, and was therefore entitled to a deed on tendering the installments specified without interest.

3. Pleading—Denial—Sufficiency.

In an action to cancel a land contract, the complaint alleged that defendants willfully neglected and refused to pay plaintiffs the sums of $1,200 and $750 interest due on specified dates for which refusal, after 60 days' notice, plaintiffs elected to cancel the contract. One of the defendants answered denying that he had willfully or otherwise failed or refused to fulfill the conditions of the contract or otherwise, but that he had at all time fulfilled and performed all the conditions of the agreement. The other defendant alleged that he had no knowledge or belief sufficient to enable him to answer the allegation, and, placing his denial on that ground, denied that his codefendant had willfully, or otherwise, failed to perform the conditions of the contract (as in said mentioned complaint recited). Held, to constitute sufficient denials of defendants' failure to pay interest as alleged.

4. Cancellation of Instructions — Evidence.

Where a vendee's assignee was not bound to pay interest on deferred payments, and the bank with which the deed to the land contracted to be conveyed had been deposited in escrow had no authority to collect interest, letters between the vendor and the vendee with reference to the nonpayment of interest by the vendee were immaterial as against his assignee or the bank, in an action to cancel the contract.

5. Evidence — Secondary Evidence — Demand for Production of Writing.

Before the contents of a writing can be given in evidence orally, a demand must be made on the one having the writing in his possession and a refusal to deliver it must be shown.

6. Assignments—Notice to Assignee—Time—Evidence.

Where it was sought to charge a vendee's assignee with notice of the original contract, the question whether the vendee ever gave a duplicate of such agreement to his assignee should have been limited to a time prior to the date of the assignment.

7. Cancellation of Instruments—Issues—Proof.

Where, in a suit for the cancellation of a land contract, the complaint alleged that the vendee's assignee claimed some interest in the property, a deed executed by the vendee to his assignee for the property in question was admissible.

8. Witnesses—Impeachment.

A question asked plaintiff's witness on redirect examination, whether, at a certain time and place, he did not tell W. that, at the time he assigned his interest in certain land to B. he gave B. a duplicate of the land contract which he held from plaintiff, and told B. concerning the same, in the presence of C., was objectionable as an attempt to impeach plaintiff's own witness.

9. Evidence — Declarations Against Interest.

In a suit to cancel a land contract, evidence that the vendee stated that he gave his assignee a duplicate of the contract of sale at the time he assigned his rights, was inadmissible as a declaration against interest as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, since such fact, if true, would not bind such assignee to comply with the terms of such contract.

10. Witnesses—Cross-Examination.

Where, in a suit to cancel a land contract, the vendee's assignee was asked on direct examination what payments he had made, he was properly allowed to state on cross-examination that such payments were made under an escrow agreement; that he never knew that the original contract between plaintiff and his assignor provided for the payment of interest prior to the assignment; that he tendered to the bank the amount due under the escrow agreement; and that no interest had ever been demanded from him.

11. Same.

Where in a suit to set aside a land contract, an officer of a bank with which the deed had been deposited in escrow testified to the deed and the assignment of a portion of the vendor's interest in the property to his wife, and that a written demand had been served on the bank for a return of the papers, he was properly permitted to answer on cross-examination as to what other papers he had in his possession, as secretary of the bank, in connection with the sale of the property in question.

12. Appeal—Objections to Evidence—Objections to Trial.

An objection to the admission of evidence cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

13. Evidence—Parol Testimony—Escrows—Conditions.

Where an escrow was evidenced by a written agreement signed by both parties fully setting out the conditions thereof, parol evidence was inadmissible to add further conditions thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

Action by John T. Womble and Adella Womble against I. R. Wilbur and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellants. S. D. Woods, Campbell, Metson & Campbell, and A. L. Levinsky, for respondents.

BUCKLES, J. On May 24, 1900, John T. Womble and I. R. Wilbur entered into the following agreement:

"This agreement made and entered into this 24th day of May, 1900, by and between John T. Womble, of Hodson, Calaveras County, State of California, party of the first part, and I. R. Wilbur, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, party of the second part,

"Witnesseth, That for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to him in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and other valuable considerations to him moving from the party of the second part, the party of the first part hereby agrees to grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the party of the second part, all his right, title and interest in and to the SW. ¼ and the W. ½ of the E. ½ of section 29, township 2 N., range 12 E., M. D. B. & M., and the NE. ¼ of section 32, township 2 N., range 12 E., M. D. B. & M., containing 479 acres of land more or less, situated in the County of Calaveras, State of California, together with all the improvements and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining; which said land adjoins the Royal mining property on the south; upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: The price to be paid for said property is the sum of thirty thousand dollars, payable in installments, as follows:

"July 10, 1900, $1875; January 10, 1901, $3750.
"July 10, 1901, $3750; January 10, 1902, $3750.
"July 10, 1902, $3750; January 10, 1903, $3750.
"July 10, 1903, $3750; January 10, 1904, $5625.

"On the signing of this agreement, the party of the first part agrees to execute a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of the property, free and clear of all incumbrances, and deposit the same in escrow with some bank in the City of Stockton, State of California, with instructions to said Bank to deliver said deed to the party of the second part upon the payment by him of all the installments of the purchase money hereinbefore provided for, provided that any and all installments remaining unpaid on the 10th day of July, 1901, shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, said interest to be payable on the 10th day of July each year; and provided further, that if any of the installments of the purchase money shall remain unpaid for sixty days after it shall become due, the said party of the first part shall have the right and privilege of withdrawing said deed from escrow, and terminating this agreement, in which event the party of the second part shall forfeit all payments that have been previously made. The installments of purchase money hereinbefore provided for shall be payable at the said bank with which said deed in escrow shall be deposited, to the order of the party of the first part. On the signing of this agreement the party of the second part shall have the right and privilege of entering upon the said premises, and to open, develop and work the mines situated on said property, and to sink shafts, drifts, chutes, and stopes, and to extract the ore therefrom, and reduce or sell the same and retain the proceeds therefrom; said right and privilege, however, to terminate at the option of the party of the first part in case of default in the payment of any installment of the purchase money within sixty days after the same shall become due as hereinbefore provided; and during the currency of this agreement the part of the first part shall not in any way interfere with the workings in said property on the surface or underground, but he shall have the privilege of remaining upon the property and working the agricultural portion of it, for which he shall pay to the party of the second part the amount of one hundred and fifty dollars per annum, payable in advance.

"It is also understood and agreed that the party of the second part shall have the privilege to pass over and use such land as is necessary in the prosecution of the development of said mines.

"When the last payment is made, the party of the first part shall vacate the premises, leaving the buildings in as good repair as they are at the signing of this agreement, natural wear and tear excepted, provided, however, the said party of the first part shall have the right to remove from said premises a building owned and occupied by C. O. Womble, and one occupied by C. C. Crane.

"It is hereby further distinctly understood and agreed that time is of the essence of this agreement, and the due performance of the several conditions hereof by the party of the second part is a condition precedent whereupon depends the right of the party of the second part under this agreement. This agreement shall be binding upon and its rights and privileges shall inure to the benefit of the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns of the respective parties hereto. In witness whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"[Signed] John T. Womble [Seal.]
"I. R. Wilbur [Seal.]"

The above contract was duly recorded December 8, 1902.

A proper deed was prepared in accordance with said agreement and the Stockton Savings Bank was selected as the bank in which said deed should be placed in escrow, and on May 24, 1901, the deed was deposited in said bank with the following agreement or letter of instructions:

"To the Stockton Savings Bank, Stockton, Cal. There is herewith deposited by me with you a certain deed, of date October 18, 1899, made by me to I. R. Wilbur, of that certain land situate in the county of Calaveras, state of California, and described as the southwest quarter and the west half of the east half of section twenty-nine, township 2 north, range twelve east, M. D. M., and the northeast quarter of section thirty-two, township two north, range twelve east, M. D. M., containing 479 acres, more or less. This deed is delivered to you in escrow, to be held by you subject to the following conditions:

"The said I. R. Wilbur is to pay into your bank for me, the following sums of moneys at the following designated times, viz.:

"On July 10th, 1900, the sum of $1,875; on January 10th, 1901, $3,750; on July 10th, 1901, $3,750; on January 10th, 1902, $3,750; on July 10th, 1902, $3,750; on January 10th, 1903, $3,750; on July 10th, 1903, $3,750; on January 10th, 1904, $5,625.

"When all of such payments shall have been made in the sums and at the times specified, you will deliver the said deed to said I. R. Wilbur, or his assigns, or upon his written order. If the said payments be not made in the amounts and at the times specified and there shall be default in such payments to you for me, for the period of sixty days next after any of said dates, then and in that event such deed, on demand by me, shall be delivered by you to me.

"Witness my hand this 24th day of May, 1900.

"John T. Womble. [Seal.]

"I, the party grantee, named in the deed this day deposited with you in escrow, hereby recognize the foregoing as a correct statement of the terms of the escrow.

"I. R. Wilbur.

"The foregoing trust is hereby accepted and the said deed specified in the foregoing instruction is accepted subject to the conditions above mentioned.

"Stockton Savings Bank.

"By Sidney Newell, Cashier."

I. R. Wilbur paid all of said installments up to and including that of July 10, 1901, but paid no interest and none was demanded. On September 7, 1901, he assigned his interest in the agreement of sale to E. I. Braddock. Before the suit, Womble assigned one-half of his interest in the contract to his wife, Adella Womble. Womble remained in possession of the agricultural land and Wilbur took possession of the mining grounds.

The action was brought to annul the said agreement of sale and the right to purchase the mining property thereunder. Judgment was that Wilbur was indebted to plaintiffs for the sum of $2,150 on account of interest due on said contract, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover the $5,625, deposited in bank, and that the bank deliver the said deeds to E. I. Braddock; that plaintiffs take nothing against Braddock and the bank, but that each of these recover their costs of plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs recover their costs of I. R. Wilbur. The court also refused to cancel said deed or annul the contract. The appeal is from the judgment and comes here on a bill of exceptions.

In the appeal of Wilbur (No. 157) from the same judgment, we did not have the evidence before us as now. As to Wilbur, the judgment was against him for $2,150, the same being interest due on his contract of sale with Womble, and that he have a credit of $300 to be taken therefrom on account of rent for two years due from Womble, which Womble had, by said agreement, promised to pay for the use of the agricultural land included in said deed. It is clear that Wilbur did not consider the escrow agreement as superseding, changing, or modifying the first agreement, for, on September 10, 1902, he wrote to Mr. Womble in relation to the payment of interest and in which he disclaimed any liability. It was not put upon the ground that the interest clause had been abrogated by the escrow agreement, but that Mr. Braddock had stepped into his shoes, but says he don't know whether Braddock understood about the payment of interest. And on April 2, 1903, he again wrote Womble to the same effect, and, at the trial, testified that these letters were in answer to letters Womble wrote him, stating the interest had not been paid. When he paid the January installment he paid no interest and none was demanded. But inasmuch as this is a suit in equity, and plaintiff asking the cancellation of the contract of sale, praying "for such other and further relief as may seem meet," and it being shown by the evidence that plaintiff did occupy the said agricultural lands and failed to pay the last two years' rent contracted to be paid, and further that the question of rent and of interest has already been determined in said appeal No. 157 of this court, we see no reason for disturbing the judgment so far as it relates to Wilbur.

The remaining question before us is, was E. I. Braddock entitled to have the deeds to said property delivered to him upon his paying all the installments remaining unpaid at the time he purchased from Wilbur? The agreement for interest was not recorded until December 8, 1902, more than one year after the sale to Braddock, and therefore was not notice to Braddock of its terms or of its existence. Although there is some conflict in the evidence as to whether Braddock had any knowledge of the agreement to pay interest when he purchased of Wilbur, Mrs. Womble testified she had said to Braddock that it would not be best for Womble to reduce the amount due in order to get all cash, for they were getting a good interest. This was the same day of, and prior to, the sale by Wilbur to Braddock. It is claimed that because Braddock knew Womble had conveyed to Wilbur he was bound to take notice of the terms, and Galland v. Jackman, 26 Cal. 88, 85 Am. Dec. 172, Killey v. Wilson, 33 Cal. 690, S. L. & T. Co. v. W. S. M. Co., 99 Cal. 636, 34 Pac. 321, and Moss v. Atkinson, 44 Cal. 3, are cited in support of that contention. In the first case, 26 Cal. 88, 85 Am. Dec. 172, the grantee knew that his grantor had previously made a deed of some kind to another person for the same property which prior conveyance was not recorded. The court held: "This being so, they cannot justly claim that they stand protected by the statute, because their case does not come within its letter nor its spirit." That case has no application. Here the second grantee was taking from the first grantee, and the terms by which the deed of the grantor was to be delivered to the first grantee was supposed to be placed with the bank, and when Braddock had read these terms he would be excused from making further inquiry. The next case, 33 Cal. 690, has no application to the case at bar. In 44 Cal. 3, the court held that possession of land under an unrecorded agreement with the owner to purchase the same is notice sufficient to put others on inquiry, and if they buy of the owner, the contract may be enforced, as against such purchaser, in equity.

In the case at bar Braddock bought of the grantee of the original owner and found a statement in writing signed by the grantee on file with the deed in escrow, purporting to state the terms of the escrow conveyance. For the same reason it seems to us 99 Cal. 636, 34 Pac. 321, furnishes no rule applicable to the case at bar. If Braddock was bound to look beyond the recital in the Womble deed, he did so, and the escrow agreement, which purported to contain the terms of the sale—that is of consideration and payments—was all he need look to. Womble, the grantor, was found in possession, but that possession would be satisfactorily accounted for by the terms of the escrow. The sale to Wilbur was not complete until all payments of purchase price had been made, and that of itself would account for Womble remaining in possession. The court found that at the time (September 7, 1901) when Wilbur assigned to Braddock, that Braddock had no knowledge of any contract or agreement between Womble and Wilbur other than what was expressed in the written instrument deposited with the Stockton Savings Bank, May 24, 1900, and the deed deposited at the same time. This finding is warranted by the testimony. The evidence shows conclusively that Braddock paid all the said installments falling due after September, 1901, except the last one, and this he made a tender of, and, when refused, deposited it in the Stockton Savings Bank to the credit of the Wombles. When Wilbur assigned to Braddock he made and executed a deed to him of all his interest in the property in controversy, and deposited the same with the Stockton Savings Bank to be delivered to Braddock when he had completed the payments as provided in the Womble escrow. As conclusions of law the court found that Braddock was entitled to the immediate delivery to him of said deeds, and this is amply supported by the evidence.

At the close of the testimony in this case, the plaintiff moved the court for judgment on the pleadings which the court denied, and this is assigned as error, on the ground that the complaint alleges that "the defendants willfully neglected and refused to pay the plaintiffs the sum of $1,200 and $750 interest due in July, 1902, and July, 1903," and that such willful refusal was for more than 60 days after due notice of such delinquency and demand for payment, and that the right to purchase was thereby forfeited, and that none of these allegations were denied in the answer of Wilbur and Braddock. But the answer of Wilbur denies in these words that he "has willfully or otherwise failed or refused to fulfill or perform the covenants or conditions on his part to be fulfilled or performed, as in said agreement provided, or otherwise; on the contrary, said defendant alleges that he has at all times kept, fulfilled, and performed all of the terms and conditions of the said agreement, and the whole thereof." The defendant Braddock, alleging that he has no knowledge or belief sufficient to enable him to answer such allegation, "and placing his denial on that ground, denies that the said I. R. Wilbur has willfully, or otherwise, or at all, failed or refused to perform the covenants or conditions, or any or either thereof, on his part to be fulfilled or performed by him, as in said agreement (so in said amended complaint recited) provided." We think this effectually disposes of plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings. The allegation of the complaint that defendants willfully neglected and refused to pay the interest is denied by both Wilbur and Braddock, as well as the bank. Defendant Wilbur was asked by the plaintiff if, at any time, he paid any portion of the interest that was due under the first contract. Defendants objected. The objection was sustained as to Braddock and the Stockton Savings Bank and overruled as to Wilbur. The question was not answered, but further along in his testimony the witness answered that he never paid any interest whatever. There was no error in the ruling of the court.

Objection was made by defendants to the admission in evidence of a letter from Wilbur to Womble, dated September 10, 1902, referring to a letter of Womble's to Wilbur dated September 8th, and also a letter from Wilbur to Womble dated April 2, 1903, both letters having reference to the question of the interest not being paid. The objection was sustained as to Braddock and the Savings Bank, but overruled as to Wilbur, and the letters were introduced. As the bank was not authorized to collect interest and Braddock was not obliged to pay interest, these letters were not material to them. Wilbur was asked to state the contents of the letter of September 8th from Womble to himself, and to which this letter of September 10, 1902, was an answer. The defendant Braddock objected upon the ground that no demand had been made upon Wilbur to produce the letter. The objection was sustained. Before the contents of a writing can be given in evidence orally, a demand must be made upon the one having it in his possession and a refusal to deliver it up be shown.

Plaintiff asked the witness Wilbur if he ever gave Braddock a duplicate of the agreement of May 24, 1900. The court sustained an objection to the question on the ground that it must be limited to a time prior to September 7, 1901. The ruling was correct. On cross-examination the deed of Wilbur to Braddock was offered in evidence, to which the plaintiff objected. This was a deed for the same property as the Womble deed. The deed was proper evidence showing that Braddock had and claimed some interest in the property mentioned in the Womble deed, following the allegation of plaintiffs' complaint that Braddock claimed some interest. On redirect examination by plaintiff of the witness Wilbur he was asked if, at the house of J. U. Castle, in the presence of J. U. Castle (fixing the time), he did not tell Willis R. Womble that the time he assigned his interest to Braddock he gave Braddock a duplicate of the agreement of May 24, 1900, and that he told Braddock so in the presence of J. C. Campbell. Objection was sustained on the ground that it was cross-examination of plaintiff's own witness. The objection was properly sustained. The question was asked as an impeaching question, and the witness was plaintiffs' witness. There was no other suggestion made but that it was an impeaching question. But now plaintiffs in their brief argue that the question called for the declaration or admission of a party to the action, and that the evidence was therefore admissible under section 1870, Code Civ. Proc. But the act, declaration, or omission must be evidence against the party, and the fact that Wilbur may have said to Womble that he gave Braddock a duplicate of the agreement of May 24th at the time he assigned to Braddock would not bind Braddock to pay the interest or bind him in any way, and was therefore immaterial.

The witness Braddock (a defendant) had been asked by plaintiff on his direct examination what payments he had made on the first agreement or otherwise, and the witness had answered. On cross-examination he was permitted, against the objection of plaintiffs, to testify that he had never signed a contract that called for interest; that he made his payments under the letter of instructions to the bank; that he had not seen an agreement, nor was his attention called to any agreement, providing for the payment of interest prior to or at the time he and Wilbur entered into their contract; that he tendered Mr. Carpenter, the attorney of plaintiffs, the payment of $5,625; that he tendered it also to the bank, but the bank would not accept it on what Carpenter said; that Carpenter said to Mr. Lyons, and that Carpenter asked Lyons to count the money which Lyons did, and that he said the money was all there; that Carpenter told Lyons to refuse to take the money; that Carpenter told him to accept it for the bank, and it was so accepted; that he then deposited the said $5,625 in the Stockton Savings Bank to the credit of John T. and Adella Womble; that he then and there, January 9th, signed a notification which he then served on said Carpenter, as attorney for plaintiffs; that no demand was ever made upon him for interest; that defendants' Exhibits 3 (the agreement in escrow of May 24th) and 4 (a notice to plaintiffs and A. H. Carpenter, their attorney, of payment to the bank of the last payment and a demand for the deed) were then introduced in evidence. The ground of the objection made to all of this testimony was not cross-examination; was immaterial and hearsay, and called for conclusions of the witness. The examination in chief had been as to the payment of the installments, and everything testified to in the cross-examination was as to the payments and the matters connected therewith and explanatory thereof, and was legitimate cross-examination. No objection was raised to the introduction of Exhibits 3, 4, and 5, because the signatures thereto were not proved and it is too late to raise such objection for the first time in this court.

W. H. Lyons, an officer of the Stockton Savings Bank, was a witness called by plaintiffs. On his direct examination he testified to the deed of Womble to Wilbur, the assignment of Womble to his wife, the written notice served on the bank by Mr. Womble October 7, 1903, and a written demand made on the bank October 29, 1903, for return of deed, all presented to or filed with the bank, and were all papers in connection with the sale of the property to Wilbur. On cross-examination the witness was asked: "What other papers have you in your possession as secretary of the Stockton Savings Bank in connection with the sale of this property from Mr. Womble?" The question was objected to upon the grounds alone, that it is "wholly irrelevant, immaterial, and not cross-examination," and now, for the first time, a further objection is made that the question calls for other and different papers and so forth. The question was relevant and material and legitimate cross-examination because it related to papers in the same transaction and to such papers only. And for the very same reason, the objection raised here for the first time, were we at liberty to consider it, would be held to be not well taken. Section 2048, Code Civ. Proc. The plaintiff Adella Womble who was a witness for plaintiffs, was asked whether she had been to the bank with or without her husband and demanded the interest. The defendant Braddock objected upon the ground that it is incompetent as to him, and that the terms of a written agreement cannot be thus changed. The objection was sustained. It does not appear that the bank or defendant Braddock had any knowledge of the contract for the payment of interest when Braddock became the assignee of Wilbur, and therefore there was no error in sustaining the objection.

Mr. Womble was asked as to what verbal instruction he gave the bank when he deposited the deed in escrow. The court sustained the objection thereto. The instructions to the bank were in writing and no verbal instructions could have had any weight with the bank. It is true that a contract in escrow, as held in Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 133, 13 Pac. 315, may be oral, but we think when there appears to be a full, complete, and sufficient contract in writing governing the escrow that no oral instructions can avail. If written instructions are given by the principal to his agent, these instructions may be changed by parol. Curtiss v. Starr & Co., 85 Cal. 376, 24 Pac. 806. But where the written instructions amount to an agreement made by two principals to their joint agent and signed by both, neither can change their instruction by parol without the concurrence of both. This is elementary.

There are many other assignments of error relating to the admission of evidence, all of which we have examined and find none of the rulings to be prejudicial error, if error at all, and it could serve no good purpose to set them out here.

The findings respond fully to all the material issues of the case, and are supported by the evidence, and the judgment rendered was warranted in every particular by the findings.

Finding no prejudicial error in the case, we affirm the judgment.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

3 Cal. App. 527

WOMBLE et al. v. WILBUR et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 1, 1906. On Rehearing, May 15, 1906.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT—ESCROW AGREEMENT.

Where an agreement for the sale of land provided for the payment of certain installments and interest, and a deed of the land was deposited in escrow with a bank, together with a written escrow agreement reciting the required payments, but making no reference to interest, and the bank and an assignee of the vendee's rights had no notice of the first agreement, this does not show, as a matter of law, that the first agreement was superseded by the escrow agreement and that the interest was not to be paid.

Action by John T. Womble and another against I. R. Wilbur and others. From the judgment, defendant Wilbur appeals. Affirmed.

S. D. Woods, for appellant. A. H. Carpenter, for respondent Womble. Metson, Campbell & Metson, for respondent Braddock. A. L. Levinsky, for respondent Stockton Savings Bank.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to annul a certain agreement of sale of certain mining land between plaintiff John T. Womble and defendant Wilbur; also to cause to be delivered up to said plaintiff and canceled a certain deed made by him to said Wilbur and alleged to have been placed in escrow with defendant bank under said agreement; also for a certain sum as rentals for the use of said land, and for attorneys' fees. The court gave judgment that the defendant bank deliver forthwith to defendant Braddock the deed in question, as assignee of defendant Wilbur, and also the deed of Wilbur to Braddock; that plaintiffs recover judgment from defendant bank for the sum of $5,625, being the amount of the last payment due plaintiffs on account of said sale, which had been deposited to plaintiffs' credit by said Braddock; that plaintiffs recover from defendant Wilbur the sum of $2,151 as interest less $300 rentals due him from plaintiffs; and that defendants, the bank and Braddock, recover their costs. Defendant Wilbur appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

It was alleged in the complaint that Womble and Wilbur entered into an agreement on May 24, 1900, by which the former agreed to sell to the latter the land in question for the sum of $30,000, "payable in installments as follows: July 10, 1900, $1,875.00; January 10, 1901, $3,750.00; July 10, 1901, $3,750.00; January 10, 1902, $3,750.00; July 10, 1902, $3,750.00; January 10, 1903, $3,750.00; July 10, 1903, $3,750.00; January 10, 1904, $5,625.00." It was further provided: "On the signing of this agreement, the party of the first part agrees to execute a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of the property * * * and deposit the same in escrow with some bank at the City of Stockton, California, with instructions to said bank to deliver said deed to the party of the second part upon payment by him of all the installments of the purchase money hereinbefore provided for, provided that any and all installments remaining unpaid on the 10th day of July, 1901, shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, said interest to be payable on the 10th day of July each year; and provided further that if any of the installments of the purchase money shall remain unpaid for sixty days after it shall become due, the said party of the first part shall have the right and privilege of withdrawing said deed from escrow, and terminating this agreement, in which event the party of the second part shall forfeit all payments that have been previously made. The installments of purchase money hereinbefore provided for shall be payable at the said bank with which said deed in escrow shall be deposited, to the order of the first party." The agreement gave to Wilbur the right to enter into possession of the property, sink shafts, run tunnels, and to extract ore and retain the proceeds, Womble retaining the right to use the agricultural portion of the land, for which he was to pay as rental the sum of $150 per annum, payable in advance. The agreement ran to the heirs and assigns of the respective parties. It was alleged in the complaint that said Womble delivered to defendant bank his deed as provided in said agreement and "thereupon instructed said bank orally and in writing, to hold said deed in escrow until the fulfillment or forfeiture of said contract on the part of the said I. R. Wilbur and not to deliver said deed unless all the moneys were paid to plaintiffs at the time and in the manner specified in said contract;" and alleged the said bank had knowledge of the contents of said agreement and accepted the trust of holding said deed in escrow for the purposes in the complaint alleged. The court found that this agreement was entered into on the day of its date, but that the defendant bank knew nothing of its contents or existence and accepted the escrow under an agreement thereafter and on the same day entered into between Womble and Wilbur as set forth in the answers. This agreement is as follows: "To the Stockton Savings Bank, Stockton, Cal.: There is herewith deposited by me with you a certain deed, of date October 18th, 1899, made by me to I. R. Wilbur of that certain land [description]. This deed is delivered to you in escrow, to be held by you subject to the following conditions: The said I. R. Wilbur is to pay into your bank, for me, the following sums of moneys at the following designated times, viz.: [same as in agreement first above set forth.] When all of such payments shall have been made in the sums and at the times specified, you will deliver the said deed to said I. R. Wilbur, or his assigns, or upon his written order. If the said payments be not made in the amounts and at the times specified and there shall be default in such payments to you for me, for the period of sixty days next after any of said dates, then and in that event such deed, on demand by me, shall be delivered by you to me. Witness my hand this 24th day of May, 1900. John T. Womble. I, the party grantee named in the deed this day deposited in escrow, hereby recognize the foregoing as a correct statement of the terms of the escrow. I. R. Wilbur. The foregoing trust is hereby accepted and the said deed specified in the foregoing instruction is accepted subject to the conditions above mentioned. Stockton Savings Bank. By Sidney Newell, Cashier."

The court found that Womble thereafter delivered said deed to defendant bank "pursuant to the terms of said instrument in writing herein last mentioned"; that on September 7, 1901, Wilbur transferred to defendant Braddock by deed deposited with said bank all his interest in said real property "arising under and by virtue of said instrument in writing and said deed so deposited in escrow * * * with the full knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of the plaintiffs John T. Womble and Adella Womble," to the latter of whom John T. had, on December 3, 1900, assigned "a one-half part of the moneys coming to him under the agreement deposited with the defendant Stockton Savings Bank"; that Braddock "had no knowledge of any contract or agreement" other than the agreement of escrow deposited with defendant bank and that the agreement first above mentioned was not recorded until December 8, 1902; that Wilbur first and Braddock after the transfer to him paid to defendant bank, as specified in said escrow agreement all the sums falling due, and plaintiffs received the same "without objection, save and except the last one of $5,625.00, due on the 10th day of January, 1904"; that Braddock, on January 9, 1904, tendered to plaintiffs the amount last above stated, "which was the last payment to be made in accordance with the written instrument deposited" by Womble with defendant bank, and plaintiffs refused to accept the same, and thereupon Braddock deposited said sum with said bank to plaintiffs' credit, who refused to accept the money from the bank and demanded from said bank the delivery of said deed, which was refused by reason of said bank "being a party to the above entitled action, which said action was then instituted but had not been tried." Finding 13 is that Wilbur has not paid "the interest reserved in said deed by the agreement hereinbefore mentioned, or any part thereof, and the whole thereof is unpaid," and it is further found therein that Womble "has paid unto said defendant I. R. Wilbur the rentals agreed to be paid in and by said agreement for the period of two years, and had made no other or further payment for or on account of said rentals." It is further found that John T. Womble and Adella after the assignment to her "at all times accepted all moneys paid" by Wilbur and Braddock, "and never demanded any interest of said defendant bank until the 29th day of October, 1903, at which time" plaintiff Womble demanded interest and also demanded delivery of his deed theretofore deposited by him. Finding 16 is that "the amount of the interest owing by the defendant I. R. Wilbur to the plaintiffs as set forth in finding 15 (should refer to finding 13 apparently), amounts at this date to the sum of $2,151, from which should be deducted the sum of $300 that is owing from said plaintiff to said defendant Wilbur, being for two years rental of said premises, in accordance with the terms of the agreement" first above mentioned. The court found that there were no rentals due to plaintiffs and nothing as attorneys' fees in the action.

Appellant contends: (1) That the contract first entered into was superseded by the escrow agreement which omitted all mention of interest. (2) That by their conduct plaintiffs placed a construction upon these contracts, showing that they regarded the first contract superseded by the second. (3) That plaintiffs waived any claim of interest by acceptance of the principal without further demand. (4) That judgment for interest against Wilbur cannot be rendered because he was discharged from liability by reason of the assignment to Braddock with plaintiffs' consent.

It was stated at the argument that the same case is also now pending in the Supreme Court on the appeal of plaintiffs, in the case Sac. No. 1325, 86 Pac.——, who are seeking the reversal of the judgment on grounds of which we are not advised and of which we cannot take notice.

Plaintiffs here contend that the points urged by appellant cannot be reviewed, in the absence of a statement or bill of exceptions, as they relate exclusively to questions of fact determined by the court under evidence adduced at the trial. Appellant replies by claiming that the findings themselves supply all the bill of exceptions required to justify his contention that the judgment imposing the payment of interest upon him is unsupported and unwarranted. His claim is that the facts found show "that the second agreement, as matter of law, was substituted for the first agreement, and Wilbur is not liable."

There are some facts found which doubtless were taken into account by the trial court as tending to support appellants' view of the case—for example, the receipt by plaintiffs of the installments without demanding interest; the omission of any mention of interest in the escrow agreement; the failure to notify the bank or Braddock of the first agreement. But these facts do not conclusively establish appellant's contention and may have been satisfactorily rebutted at the trial. Wilbur, in his answer, averred that the escrow agreement was entered into "in pursuance of the terms and conditions of the said agreement mentioned in said amended complaint," the first agreement. It is true, he also alleges that the escrow agreement "was in fulfillment of the terms and conditions of the said agreement dated May 24, 1900," the first agreement. But this is not an allegation that the escrow agreement was a substitution of the first agreement or was intended to supersede it, and no such or equivalent averment is found in any of the answers; and to aver that it "was in fulfillment" of that agreement is but a conclusion. There were several important covenants in the first agreement not carried into the escrow agreement, at least one of which must have been recognized by Wilbur as in force, for the court found that he received the annual rentals from plaintiffs for two years, one of which was subsequent to the transfer to Braddock, for the use of the agricultural lands, as provided in the first agreement, and the court allowed him credit for the unpaid portion of these rentals. That he did not claim any such credit in his answer does not change the fact that he received rentals under that agreement and, under the pleadings, the court properly gave the credit for the unpaid rentals. It was entirely competent for the parties to agree that the deed might be delivered on payment of the installments of the principal leaving the matter of interest between the parties, under the first agreement, as was left the matter of rentals, the right to work the mine and other matters. An examination of the first agreement will show that the instructions to be given the bank were to provide for payment "of the installments of purchase money hereinbefore provided for," and it was by a subsequent and independent clause that interest was provided for after certain installments had been paid and upon future installments. It will thus appear also that the right to withdraw the deed left in escrow was to accrue "if any of the installments of the purchase money shall remain unpaid for sixty days after it shall become due." It would seem that the escrow was in all respects, as averred by Wilbur, "in pursuance of the terms and conditions of the said agreement mentioned in said amended complaint;" it embodied substantially every thing which the first agreement contemplated should go into the escrow, leaving other covenants to stand as set forth in that first agreement.

We cannot agree with appellant that, as a matter of law, the facts found show a substitution of the escrow for the first agreement. The findings recite that "evidence both oral and documentary, upon the issues found by the said pleadings, was introduced by the respective parties." What this evidence was we do not know, nor to what extent it justified the findings. We must presume that there was evidence tending to show that both plaintiffs and Wilbur recognized that the first agreement was in force, for Wilbur received $300, being two years' rental for the agricultural land occupied by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs were not called upon to demand, nor had they the right to demand, interest when receiving installments at the bank; they had not provided by the escrow agreement that interest should be paid at the bank. The interest was payable annually, after July 10, 1901, while the installments were payable semi-annually from July 10, 1900, and the first agreement did not provide that the escrow agreement was to provide for payment of interest. There was nothing unusual or remarkable in the fact that the deed was to be delivered upon payment of the installments of the purchase price, leaving other matters to be settled according to the first agreement. The escrow agreement was independent of, and separate from, the first agreement, involved different parties and was for a distinct purpose stated in it. There being no direct issue that it was executed with intent to supersede the first agreement no finding was necessary on such issue and we do not think, in finding the execution of both agreements and in giving effect to both, that the court made conflicting findings; nor do we think that in finding the execution of the escrow agreement it follows, as matter of law, that the first agreement was superseded by the escrow.

The judgment appears to us to be a just and correct determination as based on the findings and is therefore affirmed.

We concur: BUCKLES, J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

On Rehearing.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Upon the rehearing we discover nothing to justify a different conclusion from that heretofore reached.

For the reasons in our former opinion stated, and also for the reasons set forth in the opinion in the same case, numbered 206 (86 Pac. 916) the judgment is affirmed.

DAGGETT et al. v. YREKA MIN. & MILL. CO. (Sac. 1,154.)

1. Mines and Minerals—Location of Claims—Extralateral Rights.

Where mining claims were located in January, 1884, there must have been the discovery of a vein, the marking of the location so that its surface boundaries could be readily traced, and the end lines of the surface location must have been laid off parallel to each other, as required by Mining Law May 10, 1872, 17 Stat. 91, c. 152.

2. Same—Notices—Posting—Recording.

There being no statute in January, 1884, when certain mining claims in controversy were located, requiring, authorizing, or giving any definite legal effect to the posting and recording of notices of location, the posting and recording of such notices did not, in themselves, constitute a location, but were only acts in pais, tending to show a proper marking of the surface locations, so that the boundaries of the claims could be readily traced.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mines and Minerals, §§ 37-40.]

3. Same—Notice—Construction.

Where a notice of location of a mining claim recited a location 1500 feet of "this vein or lode of gold-bearing rock," etc., such recital indicated that the notice as posted on the ground was placed on the croppings of the lode, or in such close proximity thereto that the croppings appeared or had been exposed.

4. Same—Locations—Maps.

In trespass for the extraction of ore from mining ground claimed by plaintiffs, the introduction of a map in evidence purporting to show the lines of the location of plaintiffs' claims was of no value, where it was not supported by evidence of a person knowing the position of the monuments which defined the lines, and which departed widely from the data established by the best evidence plaintiffs could offer to prove the original location of their claims.

5. Same—End Lines.

The end lines of mining claims should be laid out at right angles to the vein.

6. Same—Evidence.

In trespass for the taking of ore from plaintiffs' mining ground, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiffs' claims had been so marked on the surface that the boundaries could be readily traced, or that the claims as marked had their end lines parallel, so as to entitle plaintiffs to follow the vein beyond the side lines of their claims into the ground in controversy.

7. Same—Pleading—Issues and Proof.

In an action for trespass on the extralateral dip of that part of a mineral vein having its apex within a valid location, it is not necessary for the plaintiffs to allege the existence of the vein having its apex within their surface boundaries, but departing from their side lines on its downward course, and that their end lines are parallel, in order to entitle them to prove that defendant has extricated ore from the locality in question, which was within plaintiffs' extralateral rights.

8. Same—Identity of Vein—Proof.

In an action for trespass on the extralateral dip of a vein having its apex within plaintiffs' location, plaintiffs are not bound to establish the identity of the vein by an actual tracing thereof from within the surface lines of their location to the point of the alleged trespass, but are only bound to show the continuity of the vein between the apex within their lines and the point at which defendant is mining by satisfactory evidence.

McFarland, Shaw, and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by John Daggett and another against the Yreka Mining & Milling Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

O'Neill & Butler and R. S. Taylor, for appellants. Gillis & Tapscott, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to recover damages for alleged trespass, consisting in the extraction and removal of gold-bearing ore from mining ground claimed by the plaintiffs. The material allegations of the complaint are: That the plaintiffs for 20 years last past have been the owners, and, save for the interruptions alleged, have been in possession, of two certain quartz mines in Siskiyou county, known as the "Evening Star Quartz Mine" and the "Central Quartz Mine," more particularly described as follows: "That certain mine known as the 'Evening Star Quartz Mine,' situated on the headwaters of Eddy's Gulch, county and state aforesaid, commencing at a double top fir tree blazed 'Evening Star,' and on the N. W. corner of the claim; hence in an N. E. direction fifteen hundred feet, more or less, to a pillar of rock marked 'E. V.'; thence S. E. direction six hundred feet to a monument of stones and stake marked 'E. V.'; thence in a S. W. direction fifteen hundred feet to monument of stake and stones, stake marked 'E. V.'; thence in a N. W. direction six hundred feet to the place of beginning. The location notice of which said mining claim was dated on January 1st, A. D. 1884, and filed for record on the 8th day of January, A. D. 1884. Also that certain mine known as the 'Central Quartz Mining Claim,' it being an extension on the northeast of the 'Evening Star Quartz Mine,' and commencing at this notice, running thence in a northeasterly direction fifteen hundred feet to stake and mound of stones; thence in a northwesterly direction six hundred feet to stake and mound of stones, stake marked "X"; thence in a southwesterly direction fifteen hundred feet to a stake set in mound of rocks marked "X"; thence in S. E. direction to place of beginning.' The location notice of which said mining claim was dated January 1, A. D. 1884, and filed for record on the 8th day of January, A. D. 1884." That at various times since 1898 the defendant corporation has wrongfully, etc., entered upon said premises, and extracted, carried away, and appropriated large quantities of gold-bearing ore, etc., of the value of $50,000. Other allegations are added as a basis for equitable relief by injunction, receiver, etc., but these are not material to the questions to be considered. The defendant answered, denying all the material allegations of the complaint. The cause was tried by jury and a verdict found for plaintiffs for $1 damages, upon which a judgment was entered, whereby it was adjudged and declared that the plaintiffs were, and ever since September, 1887, had been, the owners and entitled to the possession of the Evening Star and Central Quartz mines, describing them as in the complaint, and awarding the damages and costs. From this judgment, and from an order subsequently entered denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals, alleging certain errors in the rulings of the court, and claiming that in several material particulars the verdict is unsupported by the evidence. The questions of fact thus presented are the more important and will be first considered.

The place from which the ore in question was removed by defendant is altogether outside of the surface lines of the Central and Evening Star locations, but plaintiffs contend that defendant's mining was done in a portion of their extralateral claim, upon the dip of a vein covered by those locations. Specifically, their claim is that the ore removed by defendant was taken from a section of the vein included between perpendicular planes conforming to the end lines of the Central mine at a point about 1,000 feet east and 200 feet south of the northeast corner of the Central location, according to the survey of the ground made by them a short time before the trial of the action. The defendant denies the validity of the Central and Evening Star locations, and also contends that, even if valid, their end lines as actually located would not include the mining ground in controversy. Before entering upon a discussion of the evidence bearing upon these issues, it will be convenient to state a few well-settled legal propositions involved in their determination. There is no claim that the Central or Evening Star mine was located prior to the enactment of the mining law of May 10, 1872, 17 Stat. U. S. 91, c. 152. The claim is in fact that the locations were both made on the first day of January, 1884. Their validity, therefore, depends upon a substantial compliance by the locators with the requirements of that act. Among those requirements these were essential: First, the discovery of a vein; second, the marking of the location so that its surface boundaries could be readily traced; and, third, if the locator was to acquire any extralateral rights upon the dip of the vein, that the end lines of his surface location should be parallel. The act of Congress does not require any posting or recording of notices of location. It merely permits the enactment of local laws regulating that matter, with a proviso that every notice of location, in order to have any legal effect, must contain certain particulars. In this case it does not appear that the claims in question were, at the date of their location or at any time, included within an organized mining district. There is no evidence of any local law, and it was not until March, 1897, that the Legislature of California enacted a short-lived statute prescribing the manner of locating mining claims and providing for the posting and recording of notices. St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159, repealed March 20, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 148, c. 113), and February 8, 1900 (St. 1900, p. 9, c. 6). There was, therefore, nothing to give any definite legal effect to the posting and recording of the notices of location of the Central and Evening Star claims in January, 1884. They did not constitute in themselves a location, or any part of a legal location, of the claims, and are of no value except as acts in pais, to be considered in connection with the well-known customs and practices of mining prospectors as an item of evidence upon the question of compliance with the imperative behests of the mining law with respect especially to the marking of the surface location, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, which is the vital question in the present case.

As to the discovery of a vein within the lines of the Evening Star and Central claims there is no question. As long ago as 1874 a mine known as the "Klamath" was being profitably worked in ground adjoining the Evening Star at its southern boundary. The extent and direction of the surface boundaries of the Klamath are not shown, but one of its corners was at the forked tree which is designated in the complaint and notice of location as the northwest and initial corner of the Evening Star. The evidence shows that during the year 1874 original locations of the Evening Star and Central claims were made after the discovery of a vein within the present limits of those claims. For several years after these original locations work was actively prosecuted on the vein, extensive tunnels, drifts, etc., were run to and on the vein, and a large quantity of ore extracted and milled by the original locators. Finally, however, work on the mines ceased, and it seems that on the 1st of January, 1884, they were open to relocation as abandoned claims. At that time the croppings of the vein had been uncovered in a number of places within the surface now claimed by plaintiffs, and at the time this action was tried the testimony showed that they were exposed at the southwestern corner (erroneously designated in the complaint and notice of location as the northwestern corner) of the Evening Star, at the N. E. corner of the Central, and at a number of intermediate points. The underground work on the mine —the levels or drifts, extending many hundred feet between the foot and hanging walls—indicate that the course or strike of the vein within those limits is almost due north and south, and that its dip is to the east at an angle of 15 or 20 degrees from the horizontal. There is also evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that this vein is identical with that upon which defendant has been mining.

The remaining questions of fact are these: First. Were the locations of the Central and Evening Star ever so distinctly marked on the surface by visible monuments as to be easily traced within the meaning of the mining law of 1872? Second. If they ever were so marked, did the lines as defined by such monuments include in their extension the portion of the vein from which the defendant has been extracting ore? Third. If they did include such portion of the vein, were they parallel?

The evidence upon these points cannot be easily or clearly stated or comprehended without the aid of a diagram, and in order to present the matter more simply I have constructed a diagram based upon the evidence, and the maps and the model prepared and introduced by the plaintiffs, which shows the location of the two claims according to the notices of location and the remaining monuments, side by side with their location according to the survey and contention of the plaintiffs. The corners of the claims, according to the notices and monuments, are designated by the figures 1, 2, 3, etc. The corners, according to the maps, model, and surveys of the plaintiffs, are designated by the letters A, B, C, etc. The croppings of the vein are laid down as they appear in the model, or "illustrator," put in evidence by plaintiffs, and made part of the record on the appeal. The letter A and the figure 1 mark the point upon which all parties agree —the point where a forked tree formerly stood, and where its stump still stands (the "double-topped fir tree, blazed Evening Star" of the complaint, and notice of location), the initial point of the Evening Star, of which the Central is an extension; i. e., another coterminous location on the strike of the same lode. Besides this stump of a fir tree and the cropping of the lode, there is no other undisputed monument to mark any corner of either location. But there is one—a pillar of rock about 1160 feet northeast of the stump—which I think is very clearly shown to be the pillar of rock marked "E. V." at the northwestern corner of the Evening Star location, as the same is described in the complaint. There is about midway of the north end of the Central, a rock placed upon another rock, and which plaintiff contends marks the northern extremity of the center line of the Central; but there is very slight, if any, evidence to sustain this claim.

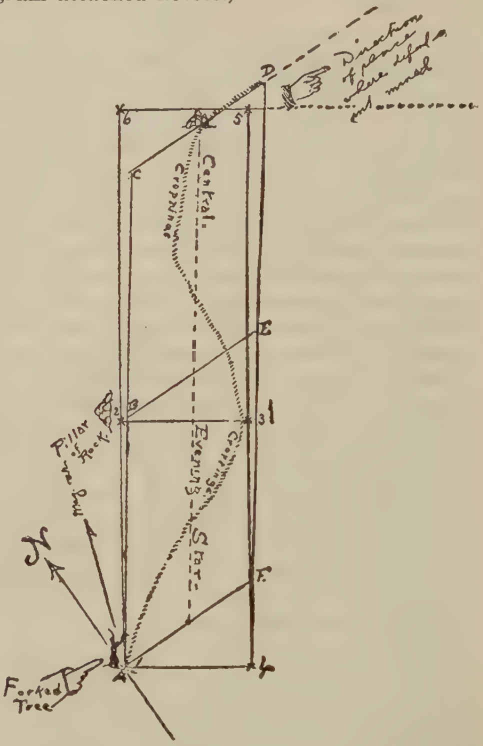
The location, or attempted location, of the Evening Star was made by one Keane, and that of the Central by one Rainey, on the same day—January 1, 1884. They performed the necessary assessment work on the claims until the fall of 1887, when they sold out to the plaintiffs, who have since done more than sufficient work to hold the claims, if they are otherwise good. Rainey is dead, and Keane had left the country before he sold to the plaintiffs in 1887. Their evidence, consequently, could not be had to prove what was done in the matter of marking boundaries, and there was no other direct evidence of any witness who saw any boundary stakes or other monuments placed to mark their location, or who ever saw any monuments on the ground, save those above mentioned, which clearly were not sufficient, in themselves, to enable any one to trace the boundaries of either claim. The indirect evidence introduced at the trial for the purpose of proving the marking of boundaries consisted exclusively of certified copies of the notices of their locations, which Keane and Rainey caused to be recorded in Siskiyou county on the 4th of February, 1884. These notices, as above shown, had no law behind them to give them any legal effect, and they were not competent evidence to prove even that they had been posted on the ground, and much less were they competent to prove the actual erection of the monuments which they called for, and which the law imperatively demands. The only competent evidence of the marking of boundaries is that of witnesses who saw the monuments placed, or who saw them standing after being placed. The contention on the part of plaintiffs that in the case of old claims which have been worked for years, and upon which no sufficient boundary marks can be found, proof of original marking should be dispensed with, and a presumption indulged that they must have been properly defined by visible monuments which have been removed, or destroyed by fraud or the action of the elements, is without any authority to sustain it, and is contrary to the policy of the mining law as expounded in scores of decisions of the state and federal courts. It has been held over and over again under the old district mining laws, and under the different acts of Congress, that the policy of requiring a clear definition of the boundaries of mining claims by visible monuments on the ground was to enable subsequent claimants to locate with safety upon the residue by preventing the swinging and floating of the earlier locations.

To subserve this policy, and as a matter of simple justice, the locators of mining claims are required, not only to mark their location at the time it is made, but to use reasonable diligence in preserving and restoring their boundary monuments as occasion may require. If they and their successors in interest neglect this precaution for a long series of years, as in this case, they expose themselves to the hazards incurred by these plaintiffs of losing, by the death or absence of the original locators and other witnesses, the necessary means of proving the validity of the original location by the only competent evidence of the essential requisites of such locations. The law puts locators of mining claims under no compulsion to procure patents for their claims within any limited period. They are allowed to hold them and work them without paying the government price of the land, or having their boundaries fixed by government surveyors, and by a public and authentic record, as long as suits their convenience; but in the meantime they must do a certain amount of work upon the claims every year. The necessity of doing this work involves the opportunity of performing annually the easy and obvious duty of inspecting and preserving their boundary monuments, and there is no necessity, in order to promote the just policy of the mining law, or any feature of it, for indulging the presumption that claims have been sufficiently marked merely because they have been known as such for a number of years. But this view of the law with respect to the presumption invoked by the plaintiffs—to sustain which they cite no authority—is of little consequence in the present instance, by reason of the fact that copies of the recorded notices of the location of the Central and Evenng Star locations were admitted in evidence wthout objection. By their silence counsel for defendant waived any objection to the incompetency of the notices, and so far as they tend to prove—together with the remaining monuments on the ground—that the boundaries of the claims were properly marked at the time they must be treated as evidence in the case. In this view they are to be considered as proving, at most, the things that they state, and for the purpose of determining what they do prove it is necessary to set forth their material contents.

That of the Evening Star reads as follows: "Notice is hereby given to all whom it may concern, that the undersigned * * * has located fifteen hundred feet of this vein or lode of gold-bearing rock, with surface ground six hundred feet in width, in Liberty mining district, county of Siskiyou, state of California, and known as the 'Evening Star Quartz Mine'; it being a relocation of an abandoned mine, and subject to relocation in accordance with the United States statutes in such cases made and provided, particularly described as follows: Situated on the headwaters of Eddy's Gulch, county and state aforesaid, commencing at a double top fir tree blazed 'Evening Star,' and on the N. W. corner of the claim; thence in a N. E. direction fifteen hundred feet, more or less, to a pillar of rock marked 'E. V.'; thence S. E. direction six hundred feet to a monument of stones and stake marked 'E. V.'; thence in a S. W. direction fifteen hundred feet to monument of stake and stones, stake marked 'E. V.'; thence in a N. W. direction six hundred feet to place of beginning. And I intend to hold and work the same as provided by the laws, customs, and rules of miners and the mining statues of the United States. Dated on the ground this first day of January, A. D. 1884. Location January 1st, 1884. Jas. E. Keane. Attest: B. W. Jencks. Frank Vargas."

The Central notice reads as follows: "Notice is hereby given to all whom it may concern that the undersigned * * * has located fifteen hundred linear feet of this vein or lode, with surface ground six hundred feet in width, situated on the head waters of Eddy's Gulch, Liberty mining district, county of Siskiyou, and state of California, and known as the 'Central Quartz Mining Claim'; it being an extension on the northeast of the Evening Star quartz mine, and this being a notice of relocation of an abandoned mine, and subject to relocation under the laws in such cases made and provided: Commencing at this notice, running thence in a northeasterly direction fifteen hundred feet to stake and mound of stones; thence in a northwesterly direction six hundred feet to stake and mound of stones, stake marked 'X'; thence in a southwesterly direction fifteen hundred feet to stake in mound of rocks marked 'X'; thence in a S. E. direction to place of beginning. And notice is hereby given that I intend to work and hold said claim as provided by local customs and rules of miners and the mining statutes of the United States. Dated on the ground this first day of January, A. D. 1884. Located January 1st, 1884. Attest: James Rainey, Locator."

These notices, it is to be remembered, are the evidence submitted by the plaintiffs, and the most substantial evidence they had to offer, for the purpose of proving the boundaries of their claims, and taking them as a guide, what do they prove? In the first place, it is to be noted that the Central was located as an extension of the Evening Star, and this means that the Evening Star was first laid off on the ground. Another point is that each notice claims 1,500 hundred feet of "this vein or lode," which indicates that each notice as posted on the ground was placed on the croppings of the lode, or in such close proximity to the point where the croppings appeared, or had been exposed, as to make the expression "this vein or lode" mean what it said. This is all the more probable from the well-known practice of miners to place their location notices so close to the point where the vein is exposed that one who sees the work on the croppings cannot avoid seeing the notice. The locators of the Evening Star and Central claims then proceeded as follows: They placed the Evening Star notice on the forked tree, which, as the diagram shows, stood within a few feet of the croppings of the lode. They then went to the pillar of rock on a course about 32 degrees east of north. Probably they did not measure the distance, because the notice calls for 1,500 feet when the real distance by actual survey is only 1,166 feet. From that point they must have gone on a course 32 degrees south of east to the next corner of the claim, for the claim is 600 feet wide, and the measured distance, from one corner to the other, is 600 feet; from which it results, as a mathematical necessity, that the end line must have been run at right angles to the side line. This, also, is exceedingly probable for other reasons, because miners know that the side lines of a claim ought to be parallel to its strike and its end lines at right angles to its strike. And they are well acquainted with the simple expedients by which a perpendicular can be raised from any point on a fixed line with no other aid than a tape measure—an article in universal use by prospectors and locators of claims. Another circumstance of peculiar significance is that a 600-foot line run at right angles to the line between the fir tree and the pillar of rock places the third corner of the Evening Star very little outside of the croppings of the vein, and so near as to explain the action of Rainey in selecting the monument placed at that corner for his starting point, instead of the more conspicuous monument at the other corner. His notice, like Keane's, calls for so many feet in length on "this vein or lode," and he naturally placed it on a corner where the vein appeared, in order that the words of the notice might show what vein was meant, and that the vein might show what the notice meant—that each might illustrate the other. Still another fact confirming the assumption that the end lines of the Evening Star were at right angles to its side lines, and extended in a northwest and southeast direction, is the designation in the notice of the initial corner as the northwest corner. The fact that the fourth corner was southeast of it is the only possible explanation of that mistake. If, as plaintiffs claim, the fourth corner was due east of the first corner, the mistake in calling the latter the northwest corner would seem inexplicable. So much for the evidence bearing upon the direction of the end lines of the Evening Star. According to the notice, monuments of stones with stakes marked "E. V." were placed at the third and fourth corners. (See reduced diagram attached hereto.)



If Rainey, in locating the Central, made it coterminus with the Evening Star, as the plaintiffs assume, and as its designation as an extension implies, his initial point was the northeast corner of the Evening Star—a highly probable assumption, as has been shown—and he measured (probably with a tape line) 1,500 feet in the same general direction to his northeast corner, which he marked with a stake in a mound of stones. According to the other calls of the notice he laid off a rectangle 1,500 feet long and 600 feet wide, marking the third and fourth corners with stakes and mounds of stones. The only monument now to be found answering to these calls, the only monument known to any witness in the case, is the monument, consisting of one stone laid upon another, which plaintiff contends marks the end of the center line of the Evening Star and Central mines. The ground of this contention does not appear. There is no call in the notices for a monument in the middle of the end line of either claim, and no witness testifies that any such monument was ever placed by any locator or owner. It is a much more probable supposition that it really marks the northeast corner of the Central as located by Rainey, for it is just about 1,450 feet from his starting point on a course varying somewhat less than 10 degrees from that of the line between the forked tree and the pillar of rock. In other words, it is quite as near the point called for in the notice as could be reasonably expected in a measurement of a line of that length in a rough country with no means of keeping the direction except sighting by natural objects.

I have now stated all that the notices tend to prove with respect to these locations, and, allowing them the effect of competent evidence upon the ground that defendant made no objection to their admission, it may be conceded that they establish a prima facie case of valid locations of the Central and Evening Star with end lines substantially parallel. But they establish end lines which do not include the ground in which the defendant has been mining. Referring to the diagram, the defendant's mining operations have been conducted at a point between the diverging lines, 5, 6, 7 and C, D, about 1,000 feet east of the corner marked 5, and within the surface lines of a claim called the "Golden Eagle," a claim which is in the possession of the defendant, and was located prior to the survey of their claims by the plaintiffs, for the purpose of definitely locating or relocating their side and end lines. The surveyor, Nolan, was not called as a witness at the trial; but a map based upon his field notes and made by John Daggett, together with a model, also constructed by him from the same data, were put in evidence, and his son, B. F. Daggett, who assisted in making the survey, testified in regard to what was done, and what was discovered on the ground. The figure marked on the accompanying diagram by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, shows the lines of the Nolan survey in relation to a diagram of the claims according to the notices of location and the two certain monuments. It will be seen that they differ very radically; the most material difference being that the end lines of the Central, according to the Nolan survey, embrace that portion of the extra lateral dip of the vein where defendant had been mining, while the end lines, according to the notices of location, leave it outside. The question is, what has this map to support it? The notices of location and the existing monuments, including the croppings of the vein, certainly do not. It departs from them at every point, except the point of beginning. The testimony of B. F. Daggett is to the effect that the intention in making the survey was to follow the calls of the notices as controlled by existing monuments. The only monuments they found were the forked tree, where they commenced to survey, the pillar of rock 1,160 feet northeast of the tree, and the pile of stones which they assumed to be a mark of the middle of the Central on its north end. This assumption, based upon no evidence whatever, accounts for the form of the Nolan survey in all of its departures from the calls of the notices, and it is proper here to reiterate the fact that no such monument is called for in the notices, and that no witness testifies that any such monument was ever placed by the locators. In order to get it on the end of a center line, every certain, as well as every indefinite, call of the notices, must be disregarded, as in fact they were, in making the survey. Instead of running from the forked tree to the pillar of rock they ran on a line (N., 33½° east) which carried them 35 feet east of the rock, and instead of stopping at the rock they put their stake to mark the corner B exactly 18 chains (1,188 feet) from the tree. Then, continuing on the same course, they measured off another 18 chains, and stopped at C, where they discovered no sign of a monument; but it was a point from which a line drawn through the assumed center line monument would cross the strike of the vein at right angles. Then they went on to the other corners—D, E, F—without finding any traces of former monuments. The result is a map of two lozenge-shaped claims 600 feet wide, according to the scale, and involving these discrepancies: First. They have no corner at the pillar of rock. Second. Side lines of the Central are 1,188 feet in length, when the call is for 1,500. Third. All the end lines of both claims are 720 feet long instead of 600. Fourth. The point where Rainey is assumed to have posted his notice of location is over 150 feet from the croppings of the lode, which it designates as "this vein or lode." Fifth. The designation of the first corner in Keane's notice as the northwest corner is deprived of the small measure of propriety that it would have if the fourth corner of the Evening Star was at 4, instead of F.

All these departures from the calls which the survey assumed to follow are justified by the gratuitous assumption that the pile of rock at the north end of the Central was so placed by the locators to mark its center line. There is not a particle of evidence to warrant this assumption, and by reference to the diagram it will be seen that if the west side line of the claims had been run through the pillar of rock, instead of 35 feet to the east of it, this pile of rock would have been more than 70 feet from the true center line of the claim. A court cannot be expected to accept as evidence a map which departs so widely from the certain data established by the best evidence plaintiffs have to offer for the purpose of proving the original location of their claim. A map, in itself, proves nothing unless it is first shown by competent evidence to be a correct representation of the relative positions of the objects it purports to delineate. A map purporting to show the lines of a location of a mining claim is of no probative value, unless supported by the evidence of some one who knows the position of the monuments which defined those lines; for it is by the location monuments alone that their beginning, end, and direction can be determined. Here, as we have shown, there is no witness to the location of more than two of the corner monuments—the tree and the pillar of rock at the southwest and northwest corners of the Evening Star. For the positions of the others we have no better evidence than the calls of the notices of location—evidence offered by plaintiffs, and essential to their case, and to which all their other evidence is necessarily secondary. Are we to take the notices of location as evidence that the claims were duly located and reject them in favor of a theory or conjecture as to the situs of the location monuments? This, in fact, is what we are asked to do.

The plaintiff, John Daggett, who gave directions for the survey, stated more than once in the course of his testimony the theory upon which he contends the end lines of the locations should be fixed. The design of the law is that they should be at right angles to the vein, and, the deeper workings on this vein having shown that its course is north and south, the end lines should be extended east and west to conform to its dip, and therefore that the law itself gives him these lines. This is a theory fully supported by the provisions of the mining law of 1866 (14 Stat. 251, c. 262), as held by this court in the Argonaut Case, 131 Cal. 15, 63 Pac. 148, and it obtained among miners and lawyers for some time after the passage of the act of 1872. In one of the earliest cases arising under that act (Gleeson v. Martin White, 13 Nev. 442), I made it the ground of my decision upon a question as to the sufficiency of a surface location, and in the celebrated "Horseshoe" Case (Iron Mg. Co. v. Elgin Mg. Co., 118 U. S. 209, 6 Sup. Ct. 1177, 30 L. Ed. 98) it was the ground of the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Waite, concurred in by Justice Bradley, on a question of extralateral right. But in that case the theory that the law will give to the locator any lines, except those which he has defined by visible monuments on the ground, was definitely rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States, the final arbiter upon such questions, and the same decision was made in a later case. Del Monte Mg. Co. v. Last Chance Mg. Co., 171 U. S. 55, 18 Sup. Ct. 895, 43 L. Ed. 72. This and other pertinent questions were reviewed by the late Justice Temple with his usual ability in his opinion in the Argonaut Case, supra, where we held with respect to a patent issued after 1872 upon a claim located under the act of 1866 that the law did establish end lines for the locator conforming to the dip of the vein, and gave him extralateral rights, notwithstanding the lack of parallelism in the end lines of the surface claim as patented. But the opinion in that case distinctly recognizes the change effected by the act of 1872 with respect to claims thereafter located, viz., that the locators acquire no extralateral rights to the dip of the vein, unless their end lines have not only been marked on the surface, but have been made parallel.

The following quotations from Mr. Daggett's testimony will be sufficient to show that his controlling idea in laying off the boundaries of his claims was the right of the locator to adjust his end lines to the true course and dip of the vein. On his cross-examination regarding the end lines of the claims as delineated on his map and model, he was asked: "Q. Why was it you made the end lines take a slant like that [showing]? A. Because I might say the Mountain Laurel done the same thing, and really because that is the proper method to work a mine—a mine on its surface is very little—on the surface —from the croppings on the surface here. Over 1,200 feet from here to here, and running on the vein, I have concluded that is the true dip of the vein [showing], and I am entitled to take that as the dip of the vein." The answer to the question is not strictly responsive, except at the end, where he makes it plain that he gave a slant to the end lines in order to make them conform to the dip of the vein as developed in the deeper workings in the mine. Again, when questioned as to the instructions given Nolan with respect to the survey, he explains why the west side line of the Central was ended at C (312 feet short of the call of the notice, and where no monument was found): "He was instructed to run a certain distance, which commenced in there—to run a certain distance, and the direction was given in the notice to run to a pillar of rock, and that is right in there. They, of course, commenced in here, and went as far north as would confine the croppings within the north end line, and we all concluded that we couldn't go any farther, because there was no vein up there [showing], and that took this line in the direction of the dip of the vein." Which means that they stopped at that point because the vein, according to its true course, extended no farther north within his side lines, and stopping there would take his end line in the direction of the dip. The position of the monuments was, in other words, a subordinate consideration—the dip of the vein a controlling consideration—in making the survey.

Throughout the argument of this case counsel for respondents have been challenged to point out the evidence in the record which supports a finding that the north end line of the Central mine will include the part of the vein from which defendant removed the ore in question, and on the reargument their attention was especially directed to this matter. They could point to nothing except the evidence of Mr. Daggett, Sr., who did state several times that he had always known, before and after he had acquired the Central mine, that its northern boundary was at the place where the croppings of the lode protrude under a certain flume, the position of which is not given on the maps, but which I have no doubt corresponds to his line as delineated on his map and model. This evidence would, perhaps, support the verdict, if Mr. Daggett had not frankly admitted on his cross-examination that he never knew of his own knowledge of but one monument at the north end of the Central. I quote his examination on this point: "Q. Then I don't understand you to say that you ever laid out the Central location by finding the monuments James Rainey erected, if he erected any? A. We found one. Q. You found one monument? A. One end central line. Q. One end central line? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was that the only monument you found? A. You had better get the surveyor on the stand. He will remember it. Q. Well, so far as you know? A. Yes. Q. That was the only monument you know about the Central mine —was the only monument you ever saw on the Central mine? A. From my own observation, yes. Q. You never run across any of the monuments, except the one you stated, of the Central mine as laid out by James Rainey? A. Yes, sir; that is all. Q. And what point on the Central mine would that be with reference to this map here? Show it to the jury, please. A. Just about there; right near the center. Q. That would be the north end center? A. Right on the north and center. Q. What was it? A. A rock placed on another rock, with a blazed tree around down from it; done years ago." This shows that Mr. Daggett was incompetent to testify as to the direction of the end line. No one can know the direction of a straight line without knowing two points on the line, and he knew but one. Of course, with a knowledge of this one point on the line, and of the dip of the vein, he could, upon his theory of the proper relation of the end lines to the dip, give the direction of the line; but, as above pointed out, it is the line fixed by the monuments, and not the line indicated by the dip of the vein, that controls in favor of intervening rights. Of course, it is not to be denied that before a patent, and before an adverse right has accrued to a subsequent locator, end lines may always be readjusted to conform to the true course and dip of a vein; but this can only be done by re-marking the surface location, so that its new boundaries may be readily traced, which is, in effect, an abandonment of the old location and the marking of a new one.

For the reasons here given I am convinced that there is no substantial evidence that the north end line of the Central mine was ever defined by any monuments on the ground as a line extending east and west. On the contrary, all the evidence introduced by the plaintiff tends strongly to prove that, instead of running from C to D, the north end line of the Central actually ran from 5 to 6, unless, as I consider highly probable, it ran from the pile of rocks at the north end of the claim 600 feet to the northwest, at right angles to a line drawn from 3 to said pile of rocks; for, if that pile of rocks was a monument of the claim as located, it can only have been a corner monument, and, if so, the monument placed to mark the northeast corner.

But there is another fatal flaw in plaintiffs' case, as to which there is an absolute failure of evidence. One of the specifications of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict is this: "There is no evidence that the claim as marked upon the ground had its end lines parallel, so as to entitle plaintiffs to follow the vein beyond the side line of the claim." To this proposition neither the record nor the argument of counsel furnishes any answer. If it could be conceded that the north end line of the Central ever was marked by visible monuments at C and D, or in any other way, there is not a particle of evidence that its south end line ever was laid off on the line B, E, or that the south end line of the Evening Star extended from the forked tree to F. No monument, or trace of a monument, was found at D, but a stake of the Nolan survey was placed there, because it was the point of intersection of a line (720 feet long) drawn due east from C, with a line parallel to the west side line and 600 feet distant therefrom on a perpendicular. The point E was determined by measuring merely—no sign of a monument appearing there—and point F in the same manner. There is no sort of evidence that any monuments ever stood at either of these points, but very persuasive evidence, as above shown, that Rainey's notice was posted on or near the croppings of the vein at the point marked 3, and that his end line extended from that point 600 feet to the pillar of rock. If this is so—and there can be no other conclusion based upon the evidence—plaintiffs have no extralateral rights whatever, unless their north end line ran from 5 to 6, which would not include defendants' claim. Upon any hypothesis the verdict is unsupported by the evidence.

Upon other points, including the question as to the identity of the lode upon which defendant is mining with that which has the outcrop within the lines of the Central, we think there was evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Regarding the errors assigned upon the rulings of the court at the trial, the first to be considered is an exception to the admission of evidence that defendant had extracted ore from the locality above described. This evidence was objected to upon the ground that it tended to prove a fact not alleged—a matter without the issues; the point of the objection being that the complaint described only a surface claim, and alleged an entry and trespass upon "said premises," which it is contended is insufficient to authorize proof of a trespass outside of the surface so described. We do not think that, in an action for trespass upon the extralateral dip of that part of a vein which has its apex within a valid location, it is strictly necessary for the plaintiff to allege the existence of a vein having its apex within his surface boundaries, but departing from his side lines on its downward course and that his end lines are parallel (see, generally, Central Eureka Co. v. East Central Eureka Co., 146 Cal. 147–157, 79 Pac. 834); but it would be better pleading to allege the facts specifically, in order to present the issues more definitely and prevent surprise. In this case it does not appear that defendants were misled, and there is no occasion, with a view to a new trial, for any further discussion of the matter. There was a ground, however, upon which the objection to this testimony should have been sustained. The description of the Central claim in the complaint was substantially as it is delineated on the diagram by the figures 2, 3, 5, 6, and the mining of defendant was proved at a point not only without the surface lines of that claim, but altogether outside of its end lines extended in their own direction. It does not appear, however, that this point of objection was pressed upon the attention of the court, and, if it had been pressed, it could have been cured by amendment at the trial.

The only other objection to the ruling of the court seriously urged by the appellant relates to the evidence of lode identity. Counsel contend, in effect, that the only competent proof of a trespass upon the extralateral dip of a vein is by an actual tracing from within the surface lines of the location down to the point of the alleged trespass; a literal following down by continuous excavation between the hanging and foot walls. We do not find any authority supporting this proposition, and do not consider it reasonable. The burden of proof in all such cases is upon the plaintiff to show, by satisfactory evidence, the continuity of the vein between its apex within his lines, and the point at which the defendant is mining; but there are entirely satisfactory modes of proving identity in such cases, without an actual tracing, and, as above said, we think there was in this case sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that the defendants' mining was done on the same vein which has its apex within the lines of the Central mine.

There are no other points requiring notice. On the ground that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, the order and judgment of the superior court are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings as advised.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.

We dissent, and adhere to the opinion heretofore delivered in department, and in the conclusion therein reached. We think that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; SHAW, J.; HENSHAW, J.

NOTE.—The following is the opinion in department referred to in the dissenting opinion:

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for alleged trespasses by defendant upon certain quartz mines of plaintiffs. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs with damages in the sum of $1. From the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The only serious question in the case is whether, when a complaint describes a quartz mine by its name and the boundaries which constitute the surface location, and avers that the defendant wrongfully entered upon the premises and extracted valuable ore from the mine, a recovery can be had for ore taken from a place outside of the plaintiffs' surface location, but from a vein or ledge the apex of which is within plaintiffs' exterior surface lines, and which dips laterally beyond a side line. It is averred in the complaint that plaintiffs are, and for more than twenty years last past have been, the owners and in possession of "those certain quartz mines situated * * * and known as the 'Evening Star Quartz Mine' and the 'Central Quartz Mine,' which mines are particularly described as follows"; and then the surface location of each mine is given by metes and bounds, the one being an extension of the other. It is then averred that defendant wrongfully entered upon "said premises" and extracted and carried away from "said mines" large quantities of gold ore of a certain named value, and the prayer is for damages for such wrongful acts. Defendant by its answer denied that it entered upon said miles or took any ore therefrom. At the trial plaintiffs did not attempt to prove that defendant entered within or beneath the surface lines of their mines or took any ore therefrom. They introduced evidence, however, tending to show that a certain quartz ledge, the apex of which was within their surface lines, dipped laterally beyond one of the side lines of the surface location, and that defendant had taken ore from said ledge at a place beyond said side line. To this evidence defendant objected upon the ground that there was no averment in the complaint "that defendant had extracted gold outside of the vertical planes bounding the Central and Evening Star mines." The objection was overruled, and defendant excepted, and the question thus raised by this objection is the main one presented in the record; that is to say, if the owner of a quartz mine seeks to recover damages for trespass upon his ledge committed outside of the lines of the surface location, must he specially aver the particular place at which the wrongful acts were committed?

The question above stated seems to be a new one, and no precedent in point has been cited. If at a trial under such a complaint the defendant should be really surprised at plaintiffs' attempt to prove acts done wholly outside of his surface lines, perhaps the trial court might properly consider that fact a good ground for a motion for a continuance of the trial. But no such fact appears in the case at bar, no motion for a continuance was made, and the course of the trial shows that defendant knew that plaintiffs were suing for trespasses committed outside of their surface lines, and apparently was fully prepared to contest that issue. Therefore defendant was not actually prejudiced by what it asserts to be a failure in the complaint to cover the offered evidence, and the question presented is simply an abstract question of pleading. We think that the court was right in overruling the objection, and that the evidence was admissible under the complaint. The main thing of consequence and value to the owner of a quartz mine is the ledge the apex of which is within the surface lines of his claim. Such ledge, within his end lines, is a constituent part of his mine, no matter at what dip or angle it may go laterally downward in the earth. If it goes beyond his side lines, it is still as much a part of his property and estate as the part within such lines. The valid location of a quartz mine gives notice to all the world that the locator owns every ledge the apex of which is within his surface lines, no matter where it may be at certain depths below the surface. Therefore the description in a complaint of a quartz mine which gives the name of the mine and the boundaries of the surface location includes (within the end lines) as an integral part of the mine the whole of the ledge the apex of which is within the surface lines; and in a complaint for trespass on a quartz mine there is no more necessity for stating the particular part of the property on which the trespass was committed than there would be in an action for trespass on a placer mining claim, on a tract of agricultural land, or on a town lot.

It is contended that there was no sufficient evidence of a valid location of plaintiffs' claims—that is, that the boundaries were not sufficiently marked so as to be readily traced; but we do not think that this contention is maintainable. Plaintiffs claim under relocations made about 18 years ago. Long before that time the claims had been previously located, and a great deal of work done on them, and their boundaries were well known. Some of the marks on the old locations were used in the new locations. Considering that the locations were made a long time ago, and that the claims were in possession of plaintiffs and their grantors for a great many years, we think that there was a sufficient showing of marking by which the boundaries could be readily traced. Some, though not all, of the monuments were found. No doubt the evidence would have been more satisfactory if the two relocators, one of whom seems to have been dead and the other long absent from the state, had been witnesses. When the owners of a mining claim have owned, possessed, and worked it for a long period of time without any dispute as to its boundaries, they are apt to become careless in the matter of keeping up monuments on their corners and lines; and in such case, when the point made against them is that their entire title to the mine is void for want of sufficient marking, rigid proof in detail of the original marking of every part of the boundaries should not be expected. And in view of these considerations we think that there was reasonably sufficient evidence of the lines of plaintiffs' claims to answer the contention that for want of such evidence their entire title was invalid.

It is also contended that the evidence was insufficient to show that the ledge on which defendant worked was identical with the ledge the apex of which was within plaintiffs' surface lines. But this contention is also not maintainable. Of course, in such a case it is not necessary that the ledge should have been continuously exploited, uncovered, and absolutely traced from the apex to the point in dispute. It is sufficient if the identity be shown to the jury by a clear and strong probability. And we think that in the case at bar such probability of identity was clearly shown by the testimony of plaintiffs' witnesses, and particularly by the testimony of the plaintiff John Daggett when on the witness stand, as well as by the admission of the superintendent of defendant, which was admitted without objection.

The foregoing covers substantially all the points made by appellant. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

YARDLEY v. SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY BANK et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1906. Rehearing Denied by the Supreme Court July 19, 1906.)

1. HOMESTEAD—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—CONTROL OF HUSBAND.

Where community property of husband and wife became a valid homestead, it thereupon ceased to be community property, and the husband's right of absolute control over the same, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 172, immediately ceased.

2. SAME—EXEMPTIONS.

Where property became the homestead of a husband and wife many years prior to the recording of a judgment against the husband, such judgment could not become a lien thereon as provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 671, 690.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE PROPERTY.

A wife declined to sign a mortgage on the homestead, unless $500 of the proceeds of the loan to be secured should be used to purchase stock of a corporation in her name and for her separate use. This was agreed to, and the stock, though first purchased in the name of the husband, was subsequently changed so as to show on its face that it belonged to her, and the certificates were by her assigned to the mortgagee as additional security for the loan. Held, that as, under Civ. Code, § 3441, the homestead was not liable for the husband's debts, no gift of any part thereof was in fraud of his creditors and such stock was the separate property of the wife.

Action by John Yardley against the San Joaquin Valley Bank and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. R. C. Minor, for respondent San Joaquin Valley Bank. Plummer & Dunlap, for respondent Samson Iron Works.

BUCKLES, J. This action is to recover from the San Joaquin Valley Bank the possession of 500 shares of the capital stock of the Samson Iron Works, which plaintiff alleges he purchased at an execution sale on a judgment he obtained against defendant Joseph H. Condy, which stock stands in the name of "Mrs. Joseph H. Condy," the wife of the said Joseph H. Condy, and was deposited in said bank as a security. Judgment was for defendants, and the plaintiff appeals from said judgment.

Facts. The defendants Joseph H. Condy and his wife, Atlanta J. Condy, owned a piece of property on which they were living in Stockton and, on June 23, 1894, the wife declared a homestead on said premises, in due form, and the same was duly recorded on June 25, 1894. Ten years later, and on October 22, 1904, plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant Joseph H. Condy for the sum of $893.20. On July 19, 1902, the defendants, Joseph H. Condy and Atlanta J. Condy, duly made, executed, and delivered to the defendant (bank) their promissory note for the sum of $1,200, and at the same time made, executed, and delivered to said defendant (bank) a mortgage on all the homestead property. That, thereupon, and as a part of the same transaction, the sum of $500 of said money so borrowed was used in the purchase of 500 shares of the capital stock of the Samson Iron Works, which shares were purchased in the wife's name, and said shares were delivered to the said San Joaquin Valley Bank also as security for the payment of said $1,200 borrowed. On November 22, 1904, appellant took out an execution on his said judgment against the property of defendant Joseph H. Condy, directing the sheriff to levy upon and sell all of the interest of the said Joseph H. Condy in and to said 500 shares of stock of the Samson Iron Works. That in due time and after due notice given, on the 28th day of November, 1904, the sheriff sold to appellant all the interest defendant Joseph H. Condy had in and to said 500 shares of stock, and delivered to appellant a certificate setting forth such sale. That thereupon appellant went to the said San Joaquin Valley Bank, presented the said sheriff's certificate, and demanded that said bank deliver to him said 500 shares of stock, saying he would pay whatever the bank had against the said stock. He demanded also that the bank assign to him the said $1,200 mortgage of the Condys and that he would pay the note or whatever was due on it. The bank refused to comply with this demand, and also refused to give him the said stock. Appellant then went to the office of the Samson Iron Works and, presenting his said sheriff's certificate of sale, demanded that said Samson Iron Works issue to him a new certificate of stock for said 500 shares. This demand was not complied with.

At the time of giving the said mortgage Mrs. Condy declined to execute the same unless the 500 shares of stock (which had not then been issued) should be purchased for her and given to her. The negotiations for the purchase of said shares were made by Joseph H. Condy. It does not clearly appear whether Condy was to have employment in said iron works if 500 shares of stock were taken, but the president of the corporation, J. M. Kroyer, with whom the negotiations were in part made, testified as follows: "I told him I thought there would be an opening for him shortly after we were incorporated, and after the incorporation had run for a while, it proved that there was, and he was employed about the time he took out his stock." Mr. F. B. Hubbard, the secretary of the Samson Iron Works, testified that Condy said his wife wanted the stock and that he (Condy) wanted a job there and that was the object of getting the stock. It seems from the testimony that it was well understood by the Samson Iron Works that the stock was for Mrs. Condy. The testimony shows also that she signed and executed the mortgage upon the promise of her husband that $500 of the $1,200 to be borrowed would be used in the purchase of 500 shares of the capital stock in the Samson Iron Works for her and in her name. In the negotiations with the bank for the loan the bank was not willing to loan the $1,200 with no other security than a mortgage on the homestead, but would loan the sum providing the 500 shares of the Samson Iron Works, which the Condys had been negotiating to purchase, should be deposited also as security for the $1,200. This was agreed to, the mortgage given, the money loaned, the stock purchased and paid for by Condy out of the $1,200 and deposited in the bank as security. It appears from the testimony that the secretary in issuing the stock, though knowing it was for Mrs. Condy, inadvertently issued it in the name of Joseph H. Condy, and when Mr. Condy shortly thereafter returned the stock to him and called his attention to the fact the stock was in his name instead of his wife's name, as was the understanding, the said secretary wrote the letters "Mrs." in front of the name "Joseph H. Condy" and Mrs. Condy went to the office of the iron works and herself placed the letters "Mrs." in front of the name of Joseph H. or J. H. Condy as the same was signed on the stub of the stock book for said shares of stock. And the certificate for said 500 shares was indorsed on the back by her and she delivered it to the said bank in accordance with the prior agreement had with said bank. Joseph H. Condy declared he never had any interest in said stock and that in purchasing it he acted solely for his wife, and the testimony bears out this assertion. The stock was deposited with the bank about July 19, 1902, and appellant recovered his said judgment against defendant Condy on October 22, 1904. We are entirely satisfied this stock and mortgage transaction was free from fraud as against the appellant or any other person. Appellant claims the property on which the homestead was declared to be community property, and that the said 500 shares of stock, having been purchased from the money borrowed on the homestead was community property, and that therefore, the wife could not pledge, mortgage or dispose of it, and for that reason the said bank had no right in, claim to, or pledge of said stock. But we think this not tenable. The testimony shows the property, which was the homestead, was acquired in part by the joint effort of both husband and wife after their marriage, and in part by her separate property. The undisputed testimony of husband and wife shows that when they married in 1886 the wife had $700 or $800, and that nearly $600 of this money went into this homestead as purchase money and for improvements. The property, the homestead, was worth about $2,500 at the time of the trial. Whether the mixing up of her separate funds with the community interest would leave her holding an interest as separate property, or that it became all community property, is immaterial here. If it was community property (sections 164 and 687, Civ. Code, the moment it became a valid homestead it ceased to be community property and Joseph H. Condy ceased to have the absolute control over it as he would were it community property under section 172 of the Civil Code. The homestead was declared and recorded years before appellant obtained his judgment and, therefore, there is nothing he could have done to make his judgment a lien on said homestead. Sections 671 and 690, Code Civ. Proc.

It is clear that the judgment of plaintiff never became a lien upon the homestead, neither did it become a lien upon the $500 which was a part of the money borrowed on the homestead and which went to purchase the 500 shares of stock, for no levy was ever made thereon, nor did such judgment lien ever attach to the said 500 shares of stock unless by the levy attempted November 22, 1904. As to the ownership of said 500 shares of stock the court found, and the evidence of Joseph H. Condy and his wife supports such findings: "That the said defendant, Atlanta J. Condy, sued as Mrs. Joseph H. Condy, declined and refused to sign said mortgage upon said homestead property unless the stock and certificate to be purchased of the defendant, Samson Iron Works, should be her separate property purchased in her name free from any claim of ownership or interest therein by and on the part of her husband, and that said stock and certificate of stock so to be the property of the defendant, Atlanta J. Condy, sued as Mrs. Joseph H. Condy, should be issued to her." That it was thereupon agreed between the defendant Joseph H. Condy and his wife Atlanta J. Condy, sued as Mrs. Joseph H. Condy that the stock to be purchased in the Samson Iron Works should become and be her separate property and that the certificate thereof should be taken in her name." The court also found that this 500 shares of stock was the separate property of the said Atlanta J. Condy. If this 500 shares of stock was the separate property of the wife, then it was not subject to attachment for the husband's debts. Section 171, Civ. Code.

The agreement of the husband was, properly stated, to give the wife $500 out of the $1,200 raised on the homestead with which he was to purchase for her 500 shares of the capital stock of the Samson Iron Works which was a consideration for her executing the mortgage, and so far as the appellant's interests or demands are concerned this $500 became her separate property. As the homestead was not liable for any of the debts of the husband, any gift, sale, or pledge of the whole or any part thereof to the wife or to any one could not under any circumstances be held, as a matter of fact, to be with intent to defraud appellant or any creditor. Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. 1045; and section 3441, Civ. Code. The judgment of appellant was against Joseph H. Condy and not his wife, it being his debt and not hers, this 500 shares of the capital stock in the Samson Iron Works being her separate property was still not liable to be subjected to appellant's judgment. Payne v. Cummings, 146 Cal. 426, 80 Pac. 620, 106 Am. St. Rep. 47. As we view it there is no way possible for appellant to subject this 500 shares of stock to the payment of this judgment. Taking the view we have, that the 500 shares of stock in the Samson Iron Works is the separate property of the defendant Atlanta J. Condy, wife of the judgment debtor, it becomes unnecessary to consider other questions presented by this appeal. The findings are supported by the evidence and warrant this judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OWENS.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 21, 1906.)

1. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for assault with intent to murder, evidence examined and held to sustain a verdict of conviction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—DEFENSE—INTOXICATION.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, there was no evidence that accused was intoxicated to such a degree as to destroy his capacity for understanding the nature and effect of his acts, the defense of intoxication was insufficient to overcome a verdict of guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 64–70.]

3. SAME—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW—CONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

Objection to the remarks of the district attorney in a criminal case cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court.

4. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment under Pen. Code, § 217, prescribing a punishment for one "who assaults another with intent to commit murder," which alleges that accused assaulted another with "a deadly weapon," with intent to murder, is not bad for the use of the words "with a deadly weapon," though the prosecution is limited to proving the assault alleged.

5. CRIMINAL LAW — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — EVIDENCE.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, there was no evidence of a general felonious intent on the part of accused, a requested instruction that it was not sufficient to prove a general felonious intent, was properly refused.

6. SAME — REFUSAL TO GIVE INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, the court charged that the intent of accused to murder must be established as a fact, and that the burden of proving every element of the crime was on the prosecution, the refusal to charge that the burden of proving the intent was on the prosecution, was not erroneous.

7. SAME—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, there was no evidence authorizing a finding that accused used a pistol for the purpose of striking the prosecutor, the court properly refused to permit the jury to consider the hypothetical result of such a blow.

8. SAME—NEW TRIAL—MATTERS CONSIDERED.

Affidavits setting forth proceedings had at the preliminary examination of accused, and a charge to the grand jury given by another judge could not be considered in support of a motion for a new trial, such facts not being shown to have been connected with the trial or brought to the notice of the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Bert Owens was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Hinds and Lee J. Allen, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HARRISON, P. J. The appellant was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, and has appealed from the judgment thereon and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. One of the grounds of his motion for a new trial was that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. His counsel concedes that there was some evidence in support of the verdict, but contends that upon the preponderance of the evidence the jury was not authorized to find that the defendant had any intention to kill Mecartea, the prosecuting witness. There was testimony that the defendant had previously threatened to kill Mecartea; that on the day the assault was made upon him he drove in a buggy to the blacksmith shop where Mecartea was at work, and requested him to come out into the street; that Mecartea thereupon went out to the street, and the defendant, still remaining in his buggy, said to him that he had come to kill him; that Mecartea told him to go away, that he wished no trouble with him, and returned into the shop; that the defendant thereupon got out of his buggy, drew his pistol, and following Mecartea went into the shop, pointing his pistol at him. As he went into the shop he commenced to villify Mecartea, saying several times rapidly and in an excited manner as he approached him: "I came to kill you, and, damn you, I am going to kill you;" and as he did so stepped ahead, and they both stepped at the same time, and Mecartea knocked the pistol out of his hands, and they thereupon clinched, and fell to the floor. Whether it was the intention of the defendant to kill Mecartea was a fact to be determined by the jury from all of the testimony of the witnesses, and we cannot say that their verdict is not amply sustained.

The contention of the appellant that he was intoxicated at the time, and it is therefore apparent that he did not have such intention, is insufficient to overcome the verdict. There was no evidence that he was intoxicated to such a degree as to destroy his capacity for understanding the nature and effect of his acts and conduct; and it must also be assumed that the jury took this matter into consideration, and gave to the evidence on that subject its proper weight in determining their verdict.

2. Another ground for reversal urged by the appellant is the misconduct of the district attorney during the trial, both in his opening statement to the jury and in his argument at the close of the testimony, and also in the form of questions put by him to witnesses. This claim is general in its form, no special remarks or form of question being pointed out as objectionable, and it does not appear that at the trial any objection on this ground was made to either the opening statement of the district attorney or to his closing argument, or that the court was requested to interfere, or to instruct the jury in reference thereto. In the absence of such objection at the time it cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court. People v. Beaver, 83 Cal. 420, 23 Pac. 321; People v. Frigerio, 107 Cal. 151, 40 Pac. 107; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842; People v. Owens, 132 Cal. 469, 64 Pac. 770; People v. Bishop, 134 Cal. 682, 66 Pac. 976. We have, however, examined the record herein, and are of the opinion that such objection would not be tenable as to the questioning of the witnesses, or that the remarks of the district attorney to the jury exceeded the limits of legitimate argument.

3. The objection that the offense named in the indictment and in the verdict that the defendant was "guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder" is not made a crime by the Penal Code, is without merit. An assault with intent to commit murder is made a crime by section 217 of that Code irrespective of the mode or means by which the assault is committed. By placing the words "with a deadly weapon" in the indictment the people were limited to proving that particular kind of an assault, and the defendant was informed of the particular character of the assault which he was to meet. The words may have been surplusage, but they did not vitiate the indictment or the verdict.

4. The defendant requested the following instruction: "Upon the question as to with what intention the defendant used the pistol in question, if at all, the court instructs the jury the intention must be established as a fact, and proof of the said intention to kill and murder the prosecuting witness must not only show to a moral certainty that such an intention was entertained by the defendant, but such was his intention at the time of using such pistol. (And it will be remembered by the jury that it is not sufficient to prove a general felonious intent or any other than the particular intent alleged in the information or included therein, and the burden of proving the alleged intent is on the prosecution)." The court modified the same by striking out the portion within the parenthesis, and gave it as so modified. In thus modifying the instruction as requested, the court did not err. There was no evidence before the jury tending to show "a general felonious intent" on the part of the defendant, and for this reason the court was justified in modifying the instruction as requested. The testimony that he had previously threatened to kill the prosecuting witness was introduced for the purpose of illustrating the intent with which he made the assault upon him on the 25th of September; and when it was offered the defendant's counsel stated that he "had no objection to any threat made against Mecartea." The other portions omitted from the instruction as requested were elsewhere given to the jury; and in that portion of this very instruction which was given, the court told the jury that the intention of the defendant to murder Mecartea must be established as a fact and "that such was his intention at the time of using the pistol"; and the jury were repeatedly instructed that the burden of proving every element of the crime was upon the prosecution.

Other instructions requested by the defendant, to the effect that the jury must find that at the time the defendant made the assault with the pistol upon the prosecuting witness, he intended to murder him were properly refused upon the ground that the jury had been fully instructed upon that point. There was no evidence before them from which they would have been authorized to find that the defendant used the pistol for the purpose of striking the prosecuting witness, and the court properly refused to permit them to consider the hypothetical result of such a blow.

5. The bill of exceptions contains certain affidavits setting forth proceedings had at the preliminary examination of the defendant, and also a charge to the grand jury at about the time of the trial (not, however, by the judge of the court before whom the trial was had); but as it is not shown that these facts were in any respect connected with the trial herein, or brought to the knowledge of any of the members of the jury by whom the defendant was convicted, they were not entitled to be considered in support of the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: HALL, J.; COOPER, J.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE OF SAN DIEGO v. SCHIRM et al.

1. EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACTS—VARIANCE BY PAROL—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

Parol evidence is admissible by the maker of an instrument who appears by its terms to be a principal to show that he is in fact a surety, except as against persons who have acted on the faith of his apparent character of principal, as provided by Civ. Code, § 2831.

2. EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

Where the vice president of a bank, who was also a director, acted as its agent in making certain loans to a government contractor by discounting certain notes, there was nothing in the relation of such officer to the bank inconsistent with his position as agent for the bank, and hence declarations and conversations between him and the contractor with reference to the application of certain payments on one of the notes was admissible as against the bank.

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — CONTRACT OF SURETYSHIP.

An instrument in the ordinary form of a negotiable note, except that it contained at the end thereof and before the signatures the added words: "Collateral for S. Bryan note. Note 58"—constituted a contract of suretyship as defined by Civ. Code, § 2831.

4. SAME—CO-SURETIES—SECURITIES—APPLICATION.

Where certain checks were assigned by a government contractor to P. as surety at least for P.'s own advances to the contractor, another surety of the contractor was entitled to the benefit of the securities held by P. to reduce such surety's liability as provided by Civ. Code, § 2849.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Action by the National Bank of Commerce of San Diego against J. S. Schirm and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Schirm appeals. Reversed.

Powers & Holland, for appellant. Hendricks, Wright & Schoonover, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal by the defendant Schirm from a judgment against the defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The suit was brought upon the instrument set out in the complaint, made by the defendants to the plaintiff, which is in the ordinary form of a negotiable promissory note, with exception that at the end thereof, and before the signatures, it is added: "Collateral for S. Bryan note. Note 58." The note of Bryan thus referred to, which was of even date, was for the same amount and in similar terms. Bryan, the maker of the note, was a contractor with the United States government for the erection of government buildings at Ft. Rosecrans in the county of San Diego under several contracts, and the defendants had become sureties on his bond to the government on the first contract, and perhaps on the other contracts. From the facts disclosed in the evidence, it is to be inferred that it was contemplated that advances of money should be received by Bryan from the plaintiff, either directly or as loans to Powers, for the purpose of paying the amounts to become due to employés and others in the prosecution of the work; and Bryan had, prior to the date of the transaction in question, made an assignment to Powers "of the monthly checks" to become due to him from the government, presumably to secure these amounts. Whether the assignment included also the check to be given on the completion of the work does not clearly appear from the evidence. But this check, which was for the sum of $14,860, was received by him. There was evidence tending to prove that in the transaction in question Powers, who was vice president and a director of the plaintiff, acted as its agent in the transaction involved, and that it was at the time understood and agreed that the government check given on the completion of the work was to be paid on the note referred to in the instrument sued upon; and also evidence—though not altogether satisfactory—that upon the payment of this amount to the bank Bryan directed it to be applied on this note. There was other evidence also offered to establish these points, which was excluded by the court. The $14,860 check was paid into the bank on June 14, 1904, at which time the bank held the following notes of Bryan: Two notes to Powers of date October 13, 1903, the one for $3,000 and the other for $6,000, indorsed by Powers February 11, 1904; the note of Bryan referred to in the instrument sued on for the sum of $15,000, of date April 12, 1904, and another note of the same date, indorsed or otherwise signed by the defendant Schirm, for the sum of $1,200; a note of $3,000 of date August 14, 1903, to Powers, indorsed by him February 11, 1904; a note of $1,200 to the bank of date June 6, 1904; and a note of $1,000 to the bank of date June 11, 1904. When the government check was paid to the bank the proceeds were applied by the cashier upon the above notes in the order stated, with exception of the $15,000 note and the last note for $1,200, and the notes themselves were marked as canceled and delivered up to Bryan. But after this had occurred, Powers, having come up and looked over the notes, told the cashier that he had canceled the wrong $1,200 note, and thereupon, at his suggestion, and, perhaps, with the concurrence of Bryan, the cancellation of the first of the $1,200 notes was obliterated and the later note for that amount marked canceled. At the close of the evidence, on motion of the plaintiff, "all of the testimony in relation to suretyship and agency and the paying of the money was stricken out, and the jury [instructed] not to consider it." The jury were then instructed, in effect, to return a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount specified in the instrument sued upon, with interest, less a credit appearing thereon; and, the verdict having been returned accordingly, the judgment was thereon entered for the plaintiff.

Upon the record thus presented we are of the opinion that all of the propositions involved in the instructions of the court, and in its rulings in striking out the evidence, are untenable. The ruling of the court on the question of suretyship was, in effect, that the instrument sued upon was in its terms a promissory note made by the defendants as principals, and that evidence was inadmissible to vary its effect. But under the provisions of our Code, and the decisions bearing thereon, it is the established law of this state that parol evidence is admissible by the maker of an instrument, who appears by its terms to be a principal, to show that he is in fact a surety, "except as against persons who have acted on the faith of his apparent character of principal." Civ. Code, § 2832; Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340; Farmers' Nat. Gold Bank v. Stover, 60 Cal. 387; Leeke v. Hancock, 76 Cal. 130, 17 Pac. 937; California Nat. Bank v. Ginty, 108 Cal. 150, 41 Pac. 38; Eppinger v. Kendrick, 114 Cal. 624, 46 Pac. 613. In the present case, it is not altogether clear that the so-called note, on its face, can be construed otherwise than as a contract of surety; but, whether this be the case or not, the evidence stricken out and other evidence was competent to establish that this was the case, and should have been admitted.

As to the question of agency, we see nothing in the relation of the defendant Powers to the bank inconsistent with his occupying, in relation to the appellant, the position of agent for the plaintiff; and it was therefore error to exclude testimony upon this point, or to strike out the testimony that had been admitted. The admitted testimony, indeed, tended strongly to support the appellant's contention, and declarations of the defendant Powers and conversations with him bearing upon this issue were therefore proper to be considered by the jury and should have been admitted. The evidence of Bryan's directions as to the application of the proceeds of the last government check was also competent, and should not have been stricken out. The evidence, so far as it related to the application of those proceeds exclusively to Bryan's $15,000 note, is not altogether satisfactory, but still it was admissible. Besides, the evidence shows, without contradiction, that part of the proceeds of the check in question were in fact applied by the cashier to the payment of the first of the $1,200 notes above specified, and that note canceled; and this fact was certainly admissible.

Finally, even after the exclusion of all the evidence upon the above points, the plaintiff was not entitled, as a matter of law, to a verdict in his favor, at least, for the full amount of the note. The instrument sued upon, as we have said, is, we are strongly inclined to think, in terms, a contract of suretyship as defined in the Code. Civ. Code, § 2831. It, indeed, purports in some of its terms to be an absolute and unconditional promise to pay the amount specified; but this language is qualified by the express terms of the note that it was given as "collateral" for the Bryan note of even date, which can be construed only as meaning that the promise was made as security for that note and was therefore conditional upon its nonpayment. It can hardly be doubted that this was the intention and understanding of the parties, or that the contract should be construed according to that intention. Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1642, 1648, 1650. The case in this respect is not to be regarded as the same as the case of notes of third parties assigned as collateral security; for here the instrument sued on is but a part of the one original transaction, which can hardly be construed otherwise than as we have construed it. Hence, assuming this to be the true construction, the appellant would be entitled to the benefit of these securities. Civ. Code, §§ 2849, 2819; 2 Parsons on Contracts, pp. 5, 6; Eppinger v. Kendrick, 114 Cal. 624, 46 Pac. 613. But, however this may be, it is at least certain from the facts in evidence that the checks assigned to Powers by Bryan were assigned to him as surety, at least for his own advances, and it follows as matter of law that the appellant was entitled to the benefit of the securities thus held by him. Civ. Code, § 2849. The proceeds of the last check of the government, therefore, should have been applied, either as contended for by the appellant, or to the Bryan note of April 12th and the notes previously given or to all the notes held by the bank pro rata; and it was inadmissible, under any view of the case, to exclude the two notes of April 12th—that is, the note for $15,000 constituting part of the transaction involved in the present suit, and the note for $1,200 of the same date—from the benefit of the payment.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

COLLINS v. GRAY.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 9, 1906. Rehearing Denied August 6, 1906.)

1. Easement—Finding—Effect.

In an action to restrain defendant from interfering with a pipe line located on defendant's land, or the water therein, a finding that plaintiff had an interest in the pipe line for the purpose of conveying sufficient water for irrigation, etc., in connection with a finding as to the extent of such interest, constituted a sufficient finding that plaintiff had an easement in the maintenance of the pipe line and owned the same to the extent claimed.

2. Trial—Findings—Definiteness.

Where, in a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with a pipe line located over his land, it was found that plaintiff had for more than five years exercised the right of carrying through such pipe line the water necessary for irrigating his land, and that the customary flow for such purpose was 40 inches of water, the finding was not fatally defective for failure to specify the particular standard of measurement, since the finding would be construed according to the customary water measurement of the locality.

3. Easements—Continuous Use.

In a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with a pipe line in which plaintiff claimed an easement, a finding that for more than five years plaintiff and others used the pipe line as often as required by them for irrigating purposes constituted a sufficient finding of continuous use.

4. SAME—SEVERAL RIGHT—PERMANENCY.

Where plaintiff for a period of more than five years had uninterruptedly with others used a pipe line laid over defendant's land under a claim of right, such use was sufficient to ripen into a permanent and several easement.

5. ACTIONS—COMMENCEMENT—FILING—COMPLAINT.

The commencement of an action dates from the filing of the original complaint, regardless of the filing of an amended complaint, which falls into the place of and performs the same functions as the original complaint; there being no change in the identity of the cause of action.

6. APPEAL—JUDGMENT—FINDINGS—PRESUMPTION.

Where, in an action to restrain defendant from interfering with plaintiff's alleged easement acquired by adverse user, nothing to the contrary appeared, it will be presumed in support of the findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff that the original complaint presented the same issues and claims of right as were presented by the amended complaint, and that the findings answered the questions put in the original complaint, and fixed the time of commencement of the adverse use relied on more than five years before the commencement of the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by A. P. Collins against C. R. Gray. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. R. Gray, in pro. per. Purington & Adair and W. A. Purington, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. In this action defendant was enjoined from interfering with the pipe line, or the water carried through the same, used by plaintiff in irrigation, from which judgment defendant appeals.

The second amended complaint, which is the only complaint in the record, avers: (1) Ownership by plaintiff as tenant in common of an undivided two-ninths of a certain described pipe line having an alleged capacity of 100 inches of water; (2) facts which, if true, establish an easement in such pipe line to the extent of carrying through the same 40 inches of water for four days of each month during the irrigating season, for use on plaintiff's land. The court found against plaintiff as to the ownership of a definite interest in the pipe line, but found that plaintiff and his grantors have used such pipe line openly, notoriously, peaceably, exclusively, uninterruptedly, under a claim of right and title thereto, and adversely to defendant and to the whole world, and with defendant's knowledge and acquiescence, for more than five years last past for conveying water to the plaintiff's said premises, sufficient to irrigate the same thoroughly and in a proper manner; that plaintiff and his grantors have used said pipe line exclusively, as often as required by them, for irrigating purposes; that defendant, while the owner of the land upon which such pipe line is constructed, permitted the same to be constructed over his said land; that, in consideration of the defendant's giving a right of way for such pipe line, the defendant was given the right to use said pipe line over his said lands; that since its construction defendant has used the same with plaintiff and others for conveying irrigating water therethrough, but with no other property or rights in said pipe line that the right to use the same to convey therethrough water for irrigating his premises, and for domestic use thereon. That the customary flow of water for plaintiff's premises so used upon plaintiff's lands is 40 inches of water for four days in each month during the irrigating season, and that for more than five years last past the customary flow of water upon said premises and through said pipe line on defendant's land has been 40 inches of water for four days of each month during the irrigating season. That such pipe line has been kept in repair by the users, and not by the defendant.

Appellant contends that the finding of adverse use is not the equivalent of a finding of ownership of an easement. There is, however, a finding that plaintiff has an interest in the pipe line for the purpose of conveying sufficient water for irrigation, etc. The extent of this interest is found. Reading the findings together, they are sufficient as finding an easement and the ownership thereof in plaintiff to the extent claimed. The finding of defendant's interest disposes of his contention that he is the absolute owner of the pipe line as a part of his real estate.

It is next contended that the findings are uncertain and indefinite, in that it nowhere appears that plaintiff has used the pipe line for carrying any specific quantity of water. It is found that plaintiff has for more than five years exercised the right of carrying through said pipe line the water necessary for irrigating his lands, and, further, that the customary flow for such purpose has been 40 inches of water for four days of each month during the irrigating season. But it is insisted that the finding of 40 inches is indefinite, in that the inch of water is not characterized as a "miner's inch," or any other particular standard of measurement. If we assume that the word "inch" would apply to either a miner's inch or some other standard of measurement with equal force, yet to the extent of the water actually used the right is established. That is certain which can be made certain; and if any particular kind of water measurement has been in use in that locality, such customary measurement would apply in a determination of the extent of plaintiff's ownership in the carrying capacity of the pipe line.

Appellant further contends that there is no finding of continuous use. There is a finding that for more than five years plaintiff and others used the same as often as required by them for irrigating purposes. This is a sufficient finding as to continuous use, having the character of use in view. Hesperia Land, etc., Co. v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 10, 23 Pac. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209. In addition, the court finds that for more than five years the use by plaintiff was uninterrupted, which of itself comprehends a continuous use to the extent required. The use of the pipe line under a claim of right by plaintiff, with others, would ripen into a permanent and several right to use, just as several parties can use and acquire rights in a public road. Abbott v. Pond, 142 Cal. 396, 76 Pac. 60.

It is finally insisted that the finding that plaintiff has used the pipe line adversely for more than five years is not the equivalent of a finding that such use was for five years preceding the commencement of the action. The case was heard upon a second amended complaint. An amended complaint falls into the place of the old complaint and performs the same functions. Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 501. The commencement of the action dates from the filing of the original complaint, and there is no change in the identity of the cause of action. Easton v. O'Reilly, 63 Cal. 308. The only purpose of the findings is to answer the questions put by the pleadings. Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 93, 44 Pac. 331. Nothing to the contrary appearing, it will be presumed in support of the findings and judgment that the original complaint presented the same issues and claims of right as the amended complaint, and that the findings answer the questions put in said original complaint and fix the time of the commencement of the adverse use more than five years before the commencement of the action. In this way only could the findings answer the questions presented by the complaint.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

DONDERO et al. v. O'HARA et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1906.)

1. Ejectment—Title to Support Action—Possession.

The rule that in ejectment plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's, is not applicable in an action based solely on the prior actual possession of plaintiff as against a mere trespasser, or one claiming only under a later possession.

2. Same — Pleading — Evidence Admissible Under Pleading.

In ejectment, evidence that defendant was in possession under a contract with plaintiff's grantor was an equitable defense, not admissible where not pleaded.

3. Same—Reception of Evidence—Right to Object—Waiver.

Where, in ejectment, a certain equitable defense was not pleaded, but two of defendant's witnesses testified to it without objection, there was no error in admitting other evidence thereof.

4. Waters and Water Courses—Contracts.

In ejectment to recover possession of a water ditch, evidence considered, and held insufficient to show that plaintiff's grantor had given defendants the right to use the ditch and water without any limit whatever as to time, place, or quantity, but to show an agreement that defendants might use the water for certain specified purposes.

5. Ejectment—Pleading — Answer—Admission of Ouster.

In ejectment, defendant's denial of plaintiff's title and right of possession is an admission of ouster by defendant.

6. Same—Plaintiff's Title—Occupancy.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1006, providing that occupancy for any period confers title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, accession, transfer, will, or succession, plaintiff in ejectment was entitled to recover by reason of his occupancy, as against defendants, showing no title through any of the sources excepted in the statute.

7. Same—Common Source of Title.

Where, in ejectment, the alleged possession of defendants was subsequent to that of plaintiffs, and both parties claimed through a common source, it was only necessary for plaintiff to show a better title through his common source.

8. Same—Findings—Sufficiency.

In ejectment, a finding that plaintiff was seised in fee and possessed of and entitled to the possession of the property supported a judgment for plaintiff, though the evidence did not justify a finding that plaintiff was seised in fee within the meaning of such an estate as defined by Civ. Code, § 762, as plaintiff's right to possession was sufficient.

9. Same—Pleading—Ouster.

In ejectment a cross-complaint alleging possession in defendants which is not denied by plaintiff is a sufficient proof of ouster.

10. Same—Evidence — Admissibility — Acts of Possession—Payment of Taxes.

In ejectment it was proper as showing possession to permit plaintiff to testify that he had paid taxes.

11. Appeal—Harmless Error — Evidence—Facts Otherwise Established.

Where the possession of a water ditch during a certain period was in issue in ejectment to recover possession of the same, testimony of one of plaintiffs that his partner in the construction and maintenance of the ditch had paid some taxes thereon during such time was harmless, where plaintiff had testified to payment of some of the taxes by him.

12. Ejectment — Evidence—Admissibility—Acts of Possession—Tax Assessment.

In ejectment as tending to show acts of possession on the part of plaintiff, it was proper to admit in evidence the assessment roll, showing that the property was assessed to plaintiff.

13. Evidence—Admissions—Partners.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 5, provides that, after proof of a partnership, the act or declaration of a partner within the scope of the partnership and during its existence may be given in evidence. Held, that in ejectment to recover possession of a water ditch claimed by defendants under succession from their father, a mining partnership between him and another having been shown, and the use of the water having been connected with the partnership business, it was proper to admit evidence that plaintiff's grantor, claimed by plaintiff to have constructed and maintained the ditch, gave defendants' father permission to use the ditch.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; R. C. Rust, Judge.

Action by Louis Dondero and another against John F. O'Hara and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff's and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. P. O'Brien and A. A. Smith, for appellants. F. W. Street, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Ejectment. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. The cause was tried by the Hon. R. C. Rust, judge of the superior court of Amador county, presiding at the trial by request of the judge of the superior court of Tuolumne county. We find printed in the brief of counsel for respondent the following opinion, filed in the case by the presiding judge, which seems to us to clearly present the grounds upon which the decision rests, and satisfactorily meets the principal points now made by appellants, namely, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings and that the decision is against law:

"This is an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiffs to recover the possession of a certain water ditch in the complaint fully described. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer denies that plaintiffs are the owners or entitled to the possession of the water ditch described in the complaint, and denies that defendants, without right or title, entered into the possession of said ditch, or ousted or ejected the plaintiffs therefrom, and denies that defendants now unlawfully withhold possession thereof from the plaintiffs. Defendants by way of cross-complaint allege that they are the owners of a certain water ditch, formerly known and called the 'Ophir Water Ditch and Flume,' and formerly known as and called 'Woods Ditch,' and sometimes called 'Smith's Ditch,' and particularly described in the cross-complaint, and allege that it is the same ditch described in plaintiffs' complaint; that plaintiffs claim to have some interest and estate in and to said water ditch and premises adverse to defendants; that the claims of plaintiffs, and each of them, of, in, and to said water ditch and property, is without any right whatsoever, and that said plaintiffs have not, and each of them has not, any estate, right, title, interest, or claim whatsoever of, in, or to said water ditch and property or any part thereof, and follow with the usual prayer for a decree quieting defendants' title thereto.

"The evidence at the trial showed without dispute that there had been a ditch, known as the 'Smith and Wood Ditch,' conveying water along about the same line as the ditch now claimed by the plaintiffs, but that it had been abandoned for a period of more than 20 years; that John Ferguson, the grantor of plaintiffs, constructed a new ditch from a point on the east side of the road leading from Sonora to Columbia that runs parallel with Wood's Creek, a distance of 200 or 300 feet, and constructed it across the said road before the ditch entered the lands of James O'Hara, Sr., the father of defendants; that John Ferguson obtained permission of said James O'Hara, Sr., to dig his ditch across the lands of said O'Hara, Sr., provided he made use of the old Smith and Woods ditch line as the site for the construction of the ditch; said John Ferguson constructed his ditch along this line, and on to the Dane gardens in the town of Sonora, where the water was used for irrigating and running a still; and that the ditch had been so used continuously each year ever since its construction, a period of more than 10 years. James O'Hara, Sr., one of the defendants, worked upon the construction of the ditch for said John Ferguson, and was paid by him for his work. James O'Hara, Sr., the owner of the land, was paid by John Ferguson for removing dirt excavated in digging the ditch from his land to the county road. Sometime after the ditch was constructed by John Ferguson, James O'Hara, Sr., obtained permission from John Ferguson to wash a dump at his incline tunnel with water from this ditch, and used the ditch for this purpose on two different occasions for a period of two or three months each. Afterwards James O'Hara, Jr., obtained permission from John Ferguson to convey water to his water wheel at the incline tunnel on his father's land and which he was operating under a lease from his father. During all of this time John Ferguson was conveying water through the ditch to the Dane garden and to other places in Sonora and selling it. Other parties also used water through this ditch without paying for it, but always after asking and receiving permission from John Ferguson and cleaning out and repairing the ditch for him. John Ferguson and his partner, Dondero, paid the taxes assessed against the ditch each year and exercised other acts of ownership over it. After this evidence was introduced on behalf of plaintiffs, defendants abandoned their cross-complaint and endeavored to show title in a third party, viz., their father James O'Hara, Sr., upon the principle of law that in actions of ejectment plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of that of his adversary.

"Plaintiffs contend that defendants cannot invoke this rule for the reason that plaintiffs are not relying upon a paper title, and that this rule only applies to those claiming under a paper title. I am of the opinion that this contention of plaintiffs is correct, for I find the rule to be that in an action of ejectment, brought solely on the prior actual possession of the plaintiff, the defendant being a trespasser, the latter cannot justify the act by showing title to be outstanding in a third person. Bird v. Lisbros, 9 Cal, 1, 70 Am. Dec. 617; Carleton v. Townsend, 28 Cal. 219–224; Niagara M. Co. v. Bunker Hill M. Co., 59 Cal. 612; Foot v. Murphy, 72 Cal. 104, 13 Pac. 163; Kitts v. Austin, 83 Cal. 167, 23 Pac. 290. The preponderance of the evidence clearly shows to my mind that defendants were using the ditch in controversy under the permission of plaintiffs' grantor, John Ferguson, and that when they asserted a right to the ditch as against plaintiffs, who were prior possessors, they became trespassers. Hutchinson v. Perley, 4 Cal. 34, 60 Am. Dec. 578; Hawxhurst v. Lander, 28 Cal. 331; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 77, 43 Pac. 408.

"Defendants endeavored to avoid the force of this rule by the introduction of evidence given by themselves and their father, James O'Hara, Sr., that John Ferguson obtained the right to construct the ditch on and across the lands of James O'Hara, Sr., on condition that he should have the right to use the ditch, and to run and use water through it, and that defendants, as tenants of James O'Hara, Sr., had permission from him to use the ditch. Plaintiffs objected to this testimony on the ground that this was an equitable defense and that defendants had not pleaded it, and therefore could not avail themselves of it, and in support of the objection cite the following cases: Cadiz v. Majors, 33 Cal. 288; McCauley v. Fulton, 44 Cal. 362; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 18, 27 Pac. 942, 49 Am. Rep. 679; Arguello v. Bours, 67 Cal. 450, 8 Pac. 49. These cases, in my judgment, support the objection, but as two of defendants' witnesses had testified to that effect without objection I permitted the others to testify and overruled the objection. James O'Hara, Sr., thereupon testified to a conversation he had with John Ferguson in the presence of his two sons, the defendants in this action, at the time the ditch was dug that John Ferguson should have permission to dig his ditch over the land of said James O'Hara, Sr., and that said James O'Hara, Sr., should use the ditch and water without any limit whatever, as to time or place or quantity. His sons, the defendants in this action, also testified to this conversation. John Ferguson is dead, and I am deprived of the benefit of his version of this conversation, and therefore must look to the surrounding circumstances, and to the reasonableness of the agreement as testified to by the defendants and their father. Defendants upon cross-examination testified there was no water for stock on their father's land until John Ferguson dug this ditch; that no claim was ever made by defendants' father to the ditch until the trial of this action. Defendants themselves never mentioned to any one that they claimed any rights in the ditch until the trial, except that they testified on cross-examination that they informed their counsel of their claim when they first employed him. But the fact that this equitable defense was not pleaded would lead me to believe they are mistaken in this particular. It was generally known as "John Ferguson's ditch," and every one that used it first obtained permission from John Ferguson. The defendants' leases from their father do not mention the ditch or water, but refer entirely to the mine. And one of the parties to the lease, A. R. Elsbury, testified that his brother, one of the lessees of the mine before him, told him that he had obtained permission from John Ferguson to use the ditch to convey water to the wheel.

"As to the reasonableness of the agreement or understanding at the time of the conversation testified to by the O'Haras between their father and John Ferguson, it seems to me to be extremely unreasonable to suppose that John Ferguson would employ men and spend money in the construction of a ditch to convey water to Dane garden and vicinity of Sonora for the purposes of irrigation and for sale and then enter into such an agreement as that testified to by defendants and their father that practically gave Ferguson no water at all, and the O'Haras the right to use all the water the ditch would carry at any point, and for any purpose and at any time. All these circumstances convince me that the O'Haras' recollection of this agreement or conversation that occurred so long ago is faulty and that the only reasonable interpretation of it is that O'Hara, Sr., should use the water for his stock and on the occasions mentioned for washing his dump, and that the defendants and Elsbury had permission to use it for the wheel, and that the evidence produced by the defendants would not substantiate this defense if they have the right to be heard upon it. Defendants' denial of plaintiffs' title and right of possession is an admission of the ouster of plaintiffs by them. Busenius v. Coffee, 14 Cal. 91–93; Woodworth v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 164; Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 595.

"Plaintiffs' grantor constructed the ditch and he and his successors in interest have been in the occupancy and possession thereof ever since until the ouster by defendants last year, and such possession and occupancy ripened into a perfect title and entitles them to a decree of this court as prayed for in the complaint. Civil Code, §§ 1006, 1007."

Plaintiffs' claim, as against defendants', need not rest upon a right of prescription nor upon paper title. They may and do claim by occupancy. The possession under which they claim was taken for the purpose of constructing a ditch and was taken by leave of the owners of the land over which the ditch ran, including O'Hara, Sr. "Occupancy for any period confers a title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, accession, transfer, will or succession" (Civ. Code, § 1006); and defendants claimed by neither of these latter sources of title. Their evidence of an agreement with the builders of the ditch, by which it was claimed they had the right to the use of the water, was not accepted by the court as satisfactory. Defendants denied ownership or right of possession of plaintiffs, or either of them; denied that they "without right or title, entered into possession of said ditch or ousted or ejected the plaintiffs therefrom; and they deny that the defendants now unlawfully withhold possession thereof from the plaintiffs." The cross-complaint of defendants averred that they were the "owners of and in the possession of and entitled to the possession" of the ditch in question. The pleadings are verified. The alleged possession of defendants was subsequent to that of plaintiffs, and the possession under which they claim was through O'Hara, Sr., a source common to both plaintiffs and defendants. It was only necessary for plaintiffs to show a better title through this common source than defendant was able to show through the same source. Am. & Eng. Ency. vol. X, p. 491, citing Spect v. Gregg, 51 Cal. 198; Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 11 Pac. 820. Plaintiffs were called upon to prove only that they were entitled to possession, and this was sufficient, unless defendants showed a prior possession or title which they failed to do. The court found that plaintiffs "were seised in fee and possessed of and entitled to the possession of all that certain water ditch," etc., and it is claimed that there is no evidence to sustain this finding. It was only necessary for the court to find possession, or right of possession, and this would support the judgment, even though it be conceded that the evidence did not justify the finding that plaintiffs were "seised in fee" within the full meaning of an estate in fee defined by section 762 of the Civil Code. The answer admits the ouster by its form of denials. It denies only that defendants "without right or title" entered into possession. It also puts in issue plaintiffs' title and right of possession, and their cross-complaint avers possession in defendants which is not denied by plaintiffs, and this has been held sufficient proof of ouster. Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 595.

Appellants cite numerous cases to the point that at the trial the defendant could defeat the action by showing title or right of possession in some third person. This is the rule ordinarily, but is not the rule where plaintiff claims under a prior actual peaceable possession as against a mere trespasser on the land or one claiming only under a later possession. See cases arising in this and other states, cited in Am. & Eng. Ency. vol. X, pp. 486, 487.

Certain assignments of errors in the admission of evidence remain to be noticed. A certain agreement was offered in evidence and admitted between John Ferguson, Rosalie (his wife), John P. Dart, and M. B. Harmin, first parties, and Louis Dondero, second party, concerning certain water rights to the water of Woods creek and thereabouts and certain ditches leading in part along the course of the ditch in question. The objection of defendants was that John Ferguson has not been shown to be the owner of any ditch in controversy, and that the agreement refers to the Jaynes Blue ditch, which is not in controversy. As near as we can discover from the evidence, the Jaynes Blue ditch was at the upper end of the ditch in question and above the O'Hara land. It seems to have been a part of the old system for taking water from Woods creek. This agreement was made in connection with the construction of the ditch in question, and in some degree was intended to fix the rights of the parties to the water conveyed through it. One of the parties claimed the Jaynes ditch and was to convey it in consideration of the construction of the ditch in question. It seems to us that the evidence was admissible, and if not it was harmless. The assessment roll, showing that the ditch was assessed to Ferguson and Dondero, was admitted; and also the testimony of Dondero that the taxes were paid by either himself or Ferguson—sometimes one and sometimes the other. The objection was that the witness "could not positively testify whether Mr. Ferguson paid them except by hearsay." Dondero testified: "Sometimes I would pay the taxes and sometimes Mr. Ferguson would pay the taxes. I don't know who paid them. I don't know whether he paid them; but sometimes I paid them, and sometimes he paid them, and then we would come to a settlement afterwards." There was no objection that the receipts were the best evidence, and should have been produced or their loss explained. Dondero testified that he paid the tax sometimes, and the objection to this testimony was properly overruled. As to taxes paid by Ferguson, he testified that he did not know except through settlements with him. As tending to show acts of possession the assessment roll and payment of taxes by Dondero were admissible and what Dondero testified as to Ferguson was harmless. Carl Ferguson was permitted to testify against objection of defendants that his father gave permission to defendant James O'Hara to use the ditch. The permission was given to Eugene Elsbury, who was the mining partner of O'Hara in the O'Hara mine, where the water was used. The objection was that it must be shown that the permission was communicated to O'Hara, otherwise it would be inadmissible. The partnership being shown, and the use of water being connected with the partnership business, the evidence was admissible under subdivision 5, § 1870, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under the same section of the Code the testimony of A. E. Elsbury was admissible.

GRAHAM v. REDLANDS HEIGHTS WATER CO. et al.

LICENSES—OPERATION—SCOPE.

Under a license to enter on plaintiff's land to contruct a pipe line of a specified capacity of good substantial material and workmanship for the conveyance of water to the licensees' premises, the latter were not entitled to enter on the land to construct a pipe line which was substantially defective in character and likely to be productive of unnecessary damage to plaintiff.

Action by Jonathan Graham against the Redlands Heights Water Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Halsey W. Allen, for appellants. E. C. Campbell, H. B. Ely, and Walter M. Campbell, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The suit was brought against the corporation defendant and defendant Ruggles and wife for trespass on plaintiff's land, and an injunction. The case was tried on the answer of the defendant corporation only, and judgment entered against it. The appeal is by the defendant corporation from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The alleged trespass consisted in the entry of the defendant by its agents on the land of the plaintiff for the purpose of digging a ditch for a pipe line, specifically described in the complaint, from the main pipe line of the defendant corporation to the land of the defendants Ruggles; and by the judgment the defendant corporation is perpetually enjoined from entering on the plaintiff's premises for the purpose of excavating the ditch or trench thus specifically described, and from laying therein the proposed pipe line as set forth in the complaint, "and from laying any new or additional pipe line therein." The trespass complained of was actually committed by the defendant Ruggles. But it appears that Mr. Ruggles was a director and secretary of the defendant corporation, and that he acted under a resolution of its board of directors, of date August 9, 1901, referred to below; and it was claimed by the plaintiff that, in entering upon the plaintiff's land and upon the construction of the ditch complained of, he acted as the agent of the appellant-defendant. This is denied by the defendant; but the finding of the court on this issue is in his favor and we cannot say that it is not justified by the evidence.

The defendant corporation justifies the trespass under deeds of conveyance of plaintiff's predecessor in title, claimed to give it a right of way for its pipes over the plaintiff's land; and to the construction and effect of these deeds, much of the findings and argument of the counsel are addressed. But from the defendant's answer and the evidence it appears that the acts of the defendants Ruggles in entering upon plaintiff's land and commencing the construction of the proposed pipe line was under a mere license of the appellant to them to construct a pipe line of the capacity specified, "of good substantial material and workmanship," at their own expense and for their own use, "for the conveyance of domestic water to their premises; said pipe line to be constructed and, so far as the conveyance of water is concerned, * * * to be owned by said A. B. and S. S. Ruggles," etc. But assuming, for the purposes of the decision only, that the defendant's rights under the deeds in question are as claimed, we do not think that such a license can be regarded as a legitimate exercise of the rights of the appellant-defendant under its deeds, or as coming within their provisions; and still less can it be regarded as justifying a pipe of the description of the pipe in question, which, it is found by the court, is of a substantially defective character and likely to be productive of unnecessary damage to the plaintiff.

The justification pleaded, therefore, fails in this respect, and the findings of the court must be regarded as sufficient to sustain the judgment of the court, which goes no further than to enjoin the appellant-defendant from excavating the ditch specifically described in the complaint, and from laying the pipe line so specifically described, or "any new or additional pipe line therein." This disposes of all the matters in issue in the case and leaves undetermined the construction of the deeds set up in the defendant's answer and any claims it may have to a right of way over lands of the plaintiff or others claimed thereunder.

The order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

STEVENSON et al. v. WOODWARD et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 22, 1906.)

1. Mechanic's Liens—Action to Enforce—Questions for Jury.

In an action to enforce on a building a mechanic's lien for work done for a tenant, the question whether the materials had been so affixed to the building as to become a part thereof, was a question of fact.

2. Appeal—Review—Findings by Court.

The finding by the trial court as to a fact decided on the weight of the evidence will not be reviewed.

3. Same—Evidence—Admissibility.

In an action to enforce on a warehouse a mechanic's lien for constructing an iceroom therein for a tenant, it was proper to admit evidence as to cutting a door through the wall of the building into the iceroom, though the work connected therewith was not contained in the claim of lien, as it was competent as tending to show the character of the room in relation to its permanancy and the apparent intent of the owner of the property in relation to its future use.

4. Same—Improvement by Tenant—Lien on Leased Building.

Where an improvement of a building is made under a contract with a tenant thereof in such manner as to affix the improvement to the real estate, and the laborer has no information that it will be regarded otherwise than as suggested by the manner of construction, a right of lien will attach to the real estate, which cannot be defeated by another agreement between the owner and tenant that the improvement may thereafter be demolished by the tenant at the expiration of the lease, or any other time.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by O. M. Stevenson and others against I. C. Woodward and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant Albert Casner appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Bledsoe, for appellant. Hight & Hight, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs. Appeal by defendant Casner from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

Appellant Casner was the owner of a warehouse in San Bernardino. He leased floor space therein to one Woodward, then engaged in the ice business, and Woodward employed plaintiffs to construct an iceroom 10 by 16 by 8 feet in dimensions in said space so leased, with the knowledge and consent of Casner. Plaintiffs furnished materials and did the work in the construction of such iceroom, and regularly filed their notice of lien. No notice was posted by the owner to the effect that he would not be responsible for the work done or materials furnished in the construction of such iceroom. The court finds that said iceroom was built in said warehouse as a part thereof, and was securely attached to said warehouse so that the same could not be removed without injury thereto, nor without injury to such warehouse, and that said iceroom is a part of said warehouse.

It is claimed by appellant that such iceroom is but a trade fixture and as such was the personal property of the lessee, and no lien could be acquired against the real property of the appellant by reason of its construction. "Whether the materials furnished by the appellant were so affixed to the building as to become a part thereof was a question of fact to be determined by the court upon the evidence before it." Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 28, 56 Pac. 610. There is ample evidence in the record to support the finding of the court that such iceroom was a part of the building, and the uncontradicted evidence was that the ice box as constructed could not be removed from the building without tearing it to pieces. "The finding of a court as to a fact decided upon the weight of evidence will not be reviewed." Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 206, 30 Pac. 208.

There was no error in receiving testimony as to cutting a door through the wall of the building into the ice house, notwithstanding the work and labor connected therewith was omitted from the claim of lien. This was competent as tending to show the character of the iceroom in relation to its permanency, and the apparent intent of the owner of the property in relation to its future use. The character of the improvement controls when the rights of a lien claimant are involved, and where an improvement is constructed in such manner as to affix it to the real property, and the laborer has no information that it will be regarded otherwise than as suggested by the manner of construction, he may well assume that he is making an improvement upon real property, and that a right of lien may attach, and this right will not be defeated by any secret agreement between the owner and lessee that the improvement may thereafter be demolished by the lessee at the expiration of the lease or at any other time. That the iceroom became a part of the warehouse building removes any question as to the right to maintain a lien upon an iceroom as distinguished from other structures covered by the mechanic's lien law.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

YOUD et al. v. GERMAN SAVINGS & LOAN SOCIETY.

1. MORTGAGES—REDEMPTION—TENDER—SUFFICIENCY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 701, provides that real estate sold under execution may be redeemed by any creditor having a mortgage or judgment lien subsequent to that on which the property was sold, such person being known as a redemptioner, and section 703 provides that if property be redeemed by a redemptioner, another redemptioner may redeem from him. Land was sold under mortgage foreclosure by the first mortgagee and purchased by him. Thereafter the second mortgagee redeemed and the certificate of redemption was assigned to the first mortgagee, and subsequently the land was sold at judicial sale under proceedings instituted by creditors against whom the mortgages were valid. Subsequently the purchaser at such sale demanded a deed of the commissioner in the foreclosure suit. The purchaser had with him blank checks which he intended to draw if the commissioner accepted his offer, which, was to pay the amount which the first mortgagee had paid with interest at the mortgage rate. The offer did not include anything for taxes, costs, or amount due the second mortgagee as a prior redemptioner. The purchaser did not offer to pay any specified sum or draw any checks. Held that there was no sufficient tender.

2. APPEAL — PRESUMPTIONS — EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT FINDINGS.

The evidence must be construed on appeal in the light most favorable to the findings and judgment of the trial court.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—WHO MAY ASSERT—SUBSEQUENT CREDITORS—INVALIDITY.

Where land was sold at judicial sale subject to a mortgage lien acquired before the creditor instituting the proceedings had any interest in the property, he could not attack the lien on the ground that the mortgage was invalid as to the mortgagor's creditors.

4. JUDICIAL SALE—TITLE AND RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—PRIOR MORTGAGES—REDEMPTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 700, declares that on a sale of real estate under execution, the purchaser acquires all right and title of the judgment debtor. Held, that where a second mortgagee redeemed from a foreclosure of the first mortgage and subsequently the land was sold at judicial sale under proceedings instituted by creditors as against whom the mortgages were valid, though the second mortgagee was not a qualified redemptioner, the title did not vest in the purchaser at such judicial sale, since if no redemption was effected the title remained in the first mortgagee, and otherwise, passed to the second.

5. CORPORATIONS — ULTRA VIRES ACTS — PERSONS ENTITLED TO QUESTION VALIDITY.

Const. art. 12, § 9, provides that no corporation shall engage in any business other than that expressly authorized in its charter, and Civ. Code, § 574, enumerates the property which may be owned by a savings and loan company. After a second mortgagee redeemed from foreclosure of the first mortgage, he assigned the certificate of redemption to the first mortgagee, a savings and loan company, which had purchased at the mortgage sale, and subsequently the land was sold to plaintiff at judicial sale under proceedings instituted by creditors as against whom the mortgages were valid. Held, that conceding that the assignment of the certificate was violative of the Constitution and statute, such fact was of no avail to plaintiff as an extinguishment of the first mortgage lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Jos. H. Budd, Judge.

Action by William Youd and another against the German Savings & Loan Society. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order dening a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Knox, for appellants. W. S. Goodfellow and T. C. Law, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Action to quiet title. The court found against the plaintiffs on the vital issue and the sufficiency of the evidence to support such finding is challenged of the appellants. All the parties to the action claim title under A. E. & Thomas Upton who purchased the land from one Martin in 1881. The said owners mortgaged the land to respondent, and as a result of an action to foreclose such mortgage, the property was sold to respondent by a commissioner on July 10, 1897, for the sum of $30,475, and a certificate of sale in due form was thereupon issued to the said purchaser. On December 18, 1897, T. C. Law, who held a mortgage on an undivided one-half of said land, executed and delivered to him by A. E. Upton on February 15, 1896, served a notice of redemption in proper form on the commissioner who made the sale under foreclosure, and at the same time paid to said commissioner the amount for which the land was sold, with two per cent. per month thereon, and thereupon a certificate of redemption in due form was issued to him. After receiving such certificate, Law assigned the same to W. S. Goodfellow, who was the attorney for respondent in the foreclosure suit, and the latter thereafter assigned it to respondent. On February 18, 1898, the commissioner executed and delivered a deed to respondent, who claims title thereunder. In January, 1890, Thomas Upton commenced an action to dissolve the partnership then existing between the owners of said realty. This action finally resulted in an agreement of compromise, containing the terms of a judgment which was duly entered on March 5, 1896. In such judgment it was decreed that the realty was purchased as partnership property, for use in the partnership business, but that the legal title thereto was conveyed to Thomas and A. E. Upton, as equal tenants in common thereof. This recital as to the title was followed by a paragraph wherein it was distinctly and positively adjudged that A. E. Upton was the owner of an undivided one-half of said realty, and that the estate of Thomas Upton, then deceased, owned the other undivided one-half. After decreeing that neither of the parties to said litigation had any claim against the other, A. E. Upton, who had possession of the real and personal property owned by said partnership, was directed to deliver such property to a receiver in the suit to dissolve the partnership and for an accounting. Meantime several attachments issued in suits against A. E. Upton, individually, and as surviving partner of the firm of A. E. & Thomas Upton, had been levied upon the property, and A. E. Upton on March 13, 1896, was compelled to file his petition and schedule in insolvency. On October 9, 1897, the assignee in the insolvency proceedings and some of the creditors filed a petition in the action to dissolve the partnership, praying that said Deane, as receiver, be directed to sell "the equity of redemption belonging to said partnership of T. & A. E. Upton and to the estate of said A. E. Upton, an insolvent, in and to the land in controversy, subject to the mortgage lien of the German Savings and Loan Society."

Such order was duly made, and on December 18, 1897, the court confirmed the sale of the portion of the lands sold under foreclosure involved in this action, made by said receiver to appellants, reciting in said order of confirmation that the sale conferred upon appellants the right to redeem said land from the previous sale thereof to respondents in the foreclosure suit. On January 10, 1890, appellants served a written notice on the commissioner who had made the foreclosure sale, reciting their rights acquired by purchase from the receiver, and notifying him that the lien held by respondents had been fully paid and discharged; that Law was not a qualified redemptioner, and had no right to make such redemption. The notice concluded with a formal demand that he, as commissioner in the foreclosure suit, execute and deliver to them "a commissioner's deed to said land." No offer to pay any sum of money or tender of any kind was made when this notice was served, and no other notice or paper of any kind was served upon or delivered to the commissioner at that or any other time. Appellants visited the commissioner at a later hour on the same day, and the circumstances under which such visit was made, as well as the substance of the inquiry, or offer then made, are gleaned from the testimony of appellants, construed, as it must be, in the light most favorable to the finding and judgment of the trial court. It appears that they had not made any estimate or calculation of the amount of principal or interest due, or necessary to effect a redemption of the parcel of land claimed by them, which was but a small part of the lands sold to the respondent at the foreclosure sale. They then had with them about $500 in cash, but had a check book containing blank checks which they intended to fill out and sign if the commissioner consented to accept the offer they made. Under these circumstances they offered to pay the amount which respondent paid for this particular part of the land at the foreclosure sale, with interest on said sum at the regular rate paid by the Uptons to respondent; that is to say at the rate mentioned in the mortgage, if the commissioner would execute a commissioner's deed conveying that particular parcel of land to them. This offer did not include anything for taxes, costs, or the amount due Law as a prior redemptioner, and it clearly appears that they did not intend to pay any money whatever unless they obtained the commissioner's deed, and that they neither paid nor offered to pay any specific amount of money, and never filled out or signed any checks. The commissioner refused to execute and deliver a deed on the terms stated, but offered to accept the money and issue a receipt therefor. The appellants, however, declined to pay any money unless they received the commissioner's deed, and there the matter ended. That there was no sufficient tender was apparent, but if the mere offer or inquiry made be treated as a formal tender by one entitled to redeem, it is clear that such tender did not conform to the requirements of the law. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 701–703.

It is argued that as Law was not a qualified redemptioner, and hence acquired no rights by virtue of his redemption, his payment to the commissioner was a satisfaction of respondents' claim, which was thereby extinguished, leaving the title without cloud or flaw in appellants who then held the equity of redemption. Beamer v. Freeman, 84 Cal. 554, 24 Pac. 169, is cited in support of the proposition that Law was not a qualified redemptioner, but we fail to see how any rule there announced can be applied here. His mortgage interest was acquired long before appellants had any claim to or interest in the property, and was therefore perfectly valid as to them. Such being the case, they are not concerned with, nor can this court pass upon, the rights of creditors not parties to this action who may perchance be in a position to assert that the mortgage was invalid. But taking the view most favorable to appellant, and conceding that the redemption by Law was utterly abortive, we are at a loss to understand how it could be impotent as to him, but potent to destroy the rights respondent acquired by virtue of its purchase at the foreclosure sale. If the certificate of redemption was void as to Law, it certainly was void in toto. It is well settled that a purchaser of real property at an execution sale acquires the legal title thereto, and equally well settled that such title can only be divested by a valid redemption. Code Civ. Proc. § 700; Pollard v. Harlow, 138 Cal. 393, 71 Pac. 454, 648; Thresher v. Atchison, 117 Cal. 75, 48 Pac. 1020, 59 Am. St. Rep. 159. Hence, if no redemption was effected, the title remained in respondent, and if Law's redemption was effectual, the title passed to him. Viewed in any light or from any standpoint, it certainly did not vest in appellants who neither redeemed nor made a valid offer to do so. It is next contended that the assignment of the certificate of redemption by Goodfellow to respondent was void under section 574 of the Civil Code and section 9 and article 12 of the Constitution. Conceding without deciding that this contention is sound, the appellants can derive neither comfort nor title from the invalidity of an assignment to which they were strangers. Appellants have neither paid nor offered to pay the amount necessary to effect a redemption of this property to respondent or anyone else, and we know of no law which makes them the beneficiaries if the certificate was improvidently issued or improperly assigned. It nowhere appears that the respondent ever received the money paid by Law to the commissioner, and under the circumstances we can hardly indulge in any presumptions or inferences on this point. It is the duty of an appellant to show error affirmatively, and for aught that appears in this record the respondent may have repudiated the redemption and refused to accept the redemption money from the commissioner. If such was the case, the validity or invalidity of the assignment to respondent would be of no moment, and if any intendment or presumption is to be indulged, it must aid the conclusion of the trial court.

Respondent makes the point that the receiver in the proceeding to dissolve the partnership had no power to sell the equity of redemption or any other interest in this land, but we deem it unnecessary to pass upon the question thus presented.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1906.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Jos. H. Budd, Judge.

Action by E. T. Givens against the German Savings & Loan Society. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McLAUGHLIN, J. The facts in this case are almost identical with the facts in Youd v. German Savings & Loan Society (this day decided) 86 Pac. 991. The only difference between the two cases is that the appellants here purchased the equity of redemption in and to a separate part or parcel of the land sold under foreclosure, and failed to make any offer to redeem from the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, or from Law as redemptioner.

On the authority of the case above mentioned, the judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN PEDRO LUMBER CO. v. WEST et al.

1. Mechanics' Liens—Action to Enforce—Issues and Proof.

In an action to enforce a materialman's lien, the lien declared on and filed stated that the contract was that plaintiff should furnish all materials to be used in the building, the same to be paid for at market rates, and it appeared from the evidence that plaintiff, after receiving the list of the materials required by the contractor, figured up, before delivery, the value of the order at current market rates and agreed to furnish the materials for such sum. Held, that the mere fact that the aggregate market value was so ascertained did not show a contract other than that relied on.

2. Same—Performance of Contract—Evidence.

Where a materialman, in an action to enforce a lien, relied on a contract to furnish all materials at current rates, and the notice of lien showed a delivery of certain materials, but neither the contract nor the notice of lien purported to state the aggregate of all materials necessary, evidence that the contractor had purchased some materials of another materialman did not show that plaintiff had not carried out his contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by the San Pedro Lumber Company against J. D. West and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant West appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Daly, for appellant. A. C. Lawson, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Judgment foreclosing lien of materialmen. Appeal by defendant West from the judgment and order denying a new trial. It appears that defendant Thurlow contracted to construct a building for appellant West for a sum in excess of $1,000. That plaintiff corporation agreed with Thurlow to furnish all materials to be used in such construction; the same to be paid for at the market value and at a date not later than the completion of such building. It may be inferred that Thurlow agreed to buy all of such materials from plaintiff. That under this contract plaintiff furnished for use, and there was used in such construction, lumber of the value of $873.25, less $25 worth of lumber not used in the construction of the building, upon which payments to the amount of $470 were made, leaving unpaid at the date of the filing of the lien $378.25. That the lien was regularly filed within the time required by law. Judgment was rendered against the contractor for the full amount unpaid, and a lien to the extent of $378.25 was declared against appellant's property, together with attorney's fee and costs of recording lien; and the lien was foreclosed and appellant's property ordered to be sold in default of payment.

Appellant's chief contention is that the lien declared upon and filed did not contain a true statement of the actual contract, and that the findings of the court that the contract was as set out in the lien has no support in the evidence. We think that there is nothing in this contention. It appears from the evidence that plaintiff, after receiving a list of the materials required by the contractor at that time, figured up the value of such order at current market rates, which was a certain list price less certain deductions, and the aggregate amounted to $873.25, for which sum plaintiff agreed to furnish such materials so ordered and comprehended within the bill. The mere fact that the aggregate market value was ascertained before delivery did not change the nature of the contract as established by the evidence. The price agreed to be paid was the current market value of the materials.

It is contended further that the record shows that certain other dressed and planed lumber was purchased by the contractor from one Stephens, and by Stephens furnished and by the contractor used in the construction of said building; and a lien was filed therefor, which was assigned by Stephens to the plaintiff and relief asked on account thereof in the complaint; and that by reason thereof it affirmatively appears that plaintiff never carried out its contract. This cannot be maintained. The notice of lien stated that the plaintiff was, by its agreement, to furnish all the materials at current rates, and it delivered certain materials. Neither the contract nor the notice of lien purported to state the aggregate of all materials necessary to complete the structure. It may be true, and the record discloses, that the contractor, after making his contract with the plaintiff and ordering and receiving part of the lumber, in violation of such contract purchased part of the material elsewhere. This being true in no wise renders the statement as to the contract, either in the complaint or notice of lien, untrue. The only thing it demonstrates is that the contractor did not avail himself of the contract with plaintiff, but this did not prevent the plaintiff from filing a lien based upon the contract for such materials as it actually furnished thereunder. It may be observed that no lien was given for the materials furnished by Stephens. Why this is so is not made to appear in the record, but appellant cannot complain that his property is relieved from a burden which might have been, but was not, imposed upon it. The statement in the notice of lien that plaintiff furnished materials for the contractor, that they were used in the construction of a building belonging to appellant, and the other statements showing that they were furnished so to be used, with the other statements contained in the notice of lien, were sufficient notice of lien and to entitle the plaintiff to its relief.

The motion for nonsuit was properly denied, and we see no error prejudicial to appellant in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LEWIS et al. v. LEWIS et al.

1. POWER—EXECUTION.

A deed executed while Civ. Code, §§ 905, 909, 918–922, vesting in the holder of a power an estate in fee simple in favor of creditors, purchasers, etc., was in force, reserved to the grantor for his benefit the power to sell the land conveyed. The grantor subsequently conveyed the same to a third person. Held, that a reconveyance by the third person was immaterial on the issue of the rights of the original grantee.

2. SAME.

Civ. Code, § 922, provides that every power of disposition is deemed absolute by means of which the holder is enabled to dispose of the fee in possession for his own benefit. Section 1069 provides that a reservation in a grant shall be interpreted in favor of the grantee. A deed reserved to the grantor the power to "grant, bargain and sell to any person, for such price and on such terms" as to him seemed advisable. Held, that the reserved power, literally construed, gave to the grantor the right to convey the premises, if he deemed a conveyance beneficial to him or his estate.

3. SAME.

A deed executed while Civ. Code, §§ 905, 909, 918–922, vesting in the holder of a power an estate in fee simple, etc., was in force, reserved to the grantor the power to sell as to him seemed advisable. He conveyed to a third person for the express consideration of $100, which sum was inadequate, as compared with the actual value of the premises, but such sum might not have been the only benefit received. Held, that the court could not say that the conveyance was not for the benefit of the grantor, and not a proper exercise of the power.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by William Leachman Lewis and others against Dozier Lewis, administrator of Henry Lewis, deceased, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court August 8, 1906; BEATTY, C. J., and SLOSS and ANGELLOTTI, JJ., dissenting.

Thomas O. Toland, E. W. Squier and John J. Squier, for appellants. B. F. Thomas, Richards & Carrier, and Cushing, Grant & Cushing, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The suit is to quiet title to the land described in the complaint. The judgment was for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal therefrom and from an order denying their motion for new trial.

The plaintiffs deraign title under a deed of date November 1, 1873, wherein their father, the deceased Henry Lewis, is party of the first part and they are parties of the second part. This deed purports to be in consideration of natural love and affection and to grant to the parties of the second part the property in question. But the granting part of the deed and description of the land is followed by certain reservations, which, so far as material, are as follows: "I, Henry Lewis, the above named grantor, do hereby reserve to myself, and for my own benefit, the power, during my natural life, to reside upon, occupy, improve, and cultivate, the real property above granted, and to apply the profits derived therefrom to my own use. And I do hereby reserve to myself, for my own benefit, the power, at any time during my natural life, to make and execute, according to my pleasure, such mortgage or mortgages upon said property, or any part thereof, as I may think necessary to secure the payment of any sum or sums of money, to any person whatever. And I do hereby reserve to myself, for my own benefit, the power, at any time during my natural life, to grant, bargain and sell all of said property, or any part thereof, to any person, for such price, and on such terms as to me shall seem advisable and to make, execute and deliver good and sufficient deeds for the same, and to apply the proceeds of such sales to my own use. This reserved power is to be construed as reserving to myself the power to sell said property, or any part thereof, at any time although I may have previously (under this power) leased or mortgaged, or both leased and mortgaged the same," etc.

The defendants claim under the will of the deceased, which devises to the defendant Rebecca Lewis a life estate in the lands in question, with remainder to certain of the other defendants and of the plaintiffs; and it is found that Henry Lewis, deceased, at the time of his death was the owner in fee simple of the land in question. This finding is based upon a deed of the deceased in his lifetime, of date October 2, 1879, to one Newell and a reconveyance from Newell of the same date to himself; both deeds purporting to be in consideration of the sum of $100, and both being recorded on the day of their execution—the former at 2 o'clock p. m., and the latter at five minutes past 2. The deed from Lewis to Newell appears from its recitals to have been made in pursuance of the power "to grant, bargain and sell" contained in the deed of the former to his children; and the question is whether it was a due execution of this power. The deed was executed during the period in which the title on powers of the Civil Code was in force. The effect of the deed is therefore to be determined by the provisions of that title; and we are of the opinion that, under the provisions of sections 905, 920, and 922, the effect of the deed was to reserve and leave vested in the grantor an absolute fee. See, also, Civ. Code, §§ 909, 918, 919, 921. The effect of the provisions last cited is to vest, or leave vested, in the holder of the power an estate in fee simple in favor of creditors, purchasers, and incumbrances, and, of the sections first cited, to extend the principle to all cases.

The reconveyance by Newell is an immaterial circumstance. It would be otherwise, had the power been held by Lewis in trust or for the benefit of the plaintiffs. But, as the matter stands, the power was wholly for his benefit, and it could make no difference to the plaintiffs whether the land was reconveyed to Lewis or otherwise.

By the provisions of section 922, in force when the deed to plaintiff was executed, "every power of disposition is deemed absolute, by means of which the holder is enabled in his lifetime to dispose of the entire fee in possession, or in expectancy, for his own benefit." Section 1069, then and now in force, provides that "a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee, except that a reservation in any grant * * * is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor." The power of disposition reserved by Henry Lewis was to "grant, bargain and sell to any person, for such price and on such terms" as to him seemed advisable, and to execute deeds therefor, applying the proceeds to his own use. Giving to this reserved power the liberal construction to which, as a reservation, it is entitled, it is a power to convey the premises, if deemed advisable by Lewis and for his benefit so to do. The benefit to the grantor must include anything pecuniary or otherwise which, in his opinion, was beneficial to him or his estate. While it may be true that the consideration of $100, expressed in the deed to Newell, was inadequate as compared with the actual value of the premises granted, this sum may or may not have been, in a pecuniary sense, the only benefit he received. "A written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." Civ. Code, § 1614. The adequacy of consideration passing to Lewis on account of this deed, whether of pecuniary value or beneficial in other regards, was a matter which, by the terms of the power reserved, was peculiarly within his discretion as to amount or character. Nothing in the record to the contrary appearing, we may not say that it was not satisfactory to him in every regard, nor that the conveyance was not for his benefit in the sense requisite to the exercise of the power to convey. The objections, therefore, of plaintiffs to his introduction of the Newell deed were not well taken, and the deed thus in evidence was sufficient to support the findings of the court.

Entertaining these views, the other specifications of error are immaterial and need not be discussed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte LEWIS.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 16, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Warrant—Sufficiency.

A warrant can have no support in a complaint not having the date of the complaint referred to in the warrant.

2. Infants — Juvenile Delinquents — Custody—Complaint—Sufficiency.

St. 1905, p. 81, c. 84, § 3, provides that any dependent or delinquent child may be committed to the state school for juvenile offenders, and page 806, c. 610, § 2, subsec. 1, defines the phrases "dependent child" and "delinquent child," the latter being among other things, an "incorrigible minor." Held, that a complaint under the statutes was insufficient where it contained no averment bringing the minor within the statutory definitions, though the prayer of the complaint described her as an incorrigible minor.

3. Same.

St. 1905, p. 806, c. 610, § 2, subsec. 1, defining and providing for the control of dependent and delinquent children, makes the statute applicable only to children under the age of 16 years, and Id., p. 81, c. 84, § 3, authorizes the commitment of any dependent child to the state school. Held, that a complaint praying for the commitment of a minor to such school was fatally defective where it alleged the minor over 16 and under 18 years of age.

4. Same.

The marriage of a minor female takes her out of the class known as "children and minors" under St. 1905, p. 806, c. 610, § 2, subsec. 1; and Id., p. 81, c. 84, § 3, providing for the commitment of delinquent and dependent minors to the state school.

Application of D. C. Lewis for habeas corpus to obtain the release of Nellie M. Lewis from custody under a warrant issued on a complaint praying for her commitment to the State School for Juvenile Offenders. Prisoner ordered discharged.

Henry E. Wills and Hester & Ladd, for petitioner. J. G. Rossiter and Chas. E. McComas, Dep. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. In this matter the prisoner, Nellie Mundell Lewis, must be discharged for several reasons: The warrant returned here by the sheriff as his authority for holding the prisoner was issued out of the superior court on June 6, 1906, and is by its terms based upon a complaint filed in said court on February 21, 1906, "praying for the commitment of the above-named minor to the Whittier State School for juvenile offenders." To this warrant is attached what purports to be a copy of a complaint sworn to on the 2d day of May, 1906. At the hearing of the matter the sheriff introduced in evidence the copy of another complaint differing in several respects from the copy attached to the warrant returned. This copy of complaint introduced in evidence was also sworn to upon the 2d day of May, 1906. Neither of these two complaints, copies of which are before me herein, can be treated as supporting the warrant in question, for the reason that they are not as appears by date referred to in the warrant, nor is either of them the basis of said warrant. There was, as I find by examination of the records of this court, a complaint filed against the prisoner in said superior court on the date stated in the said warrant, the 21st day of February, 1906. That complaint was, however, before the District Court of Appeal on a previous application for a writ of habeas corpus, and it was then held by the court that such complaint was entirely insufficient to support an order committing the prisoner. See Ex parte Edward Mundell (Dist. Ct. of App., 2d Dist., Crim. No. 30; April 30, 1906) 86 Pac. 833. For the reasons stated in that opinion, that complaint I hold to be entirely insufficient to support the further detention of the prisoner. Nor are either of the complaints before me sufficient to warrant the further holding of the prisoner. The complaint attached to the warrant fails to state that the home of the prisoner is an unfit place for her for any reason. It also fails to state that she is incorrigible, or a vagrant. There is also an entire absence of any averment bringing her under the provisions of subsection 1 of section 2, c. 610, on page 806, St. 1905, either as a dependent child by virtue of the amendment contained in that section, or as a proper subject to be sent to the Whittier school by virtue of the amendment contained in section 3, c. 84, on page 81, St. 1905. To be sure, in the prayer of this complaint the prisoner is described as an "incorrigible minor," but it is neither asserted, averred, nor charged that she is an incorrigible minor. If the person swearing to the complaint were charged with perjury in having falsely sworn that the prisoner was incorrigible, he might well answer that he did not so swear. People v. Bartman, 81 Cal. 200, 22 Pac. 592.

As to the complaint introduced at the hearing, it is fatally defective in that it is therein alleged that the prisoner is over 16 and under 18 years of age; whereas the dependent child act under which it is drawn affects children under 16 years only. See St. 1905, p. 81, c. 84, § 3; and page 806, c. 610, § 2, subsec. 1.

I might stop here, but there is yet another reason why the prisoner must be discharged. It appears from the sworn petition herein that since the filing of all the complaints hereinbefore referred to, the prisoner has been married and is now the wife of the man who makes the petition herein in her behalf. This allegation of the petition is not denied, and must be taken as true. I am of opinion that, if we concede the validity of the complaints, still her marriage takes the prisoner out of the class known as "children and minors" under the Whittier act and the act concerning dependent children, and makes of her an adult person so far as those acts are concerned; and that no court has any further jurisdiction of her person on any charge based upon either or both of those acts. I do not believe that married minors come within the provisions of those acts. In this my associates agree with me.

I, therefore, order that the said Nellie Mundell Lewis be discharged from custody, and that her cash bail be restored to the owner thereof.

BECKMAN v. WATERS et al.

1. Actions—Joinder of Causes.

By express provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 427, claims to recover real estate and rents and profits thereof may be united in one action.

2. Pleading—Demurrer—Separating Causes of Actions.

That causes of action properly joined in one action are not separately stated is not a ground of demurrer.

3. Limitation of Actions—Trusts—Demurrer.

The admission of defendant by his demurrer, in an action to recover real estate and rents and profits thereof, that at all times prior to two years before commencement of the action he held possession of the property, and received the rents and profits as trustee for defendant, disposes of his claim that the claims were barred by limitations.

4. Vendor and Purchaser—Failure to Perform Option Contract—Action to Recover Possession.

The repudiation of the contract by one in possession of land under an option to purchase it, and his refusal to pay the balance entitling him to the property, entitles the vendor to maintain an action to recover the property, in the nature of an action to quiet title, on account of the vendee's claim of ownership of the property.

5. Same—Terminating Option—Notice.

The commencement of an action to recover property by one who has given an indefinite extension of an option to purchase it is sufficient notice of termination of the option.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by Elias Beckman against William G. Waters and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. F. Conroy, for appellant. W. S. Day and Henley C. Booth, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. Action to recover possession of real property, and for rents, issues, and profits. Demurrer to complaint sustained, and judgment thereon, from which plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff, in February, 1892, was the holder of the legal title to certain real property, known as "San Miguel Island," and certain live stock thereon, together with implements of husbandry, and a sloop used in the business of said island. That on said date plaintiff executed to defendant Waters a certain written instrument, set out in the complaint, by which he granted to said defendant the option and privilege of purchasing all of said property at any time within three years from the date thereof, for the sum of $7,000 and interest; upon payment of which sum plaintiff obligated himself to execute to said Waters proper conveyances for the whole of said property, except such as was sold in the meantime, and in the event of such payment with interest when the same became due, to credit the amount of such sales upon such indebtedness. Time was made of the essence of the contract. That plaintiff retained possession of all of said property; that in March, 1892, defendant paid on account of said purchase price $1,000 and thereafter, and before May, 1896, plaintiff received on sales of property so included in said option an additional sum of $1,500, which amounts were all the sums received by plaintiff on account of said option to sell. That after May, 1896, until March, 1897, defendant Waters assumed control of said island for plaintiff and in his own behalf as prospective purchaser. That in March, 1897, the defendant corporation was formed, of which Waters was the principal stockholder and general business manager; and Waters conveyed to said corporation all of his interest in and to said property described in said option, and the same was accepted by said corporation with full knowledge of the rights and interests of the respective parties. That said Waters, until the formation of said corporation and the said corporation after its organization, held possession of said island and property as trustee for plaintiff, and not otherwise. That between March, 1897, and the date of the commencement of the action, defendants received from the rents, issues, and profits of said island and the other property, more than $20,000, which they kept and appropriated to their own use and refused to account for the same to plaintiff. That ever since March, 1904, the defendants have disavowed their fiduciary relation to plaintiff and claimed ownership to all of said property adversely to plaintiff and denied plaintiff's right of possession thereto. Plaintiff alleges that the defendants are disposing of said property and threaten to dispose of all thereof; that defendants are insolvent, and will, unless restrained, continue to sell said property to plaintiff's irreparable loss and injury. Plaintiff alleges that the option so granted was extended indefinitely. The prayer of the complaint is for a decree divesting defendants of all claims or demands to said property and an accounting for rents, issues and profits and a judgment therefor, and for other relief. Defendants demurred to the complaint generally, and also specially upon the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, and upon the ground that several causes of action are improperly united, and not separately stated; and further that the claims of plaintiff are barred by the statute.

We think the court erred in its order and judgment sustaining the demurrer. The action is clearly one to recover possession of real property and for rents, issues, and profits; and under section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure, such action may be united. That the causes of action so proper to be united were not separately stated is not grounds of demurrer. City Carpet Works v. Jones, 102 Cal. 510, 36 Pac. 841; Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 150, 73 Pac. 820. We perceive no ambiguity or uncertainty in the complaint. It comprehends a statement of facts admitted by the demurrer to be true, which entitles the plaintiff to relief in equity. The admission that the defendant at all times before 1904 held possession and received the rents, issues and profits as agent and trustee of the plaintiff, and not otherwise, disposes of all questions involved in the plea of the bar of the statute. The defendants having admitted that they have repudiated the contract under which they hold possession, and that they have refused to pay the balance which entitles them to the property, plaintiff can maintain the present action in the nature of an action to quiet his title on account of defendant's asserted claim and interest therein. Woodard v. Hennegan, 128 Cal. 302, 60 Pac. 769. There is nothing in the complaint from which we may infer that mortgage rights are claimed. While the extension of the option was indefinite, such extension was a privilege given by plaintiff which he might revoke upon notice, and the bringing of the action is a sufficient notice that the option has been terminated.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the defendants' demurrer to the amended complaint.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

3 Cal. App. 716

Ex parte BAXTER.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 2, 1906.)

Criminal Law — Commitment — Conviction in Police Court.

St. 1905, p. 940, c. 15, constituting the charter of the city of San Bernardino, section 95 (page 956) provides that the judicial power of the city shall be vested in a police court, consisting of one police judge. Section 14 (page 944) provides that such judge shall be elected at a general municipal election to be held on the first Monday of April, 1907. Section 13 (page 944) provides that the police judge and recorder shall continue to hold office and act as such until the second Monday of May, 1907, but that the first election of city officers under the charter shall be held on the second Monday of April, 1905. Section 51 (page 952) provides that the mayor shall fill all vacancies in an elective office, but that at the next municipal election an election shall be held for the office vacated, to fill the unexpired term. The incumbent of the office of recorder died prior to April, 1905, and on such date an election was held at which a judge of the police court was elected, but he was called the "recorder" instead of the police judge. Held, that with reference to the interval of time between the adoption of the charter and the second Monday of May, 1907, the terms "recorder" and "police judge" were used synonymously, though the charter did not continue in existence the recorder's court previously existing, and hence the fact that a warrant of commitment issued by the judge elected in 1905 was signed by him as "city recorder," did not render it insufficient so as to entitle the prisoner to release on habeas corpus.

Application by William Baxter for habeas corpus to obtain his release from the custody of the sheriff of San Bernardino county. Prisoner remanded, and writ dismissed.

Henry W. Nisbet, for petitioner. Ralph E. Swing, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The petitioner is held in custody by the sheriff of San Bernardino county, under a warrant of commitment issued under a judgment for a misdemeanor in a case lately pending against him, entitled, "In the Recorder's Court of the City of San Bernardino," etc., and signed by W. L. Vestal, "City Recorder." A similar application, and upon the same grounds, was made to Judge Bledsoe of the superior court of San Bernardino county, by whom the writ was discharged and the prisoner remanded. The facts in the case, with the questions involved and the provisions of the charter and statutory provisions and authorities bearing upon the case are fully stated in the opinion of the judge, which is appended, and to which reference is made for a more specific statement of the case.

We concur in the conclusion reached in the opinion referred to and in much of the reasoning. But we are of the opinion that the charter is to be construed, not as continuing in existence the recorder's court previously existing, but as simply designating the "recorder" or "police judge," in office when the charter took effect, as judge ad interim of the police court provided for in sections 95, et seq. It follows that upon the death of the incumbent there was a vacancy in the office of judge of the police court. This vacancy might have been filled by the mayor under the provisions of section 51 of the act, but the officer thus appointed could not have held "beyond the next general municipal election," at which time, it is expressly provided, "an election shall be held for that office so vacated to fill the unexpired term." Under this provision it was required by the law that at the first "general municipal election"—which was held on the second Monday of April, 1905—a judge of the police court should be elected; and such an election was in fact held, to which no objection can be urged, except that the officer elected as judge of the police court was called "recorder," instead of "police judge." But this, we think, was immaterial. The proposed judge of the police court, ad interim, is designated in section 13 of the act (St. 1905, p. 944, c. 15) by both terms; and it seems to be clear, with reference to the interval of time between the adoption of the charter and the second Monday of May, 1907, that the two terms are used in the charter as synonymous. The judge of the police court during this interval, therefore, may, with equal propriety, be called "recorder" or "police judge," and the court either the "recorder's court" or the "police court."

It follows that the prisoner must be remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and it is so ordered, and the writ is dismissed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN J.

The following is the opinion referred to in the decision (Bledsoe, J.):

"The petitioner herein alleges that he is in the custody of the sheriff, under a commitment issued by W. L. Vestal as city recorder of the city of San Bernardino; but that such detention is illegal, in that there is no recorder's court in the city of San Bernardino, and that consequently he is imprisoned without authority of law. The sole question in the case is as to the existence or nonexistence of any municipal court in the city of San Bernardino. If there is such a court, and it is a recorder's court, duly constituted, then the judgment of W. L. Vestal, who is the de facto judge thereof, is a valid and subsisting judgment, and petitioner is not entitled to discharge.

"Petitioner's point is that the city, under its charter (St. 1905, p. 940, c. 15), and under prior decisions of the Supreme Court (People v. Toal, 85 Cal. p. 333, 24 Pac. 603, and decisions following that) could not provide for any court except a 'police court', as permitted in section 8½, article 11 of the Constitution. Prior to the enactment of that act in 1896, it was held that the cities by freeholder's charters could not establish any municipal court, such power being granted to the Legislature alone. The court will take judicial knowledge that San Bernardino, prior to the adoption of its charter, was acting under the municipal incorporation act of 1883, providing for the government of cities of the fifth class; that under such act elections for officers, including a recorder, were held in 1903. It is also apparent, from the city charter above referred to, that it was the intention of the framers thereof that all persons then in office, and to which they had been elected at the last municipal election, should hold their full term, as prescribed by said act, to wit, until 1907. Pursuant to such intention, it is provided that a city election should be held in 1905, but that only certain officers, not including those who were to hold over, should be elected. It was specifically provided in section 13 that certain officers, including a recorder, 'shall also continue to hold office and act as such under the charter, until said second Monday of May, 1907.' Of course as long as the recorder acted 'as such,' he would constitute the recorder's court.

"By section 14 (page 944) it is provided that in April, 1907, and regularly thereafter, a police judge, with certain other officers mentioned, should be elected. The police judge was to act ex officio as city treasurer. By section 75 (page 954) it was provided that until the second Monday in May, 1907, the duties of the marshal, treasurer, and recorder shall be those prescribed for marshal, treasurer, and recorder, respectively, by chapter VI of the aforesaid act of the Legislature, enacted in 1883, which chapter refers to cities of the fifth class. In section 223 (page 975) it was provided that 'all laws, ordinances and resolutions relating to the city of San Bernardino, now in force and not inconsistent to this charter, shall be and remain in force after this charter takes effect, until repealed or changed by the proper authority.' The effect of this provision would be to keep the law (Municipal Incorporation Act) in force until repealed or changed by proper authority (to wit, this charter). Section 224 (page 975) provides that "in all matters pertaining to municipal affairs, concerning which provision is not made in the charter, the general laws of the state, in force at the time, shall be in force in the city, so far as the same may be applicable to the class of cities to which this city may belong." By the provisions of the general law, approved March 2, 1883 (St. 1883, p. 24, c. 17), the class to which a city belongs or may belong, in the absence of a special enumeration, is determined by a reference to the last federal census; of this the court takes judicial knowledge, and from the same it appears that the city of San Bernardino at the present time belongs, and at the time of the adoption of such charter belonged, to the fifth class.

"As I read these provisions, it is apparent therefrom that the framers of the charter intended to constitute the recorder's court, precisely as the same existed prior to the adoption of the charter, as the municipal court of the city until the election of the police judge, which is not to occur until May, 1907. It is true, article 5 of the charter does, in express terms, provide that the judicial power of the city shall be vested in a police court; but it also provides immediately thereafter that such court is to consist of one police judge. There being no police judge provided for until the end of the recorder's present term, there is no police court until then. The sole question remaining to be determined is whether or not, under the power granted the freeholders by the constitution, they could establish and constitute a recorder's court as the municipal court of the city. I am constrained to believe that the freeholders have such power.

"Petitioner's point would seem to be that because the term 'police court' was used in the amendment to the Constitution, that the city could only establish a police court, eo nomine.

"To hold this would be to grasp at the form and disregard the substance; it would be to hold, in effect, that the city could establish any court and give it any jurisdiction it pleased, so long as it was called a 'police court.' This, I am satisfied, was not the intention; but, on the contrary, I think it stands without question that the intention was to enable the city to establish the usual and necessary municipal court, having merely a municipal jurisdiction, and belonging to the class of courts universally known and recognized, on account of their extremely limited jurisdiction, as 'police courts.' The term 'police court' is not defined in the Constitution, and we must therefore look at the accepted definitions of the term to be found elsewhere. The Century Dictionary defines a police court as a court for the trial of offenders brought up on charges preferred by the police. Anderson's Law Dictionary, sub. nom. police court, defines it as 'an inferior court (in America) having a jurisdiction wholly or chiefly criminal in nature and very limited in extent; usually discharges merely functions of a justice of the peace, but have power to try some minor offenses. A limited civil jurisdiction is sometime also conferred upon it.'

The jurisdiction of the recorder's court, as established by the charter, being of course the same jurisdiction granted to it by the Legislature (Municipal Incorporation Act, § 806; St. 1883, p. 265, c. 49), falls clearly within these limits.

"Pursuant to authority given by the constitution the Legislature has at various times provided for so-called 'police courts' viz.: Sections 229, 390, 560, and 690 pages 173, 200, 219, 242, of the aforesaid municipal incorporation act which provide for such courts for the first four classes of cities, respectively. A similar provision was made in the general law. Pol. Code, § 4424, et seq. Some of these courts (section 560, supra) were made courts of record; the others were not. I can discover no difference in the jurisdiction granted to them and that granted by recorders' courts provided for cities of the fifth and sixth classes by sections 806 and 882 (pages 265, 278), of said municipal incorporation act. It would seem probable that the framers of section 8½, the aforesaid amendment to the Constitution, in using the term 'police court' had in mind such a 'police court' with the jurisdiction conferred as had been theretofore established in this state by the Legislature, and which courts so established, while differing slightly, had certain inherent characteristics as to jurisdiction and situation.

"Anderson's Law Dictionary in defining the word 'recorder' says: 'He is a judicial officer, in many cities, whose jurisdiction is chiefly confined to the trial of criminal prosecutions;' thus showing that the jurisdiction of his court, which is the essential characteristic and substantial feature of any court, is the same as that of the police court. This is further shown by the decision In re Carrillo, 66 Cal. p. 3, 4 Pac. 695, where our Supreme Court, holding that a mayor might act as a police justice, say: 'The mayor of the city is therefore by the charter, ex officio police justice, and authorized to hold a police court for the city; for 'the term "police court" as used in the Penal Code, includes police judges' courts, police courts, and all courts held by mayors or recorders, in incorporated cities or towns.' Section 1461, Pen. Code. We have here the express declaration of the Supreme Court, paraphrasing the language of the Penal Code, that a recorders' court is the substantial equivalent of a police court. So, in Prince v. Fresno, 88 Cal. 407, 412, 26 Pac. 606, 607, the Supreme Court, in discussing the power of the recorder of the city of Fresno, used that term interchangeably with that of police judge. So, in Uridias v. Morrill, 22 Cal. 473, on page 478, the Supreme Court say, of the use of the phrase 'municipal courts' as used in the Constitution: The term "municipal courts" has a legal meaning and signafication and clearly includes mayors' and recorders' courts, as those were well known and universally recognized as being of that character.' People v. Provines, 34 Cal. 520, is to the same effect. It was held in Mathie v. McIntosh, 40 Wis. 120, that the 'police court' of a certain city was a 'municipal court' within the meaning of the Constitution.

"For the foregoing reasons, I am led to believe that it was intended by the framers of the constitutional amendment to permit cities framing charters to provide for the establishment of an inferior court, which should correspond in substance, jurisdiction and standing with ordinary police courts; that the term 'police courts' was used in said amendment as merely descriptive of the court which might be established in any city, and that there was no intention, to be gathered from the instrument itself or elsewhere, that a city was to be limited to the establishment of a police court, under that name only.

"It is ordered that the writ be discharged and the prisoner remanded."

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1906.)

1. Waters and Water Courses—Irrigation—Appropriation.

One, to get water to irrigate his land, made a cut in the levee confining the water of a river, and diverted the water into an excavation that he had made along the outside of the levee. He made use of the excavation to conduct water to the land, and by means of it irrigated the same. Held to show an appropriation as against a subsequent diversion and use.

2. Same.

One making an appropriation of water from a natural stream may make use of any natural or artificial channel available and convenient for the purpose of conducting the water, so long as other persons interested in such conduit do not object, and his appropriation so made will be as effectual as if he had carried it through a dith or pipe line made for that purpose and no other.

3. Same.

A person making an appropriation of water from a natural stream need not construct any headgate at the place of diversion, and if a simple cut will accomplish the purpose of diverting the water from the stream, it is, if accompanied with a beneficial use, a good appropriation as against others making a subsequent diversion and use.

4. Same.

A person making an appropriation of water from a natural stream for the purpose of irrigating his land had also the purpose of drawing off flood water from other land owned by him. Held, that the purpose to drain one tract did not destroy the right to take the water for irrigation of the other tract, nor impair the right acquired by such appropriation to use it as against a subsequent appropriator.

5. Same.

Since the method of acquiring a right to the use of water of a stream prescribed by Civ. Code, §§ 1415–1421, is not exclusive, a person may, by a prior actual and completed appropriation and use, without adopting the method prescribed by the Code, acquire a right to the water beneficially used, which will be paramount to the title of one making a subsequent appropriation in the manner provided by the Code.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by the Lower Tule River Ditch Company against the Angiola Water Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. G. Lamberson, for appellant. H. Scott Jacobs and Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The court found, in effect, that plaintiff was seised of a prior right, as against the defendant, to divert from Tule river a stream of the water thereof amounting to a continuous flow of 23 feet per second, and gave judgment enjoining the defendant from interfering therewith. Neither party is a riparian owner on the stream, both claiming solely by appropriation and use. The claim of defendant is based on a notice of appropriation under the Code, posted on August 27, 1897, and a subsequent diversion and use in pursuance thereof. With respect to the plaintiff's claim the finding is, in effect, that it is founded on an appropriation and use made by N. P. Duncan, plaintiff's grantor, in May, 1897. The sole objection presented on this appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to show a diversion and use by Duncan, prior to the posting of the defendant's notice of appropriation, or to show that such diversion was made with the intent and purpose to apply the water to any beneficial use, or that any beneficial use was made thereof prior to such posting.

We think there is sufficient evidence on these points to uphold the findings and judgment. Duncan was a witness for the plaintiff and testified, in substance, that in May, 1897, in order to get water to irrigate his land, he had a cut made in the levee confining the water of the river, thereby diverting the water into an excavation that had been made along the outside of the levee; that he made use of this excavation, which was, for practical purposes, a ditch, to conduct the water to his land; that he got the water to irrigate his land at that time, and that by means of it he irrigated about two sections of his land for the purpose of growing thereon wild grasses and feed. H. Clawson also testified that he saw the water, in May, 1897, running from the river through the cut in the levee, and that the water thus taken was used during that season to irrigate all of Duncan's land, together with lands of others, amounting in the aggregate to somewhere near 4,000 acres. There was no evidence offered in contradiction of this testimony. This was sufficient proof of the intent, the diversion or appropriation, and the beneficial use prior to the posting of the defendant's notice. A person who is making an appropriation of water from a natural source or stream, is not bound to carry it to the place of use through a ditch or artificial conduit, nor through a ditch or canal cut especially for that purpose. He may make use of any natural or artificial channel, or natural depression, which he may find available and convenient for that purpose, so long as other persons interested in such conduit do not object, and his appropriation so made will, so far as such means of conducting the water is concerned, be as effectual as if he had carried it through a ditch or pipe line made for that purpose and no other. Hoffman v. Stone, 7 Cal. 49; Butte C. & D. Co. v. Vaughan, 11 Cal. 150, 70 Am. Dec. 769; Simmons v. Winters, 21 Or. 35, 27 Pac. 9, 28 Am. St. Rep. 727; McCall v. Porter, 42 Or. 56, 70 Pac. 822, 71 Pac. 976; Richardson v. Kier, 37 Cal. 263. For the same reasons it is unnecessary that there should be any headgate of boards or masonry at the place of diversion. If a simple cut will accomplish the purpose of diverting the water from the stream, it is, if accompanied with a beneficial use, a good appropriation as against others making a subsequent diversion and use. There was some testimony indicating a dual intent on the part of Duncan—that is, a purpose not only to get water to irrigate his land, as stated, but also to draw off the flood water from, and prevent it flowing to, some other land owned by him on which he then had growing a crop of grain. This purpose to drain one tract of land did not vitiate or destroy the right to take the water for irrigation of other tracts, nor impair the right, acquired by such appropriation and use, to take and use it for the latter purpose. The two purposes are not inconsistent. In order to make a valid appropriation it was not necessary for Duncan to post and record a notice of appropriation as provided in the Civil Code, §§ 1415–1421. The method of acquiring a right to the use of water as there prescribed is not exclusive. One may, by a prior, actual, and completed appropriation and use, without proceeding under the Code, acquire a right to the water beneficially used, which will be superior and paramount to the title of one making a subsequent appropriation from the same stream in the manner provided by that statute. Wells v. Mantes, 99 Cal. 583, 34 Pac. 324; De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 401, 20 Pac. 563, 23 Pac. 198; Watterson v. Saldunbehere, 101 Cal. 112, 35 Pac. 432; Burrows v. OLENDER v. CRYSTALLINE MINING CO., Limited. (Sac. 1,335.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1906.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—CORPORATIONS.

St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, requiring a foreign corporation doing business in the state to designate by writing a person as its agent on whom process may be served, or otherwise the service may be made on the Secretary of State, is not invalid as depriving a foreign corporation of its property without due process of law, for it will have notice of the commencement of an action against it by complying with the law and appointing an agent, and by its failure it indicates its willingness to have the service made on the Secretary of State.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 929.]

2. JUDGMENT—VACATION FOR INSUFFICIENCY OF SERVICE.

A defendant seeking to vacate a default judgment based on insufficient service of process, without asserting a meritorious defense, is not entitled to invoke the rule that a default will be set aside, and defendant allowed to try the case on its merits when there is any reasonable ground for such action.

3. CORPORATIONS—PROCESS—SERVICE.

St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, requiring a foreign corporation to designate by writing a person as its agent on whom process may be served, or otherwise the service may be had on the Secretary of State, substitutes the service of process on the Secretary of State, in an action against a foreign corporation having designated no agent in the state, for the service by publication prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 412, providing for a service of summons on a foreign corporation by publication when it has no agent within the state.

4. SAME.

The allegation in the complaint in an action against a foreign corporation, that at all times therein mentioned the corporation was "doing business in the county of T. and State of California," was sufficient, without a further showing of the continuance of such business, to bring the case within St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, requiring a foreign corporation doing business in the state to designate by writing a person as its agent on whom process may be served, or otherwise it may be served on the Secretary of State.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by S. Olender against the Crystalline Mining Company, Limited. From a default judgment for plaintiff, and from orders denying a motion to quash the service of summons and to vacate the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. O'Brien, for appellant. J. C. Webster, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover of defendant $433.01, with interest, money laid out and expended by plaintiff for defendant at the latter's request. Default of defendant was entered, and judgment rendered according to the prayer of the complaint. Defendant appeals from the judgment and also from orders denying its motion to quash the service of summons, and denying its motion to vacate the judgment by default based on such service.

Appellant is a foreign corporation created and existing under the laws of Great Britain and doing business in California. By an act of the Legislature of this state, approved March 17, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94), it is enacted that a foreign corporation doing business in this state must designate, by a writing filed with the Secretary of State, some person as its agent upon whom process may be served, and that if it fail to do so, service of summons in civil actions against it may be served on the Secretary of State. In the case at bar the defendant did not designate such agent, and service of summons was made on the Secretary of State. The main contention made by appellant is that said act of the Legislature is unconstitutional and void; but this contention is not maintainable. The positions taken are that the state cannot arbitrarily appoint as an agent for appellant one between whom and appellant there is no actual relation of principal and agent; that the law does not require the Secretary of State to communicate to a defendant any information of the service of summons; that if the service be held sufficient, appellant would have no notice of the proceeding and no opportunity to be heard; and, therefore, a judgment on such service would deprive appellant of his property without due process of law. These positions are not tenable. The cases of Keystone Driller Co. v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 738, 72 Pac. 398, and Willey v. Benedict Co. (Cal.) 79 Pac. 270, cited by respondent, are not direct decisions on the point, although they seem to assume the constitutionality of the act in question; but, upon principle, we think that the respondent's contention is clearly maintainable. When a foreign corporation undertakes to do business in this state it is bound to know the existing law as to its right to do such business; and in the case at bar the appellant knew that as a condition of its doing business here, it must, under the law, appoint an agent upon whom process could be served, and that if it refused to appoint such agent, service could be made on the Secretary of State. There is nothing unjust or unconstitutional in such a law. The appellant would have had full notice of the commencement of the action, and an opportunity to be heard, if it had put itself in the position of having such notice by simply complying with the reasonable requirement of the law that it appoint an agent to receive such notice; and by its failure to do so indicated its willingness to have such notice given to the Secretary of State. It is, therefore, in no position to invoke the constitutional doctrines that a defendant must have notice of an action against him and an opportunity to be heard therein.

Appellant says that the tendency of the decisions of this court has been toward holding that a default should be set aside and a defendant allowed "to try the case upon its merits" whenever there is any reasonable ground for such action. But the appellant did not assert any meritorious defense nor ask to be allowed to come in and make such defense. If it had averred that the default and judgment had been taken against it through its inadvertence or surprise, and that it had a good defense to the action and desired to be allowed to try the case on its merits, the trial court would, very probably, have set aside the default and allowed it to make such defense. But it does not ask to defend; it merely asks that it be allowed to escape the necessity of making any defense. Appellant contends that the service was not complete because section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for a service of summons on a foreign corporation by publication when defendant has no managing agent or officer within the state, and there was no summons by publication in the case at bar. But the act of March 17, 1899, above referred to, evidently substitutes the service upon the Secretary of State for the service by publication formerly prescribed by the Code in cases where a defendant has no agent here.

The averments in the complaint that at all times therein mentioned the appellant was a foreign corporation "doing business in the county of Tuolumne and state of California" were sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of the said act of the Legislature, without further showing of the continuance of such business.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

TRIPPET v. STATE. (L. A. 1,870.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1906.)

1. TAXATION—COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX LAW — STATUTORY PROVISIONS — VESTED RIGHTS OF STATE.

The collateral inheritance tax law (Act March 23, 1893 [St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168]), as amended, imposing a tax on property passing by will or by the intestate laws of the state, and declaring that the tax imposed shall be "due and payable at the death of the decedent," creates a vested right in the state at the death of the decedent to the tax imposed, which cannot be surrendered by a legislative act, and (St. 1905, p. 374, c. 325), constituting a new law on the subject and expressly repealing the act of 1893, does not affect the right of the state to taxes on the estates of persons dying before the law of 1905 went into effect, though no steps had been taken prior thereto to collect the taxes on such estates.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW—INHERITANCE TAX LAW—VALIDITY.

The collateral inheritance tax law (Act March 23, 1893 [St. 1893. p. 193, c. 168]), imposing a tax on property passing by will or by the intestate laws of the state, does not deprive one of property without due process of law, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, though it declares that the right of the state to its portion of the inheritance is vested at the death of the decedent, for it provides a means of ascertaining the amount of the tax, and for notice and appraisement.

3. INJUNCTION—QUESTIONS DETERMINED.

One seeking to enjoin the state from collecting a collateral inheritance tax imposed by Act March 23, 1893, on the ground that the state has no right to the tax, is not entitled to a determination of the question whether after the adoption of the inheritance tax law (St. 1905, p. 374, c. 325), expressly repealing the act of 1893, a method remains for the collection of the tax; the state seeking no relief against plaintiff.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Oscar A. Trippet, executor of the will of Jacob Gruendike, against the state. From a judgment for the state, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Boone, Oscar A. Trippet, Garoutte & Goodwin, S. F. Leib, and Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Casius Carter, Dist. Atty., for the State.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought by the executor of the will of Jacob Gruendike, deceased, pursuant to the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 374, c. 325, authorizing the bringing of an action against the state by the personal representatves of a decedent for the purpose of having it determined that any property belonging to such decedent's estate is not subject to any lien for taxes under the act of 1893, and the acts amendatory thereof, imposing a tax on collateral inheritances. St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168. From the allegations of the complaint it appears that Jacob Gruendike, a resident of San Diego county, died testate on April 8, 1905, leaving estate in said county and elsewhere of the value of between $300,000 and $400,000. On April 28, 1905, the superior court of San Diego county duly admitted the decedent's will to probate and appointed the plaintiff executor. By the will, which is set out in full in the complaint, the residue, comprising nearly the whole of the estate, is given to the testator's living brothers, sisters, nephews and nieces, and the children of deceased nephews and nieces. There are some forty beneficiaries, each of whom, with two or three exceptions, takes under the will, an interest of the value of from $7,000.00 to $10,000.00 The defendant claims that all of the interests devised and bequeathed by the will are subject to a tax under the act of March 23, 1893, entitled "An Act to establish a tax on collateral inheritances, etc.," and its various amendments, while the plaintiff claims, and prays a decree accordingly, that all of the provisions of this act have been repealed by an act approved March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341, c. 314), and that by such repeal the state has lost any right which it may have had under the earlier act to collect a tax. (There are two acts approved —March 20, 1905—the one allowing the institution of such an action as this, and the other imposing inheritance taxes and purporting to repeal the collateral inheritance tax law of 1893.)

It is alleged that prior to the repeal of the act of 1893 no proceedings had been taken for the appraisement under said act of any of the interests devised or bequeathed by the Gruendike will. The complaint further asserts a right arising under the federal Constitution by alleging that the act of 1893 has been construed by this court as vesting "a five per cent. interest in the state at the death of the decedent regardless as to whether or not there has been any appraisement and notice to the parties in interest, and before the ascertainment of the amount of the inheritance, devise or bequest," and that the act, as so construed, deprives persons of property without due process of law. A general demurrer to the complaint having been sustained, and plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered for defendant. The appeal is from this judgment.

By its terms the act of March 20, 1905, which, it is claimed, repealed the act of 1893, went into effect on July 1, 1905. Gruendike's death occurred on April 8, 1905, when the old law was still in force. Passing, for the moment, the constitutional point suggested above, the substantial and, indeed, the only question, is what was the effect of the act of 1905 on estates of persons dying before it went into effect, where no steps had been taken to collect the tax imposed by the law in force at the date of the death. The act of March 23, 1893, was the first enactment in this state on the subject of inheritance taxes. It provided in section 1 that all property passing by will, or by the intestate laws of this state, or by an instrument made in contemplation of death, except to the use of the father, mother, wife, lawful issue, brother, sister, the wife or widow of a son, the husband or a daughter, the adopted child, or any lineal descendent of the decedent, or any corporations or institutions exempted from taxation, should be subject to a tax of $5 on every $100 of the market value of such property. Section 4 (page 194) provided that all taxes imposed by the act should be "due and payable at the death of the decedent," and that interest from the date of such death should be collected in certain events. Other sections of the act provided for the appraisement of interests subject to the tax, for the duties of executors, administrators, and public officers, and for other matters connected with the ascertainment, collection and disposition of the tax. The act so passed has been repeatedly amended by succeeding Legislatures (St. 1895, p. 33, c. 28; St. 1897, p. 77, c. 83; St. 1899, p. 101, c. 85), the amendments of 1895 relating to appraisements and the duties of certain officers in the collection of the tax, and those of 1897 and 1899 altering the classes of persons or corporations exempt from the tax under section 1 of the act. The Legislature of 1905, instead of amending the old act, undertook to pass a new law covering the whole subject. By this law the old plan of a flat tax of 5 per cent. is abandoned, and a sliding scale, ranging from 1 to 15 per cent. of the interest passing, is adopted; the rates varying according to the remoteness of kinship and the amount of the inheritance or gift. The system of exemptions is also materially changed, no heirs or relatives of the deceased being absolutely exempt under the new law, while under all the prior enactments there was no tax on gifts to or inheritances by the father, mother, husband, wife, lawful issue, wife or widow of a son, husband of a daughter, adopted child, or legitimate lineal descendant of the decedent. In other respects the new law re-enacted substantially the provisions of the old with regard to the appraisement of interests subject to the tax, time, and manner of payment, penalties and interest, duties of officers, and all machinery connected with the ascertainment and collection of the tax. Section 27 (page 350) of the new act reads as follows: "An act entitled 'An act to establish a tax on collateral inheritances, bequests and devises, to provide for its collection, and to direct the disposition of the proceeds,' approved March 23, 1893, and all amendments thereto, and all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby expressly repealed." There is in the later act no clause expressly saving or preserving rights accrued under the old.

The argument of the appellant is that by the repeal of the law all inchoate rights existing under that law are ended, and that the right of the state to the tax in this case was inchoate; no steps for its appraisement and collection having been taken before the alleged repealing statute went into effect. The doctrine relied on, which is well established, is stated by this court in Napa State Hospital v. Flaherty, 134 Cal. 315, 66 Pac. 322, in the following words: "It is a rule of almost universal application that where a right is created solely by a statute, and is dependent upon the statute alone, and such right is still inchoate, and not reduced to possession, or perfected by final judgment, the repeal of the statute destroys the remedy, unless the repealing statute contains a saving clause." The applicability of the rule to the present case depends upon two conditions: First, that the statute creating the right be repealed; and, second, that, if repealed, the rights declared by it be inchoate, and not vested. It is urged by the state that, notwithstanding the explicit language of section 27 of the act of 1905, the act of 1893 is not thereby repealed in toto; that, as stated in Suth. Stat. Const. (2d Ed.) § 238, "Where there is an express repeal of an existing statute, and a re-enactment of it at the same time, or a repeal and a re-enactment of a portion of it, the re-enactment neutralizes the repeal so far as the old law is continued in force. It operates without interruption where the re-enactment takes effect at the same time." Whether the authorities support this broad statement of the rule, and whether, if so, the act of 1905 should be deemed to have intended an absolute repeal of the act of 1893, are, however, questions which we do not deem it necessary to decide in this case, for the reason that this court in Estate of Stanford, 126 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 259, 58 Pac. 462, 45 L. R. A. 788, has decided that the right of the state to the tax under the law of 1893 is, immediately upon the death of the decedent, a vested right which cannot be surrendered by legislative act. In that case the decedent had died in June, 1893.

Under the act of March 23, 1893, then in force, there was no exemption of legacies or devises to nephews, nieces, or educational institutions. Pending an appeal from an order directing the executrix to pay taxes on certain legacies to decedent's nephews and nieces resident in the state and to the trustees of the Leland Stanford, Jr., University, the Legislature in 1897 passed an act amending the act of March 23, 1893, by adding such nephews and nieces and educational institutions to the classes of beneficiaries exempted from the tax under section 1 of the act, and providing specifically that the additional exemption should apply to the estates of persons who had died prior to the passage of the amending act. St. 1897, p. 77, c. 83. In holding that the attempt to give the exemptions a retroactive effect was in conflict with several provisions of the state Constitution, and therefore ineffectual, the court used the following language: "In answer to the contention on the part of the respondent that by the amendatory act of 1897 it is attempted to give or donate public money or thing of value, appellants' counsel say 'that the state has never had possession of any part of the accumulations or acquisitions of Leland Stanford, deceased; * * * and he [respondent] has not shown how the state could give away what it never had.' In other words, it is claimed that one not in possession of property is not the owner of it. The law of 1893 repeatedly declares that the portion coming to the state 'shall be due and payable at the death of the decedent.' And it is further provided that from that time until paid over in the course of administration the sum so due the state shall bear interest, and the interest shall be paid on the sum so due the state. It would be absurd to exact interest for the detention or use of money or property not belonging to the party who demands it. It is elementary law that the right of inheritance, including the designation of heirs and the portions which the several heirs shall receive, as well as the right of testamentary disposition, are entirely matters of statutory enactment, and within the control of the Legislature. It is only by virtue of the statute that an heir is entitled to receive any of his ancestor's estate; and the Legislature can provide that the whole or only a portion shall go to the heirs or other beneficiaries upon the death of the ancestor. This being so, and the Legislature in this case having determined that 95 per cent. of the decedent's estate may go to his heirs and beneficiaries and 5 per cent. be retained to the state, it is too clear for argument that this 5 per cent. vested in the state at the same time that the 95 per cent. vested in the heirs or other beneficiaries. 'An estate is vested when there is an immediate right of present enjoyment or a present fixed right of future enjoyment.' (Kent's Commentaries, 202.) The state here, from the death of the decedent, had a present fixed right of future enjoyment to the 5 per cent. of his estate. This is property or a thing of value belonging to the state. * * * In substance, if not in form, to turn over the fund in question belonging to the state to the appellants would be to make a gift or donation of the same, and the law regards substance rather than form. We are, therefore, of the opinion that to give retroactive effect to the law of 1897 would conflict with the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from making any gift or donation of any public money or thing of value."

It was also held that the amending act of 1897 was in conflict with certain provisions of the state Constitution regarding special legislation. It is urged on behalf of appellant that the present case is distinguishable from the Stanford Case, in that the act of 1905 was an absolute repeal and not a mere amendment, and that here (as is claimed) no question of special legislation arises. But we are unable to find any valid ground of discrimination. We have quoted at some length from the opinion in the Stanford Case in order to show that the act of 1897 was held invalid upon the grounds, first, that under the law of 1893 an interest amounting to 5 per cent. of certain specified inheritances, devises, or bequests, vested in the state upon the death of the decedent; and, second, that, where such interest had once vested in the state, it was beyond the power of the Legislature to make a gratuitous surrender of the interest to the beneficiary. These propositions, if sound, are as applicable to this as to the Stanford Case. If the surrender, without consideration, of a right vested in the state be a gift or donation, within the meaning of article 4, § 31, of the Constitution, such surrender must be as obnoxious to the constitutional provision when sought to be accomplished by means of a repeal of the law creating the right as by any other method. Nor can it be said that what was laid down in the Stanford Case as to the "gift or donation" clause was dictum. While the holding of the invalidity of the amending act of 1897 might have been placed solely on the ground of "special legislation," it was not. The enactment was held to violate two provisions of the Constitution, and the ruling as to one was as necessary to the decision as the ruling regarding the other. The various counsel who have filed briefs on behalf of appellant argue, with much force and ability, that the court was in error in holding in the Stanford Case that the law of 1893 created a vested right in the state upon the death of the decedent. Without reviewing the arguments advanced and the authorities cited, we deem it sufficient to say that the Stanford Case was decided by the court in bank, upon a rehearing ordered after a contrary conclusion had been reached in department. The case was elaborately argued and carefully considered, and we adhere to the doctrines declared.

There remains to be considered the point that the act of 1893, as construed by this court, deprives plaintiff of property "without due process of law," contrary to the provisions of article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The proposition, as stated by appellant, is that "in ad valorem tax matters the due process provision of the federal Constitution requires that the state must provide a means of ascertaining the amount of the tax, and for notice and appraisement. Until these things are done, the state has no power to take private property." But if this principle be applicable to a tax like the one under consideration, the law of 1893 did provide a means of ascertaining the amount of the tax and for notice and appraisement. Section 11 provides that, when the value of an interest subject to the payment of the tax is uncertain, the court shall appoint an appraiser, whose duty it shall be to make an appraisement after having given notice to all persons known to have or claim an interest in the property of the time and place at which he will appraise such property. The tax is to be fixed by the court from the report made to it by such appraiser. St. 1895, p. 34, c. 28. The beneficiary under the will, or the heir, is in no way deprived of the benefit of these provisions because the statute enacts or the court holds that the state's right to the tax vests on the decedent's death. The right, although vested, is still, as to actual collection, subject to the appraisement provided for. There is no legal inconsistency in the idea of a right being vested, although the possession may be postponed or contingent upon the performance of certain acts. An apt example is to be found in the right of the heir himself. It is the settled law of this state that upon the death of an owner of property, intestate, his estate at once descends to and vests in his heirs, subject to the possession of the administrator for all purposes of administration. Civ. Code, § 1384; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 Pac. 715; Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179. But the heir must await the completion of administration and the determination of his heirship by the decree of administration before he can enter upon the enjoyment and possession of his vested right. So here, the fact that the right of the state to the tax is vested on the death of the decedent does not carry with it the right to take possession of the interest so vested without performance of the conditions (of appraisement, notice, etc.) to which its right of possession may be subject. The mere fact that the right of the state to its proportion of the gift or inheritance is declared to vest, prior to any appraisement, does not deprive the beneficiary or heir of any substantial right where the law affords him the opportunity to be heard as to the amount of the tax before there is any actual collection or payment thereof.

For the purposes of the present case, it is not necessary to express an opinion regarding appellant's further point that, assuming the act of 1893 to have given to the state a vested interest which could not be surrendered, the act of 1905 repealed all provisions for notice and appraisement as to estates of persons dying before July 1, 1905, and left a bare right in the state without any constitutional means of enforcing it. The plaintiff comes into court seeking, as against the state, a determination that it has no right to any tax. The state is not here seeking any affirmative relief against the plaintiff. The judgment merely denies plaintiff the decree sought by him declaring that the defendant has no right to any tax. Since, as we have seen, the defendant has a vested right to such tax, an adjudication that the estate is free from any claim for such tax would be manifestly improper. Whether or not there remains a legal method of collecting the tax will be a question for decision when the state seeks to enforce its right. This is substantially an action to quiet title. Section 2 of act of March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 375, c. 325). If there be a valid claim against such property, the plaintiff cannot, in this equitable proceeding, quiet his title against such claim, even though the same may be unenforceable by legal proceedings, without paying the claim. The case is analogous to that of a mortgagor, who seeks to quiet his title against a mortgagee whose right to foreclosure is barred by lapse of time. It has been repeatedly held that he cannot do this without paying the amount due on the mortgage. Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 276, 17 Pac. 225; Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314; Brandt v. Thompson, 91 Cal. 458, 27 Pac. 763.

The judgment is affirmed.

ELLIOTT v. PARDEE, Governor.

(S. F. 4,524.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 9, 1906.)

1. Municipal Corporations—Detaching Territory—Effect.

A city detached territory for the purpose of disincorporating itself. The territory detached at one election exceeded more than half the area and nearly three-fourths of the population. The territory detached at a subsequent election excluded more than three-fourths of what remained, leaving only one-tenth of the original territory of the municipality, and not more than five electors. The trustees, in conducting both elections, failed in many particulars to observe the requirements of the statutes regulating elections. Held, that the detachment of the territory was void, and the city continued to exist and to include the territory embraced within its original limits.

2. Same—Nonuser of Franchise—Effect.

A municipal corporation does not lose its existence by nonuser of its franchise.

3. Mandamus—Acts of Governor—Ministerial Acts.

St. 1885, p. 136, c. 147, empowers the Governor, on being presented with a verified petition of not less than 75 electors of a city having no officers, and on his being satisfied of the truth of the averments in the petition, to appoint commissioners of election for the municipality. A city was without officers, and 75 electors presented to the Governor a petition which complied with the conditions of the statute. Held, that mandamus would lie to compel the Governor to act on the petition by deciding on the truth of its allegations, and, on his finding it true, to appoint commissioners of election.

In Bank. Original proceedings in mandamus by E. E. Elliott against George C. Pardee, Governor, to compel respondent to appoint a board of election commissioners to reorganize a city. Heard on demurrer to petition. Demurrer overruled.

Edward F. Sherer, Emmet H. Wilson, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel the Governor to appoint a board of election commissioners to reorganize the city of Compton, pursuant to the requirements of the act of March 14, 1885, entitled "An act to enable municipal corporations of the sixth class to elect officers." St. 1885, p. 136, c. 147. By section 1 of that act it is provided that, whenever a corporation of the sixth class shall have failed from any cause to elect officers in accordance with its charter, and there are no officers to carry on the city government or call an election, the Governor, upon presentation of a verified petition of not less than 75 electors of the corporation setting forth certain particulars, is authorized and empowered, upon being satisfied of the truth of the matters so set forth, to appoint three persons as commissioners of election for said corporation. The following sections of the act define the duties of the commissioners which are, in brief, to call a special election, give due notice of its date and of the polling places, appoint election officers, canvass the returns, and induct the persons chosen to fill the various municipal offices—in short, to do everything necessary to set the corporation going again. By the petition filed in this proceeding it is alleged that a municipal corporation of the sixth class was organized in 1888 under the name of the city of Compton; that it has for a number of years been without officers; that the Governor has been petitioned to appoint election commissioners and has refused to act. Upon the filing of the petition an alternative writ of mandate was issued, in response to which the Governor presents a demurrer and answer. He demurs, generally upon the ground that the facts alleged in the petition are not sufficient to entitle the petitioner to any relief, and more specifically upon the ground that the proceeding is barred by the statute of limitations. By his answer he puts in issue several of the material allegations of the petition. The parties have stipulated, and the court has consented to a separate submission of the demurrer, leaving the issues of fact to future determination in case of an adverse ruling upon the demurrer. It appears from the petition that Compton was duly incorporated as a city of the sixth class in May, 1888; that in April, 1890, five trustees, a clerk, a treasurer, and a marshal were duly elected, and that they qualified and assumed the duties of their respective offices; that no election of officers has since been held; that two of the five trustees are dead, and two have been nonresidents of the city for many years, leaving only one at present residing within the corporate limits; that about the 3d day of January, 1891, all of the city officers wholly ceased to perform, and have never since resumed the performance of, their respective duties. That in September, 1890, a pretended election was held at which an attempt was made to submit to the electors of the city a proposition to exclude certain of its territory, and that a majority voted in favor of such exclusion; that in January, 1891, another pretended election was held, at which the electors were invited to vote upon a proposition to exclude another large portion of the city's territory, and that a majority again voted in favor of the exclusion; that both of said elections were void because of the failure of the trustees in many particulars to observe the requirements of the statutes regulating special elections, and for the further reason that the proposition submitted at the first election was to exclude more than half of the area and nearly three-fourths of the population of the city, thus practically destroying the corporation, and because the proposition submitted at the second was to exclude more than three-fourths of what remained of the territory of the city after the first exclusion, leaving as a final residuum only one-tenth of its original territory, and not more than five electors. It is further alleged that the real purpose of these proceedings was to disincorporate the city under the pretense of excluding territory. The remainder of the petition sets forth the steps taken by the petitioner in conjunction with more than 75 other citizens, residents, householders, and freeholders of Compton, to induce the Governor to appoint election commissioners, and his refusal to act upon their verified petition. It is not necessary to set forth in detail the steps so taken, because it is not denied that the petitioners proceeded regularly under the statute. The questions raised by the demurrer relate, not to the regularity of the steps taken by the citizens of Compton to induce action by the Governor, but to their right to invoke his action at all after so many years of nonuser of the corporate franchise, and to the right of the court to review the decision of the chief executive of the state now upon a matter which, as counsel contends, has been committed to his discretion.

As to the statute of limitations there can be no doubt that it may be pleaded as a bar to the proceeding by mandamus, and there remains equally little doubt that the right to demand performance of official duties may be lost by delay in making the demand. Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153. But this doctrine of laches cannot be applied in such a case as the present. It is clear, and apparently is conceded, that all the proceedings taken for the purpose of excluding territory of the city of Compton were utterly void; and a municipal corporation does not lose its existence by nonuser of its franchise. Swamp Land District v. Silver, 98 Cal. 54, 32 Pac. 866. The city of Compton, therefore, still exists and includes the same territory that it embraced at the date of its original organization. As such municipal corporation its right to have officers continues, and so long as that right continues there is a constantly recurring right to petition for the appointment of election commissioners, which may be exercised whenever 75 qualified electors are able to unite in taking the necessary measures to that end. They have now, according to the allegations of the petition, done everything that the statute requires to be done in order to authorize and empower the Governor to act.

In such case can the Governor refuse to act? The statute provides that: "Upon the presentation of the petition to the Governor he may either act upon the petition or require additional evidence of the matters set forth in the petition. Upon being satisfied of the truth of the matters set forth in the petition, the Governor is authorized and empowered to appoint three persons as commissioners," etc. The Governor must be satisfied of the truth of the matters set forth in the petition, and this means that he has the right to decide that question for himself. But, if he is not satisfied by the verified petition, he should give the petitioners a reasonable opportunity to supply the additional evidence which the case demands, and then make his decision. If the essential facts are not proved to his satisfaction, he may, and ought to, refuse to appoint the commissioners; but, if they are proved, it is his duty to appoint. Power and authority conferred upon a public officer to perform an act not discretionary, in which the public or third parties have an interest, make the exercise of the power obligatory whenever a proper case for its exercise is presented, and mandamus will issue even to the chief executive of the state to compel the exercise of a ministerial function defined by statute. Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, 2 Am. Rep. 432.

In this case, the duty imposed on the Governor to decide upon the truth of the petition, and, if he finds it true, to appoint commissioners, is statutory and ministerial. He cannot refuse to act in any way upon the petition of the electors of Compton, as it is alleged he has done.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled, and counsel are requested to specify the issues of fact which they desire to have tried.

KIMBALL v. McKEE. (S. F. 3,421.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 12, 1906.)

1. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Judicial notice will be taken that under the laws of the United States and the regulations of the land office no sales of public lands are made until the plat and field notes of the subdivisional survey of the township in which the lands lie have been returned and approved, and that the patents issued describe the lands patented as they are delineated on the approved plat, and that there is a uniform method of numbering and designating the sections and their smaller subdivisions.

2. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

In surveying land bounded on one side by the ocean, there is a presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the meander line was run along the beach, if the beach was passable, and if not, by some other method that would enable the surveyor correctly to locate the line of ordinary high tide.

3. BOUNDARIES—CONFLICTING CALLS—COURSES AND DISTANCES.

Both under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2077, and independent thereof, courses and distances are controlled in fixing boundaries by visible monuments, unless there are other sufficient circumstances to corroborate the former.

4. SAME—PUBLIC LANDS—RESURVEY.

Where a township was resurveyed under government authority and a plat made according to the field notes of such resurvey, such field notes, which were duly filed for record, superseded the notes of the original survey.

5. TRESPASS—TITLE TO LAND—EVIDENCE.

In an action for trespass, evidence held insufficient to sustain a survey under which plaintiff claimed title to the land on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. M. Mannon, Judge.

Action by J. A. Kimball against F. A. McKee. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

McGarvey & Bledsoe, for appellant. McNab & Hirsch and Seawell & Pemberton, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action of trespass in which the defendant is charged with having stripped the bark from a large number of trees growing on plaintiff's land, described as lots 1, 3, and 4 in section 31, township 5 south, range 2 east, Humboldt meridian, and the southwest ¼ of the southeast ¼ of section 30 of the same township. The shaded portion of the accompanying map shows the position of these lots in their relation to each other as well as in relation to the township lines and the principal natural objects and artificial monuments delineated and noted on that portion of the official map of the township survey to which reference must be had in construing the patent and determining the location of the land. The plaintiff, as successor in interest to the original patentee, is the unquestioned owner of the lots of land thus delineated and described, and the only serious question in the case is as to their real boundaries on the ground. Whether, in other words, the stripping of the bark, which is not denied, was done upon plaintiff's land or upon other subdivisions of the said section 31, or in an adjoining section. The plaintiff succeeded in convincing the jury that the defendant had trespassed upon his land, and was awarded damages in the sum of $5,000. The appeal by the defendant is from the order of the superior court overruling his motion for a new trial.

Part of Tp. 5., S.R. 2., E.H.M.

The cause was first submitted in department, where the order of the lower court was affirmed. The opinion then rendered contains a very full and generally satisfactory discussion of numerous alleged errors in the rulings of the superior court upon objections to evidence, and in the instructions given to the jury, and with a few trifling exceptions, hereinafter noted, is here readopted as to those points. The rehearing, indeed, was granted only because we desired to consider more carefully the question whether the verdict of the jury was supported by the evidence, or, to state the question more specifically, whether the plaintiff's land was correctly located by the survey upon which he rested his case. With the opportunity of examining and comparing the voluminous and somewhat confusing evidence contained in the record, in the light of the additional argument on that point, we are convinced that the location contended for by plaintiff, and upon which his case depends, was not correctly made, and that in this respect the verdict of the jury is wholly unsupported.

In disposing of its public lands the government causes them to be laid off into townships six miles square, bounded by meridian lines on the east and west and by parallels of latitude on the north and south. This, at least, is the ideal township, but owing to faulty location of the boundary lines or to proximity to the seacoast, or both causes, as in this case, and to the convergence of meridian lines—as in all cases—a township never contains 36 sections, each exactly a mile square, into which they are supposed to be divided. The rules for making the subdivisional surveys, however, are well understood and there is a uniform method of numbering and designating the sections and their smaller subdivisions, of all of which matters the courts take judicial notice. Section 31 is at the southwest corner of the township, next on the east is section 32 and so on to section 36 at the southeast corner. We also take judicial notice that, under the laws of the United States and the regulations of the land office, no sales of public lands are made until the plat and field notes of the subdivisional survey of the township in which they lie have been returned and approved, and that the patents issued to purchasers describe the lands patented as they are delineated on the approved plat—which remains a public record in the office of the Surveyor General, and copies of which, officially certified, are deposited in the local land office. We also know that it is made the duty of the surveyors employed to make these subdivisional surveys to mark the section corners with posts properly lettered, or other monuments, and also the intersection of quarter-section lines with the section lines, and more especially to preserve accurate field notes of their surveys showing the natural features of the country, such as streams, mountain ridges, the ocean shore, nature of the soil, whether barren or fertile, wooded or meadow; distance and bearing of witness trees from section and quarter section corners, etc. These field notes are, like the township plat, preserved in the office of the Surveyor General as a public record, and their principal purpose is to enable the purchasers of public lands, and their successors, to correctly relocate the section and quarter section corners within the township when, by accident or design, the artificial monuments placed by the official surveyor have been removed or destroyed—a very common occurrence, as the records of this court, and the decisions of other courts, abundantly prove.

And so in this case, when the plaintiff came to the conclusion that the defendant was collecting tan bark by stripping his trees, he found himself under the necessity of employing a private surveyor to find the corners of section 31 in which his land is situate. The evidence offered by him at the trial (the map and field notes of the official surveyor) shows that these corners, as well as the quarter-section corners, were marked by posts, or other monuments, properly lettered at the time of the survey and many of them identified by the distance and bearing of witness trees, as well as by their relation to the shore of the ocean, the stream known as "Whale Gulch" and the crest of the high ridge dividing that stream from the ocean. There is no evidence in the record that any search was made for the corner posts or witness trees, which, if found, would have ended the question as to the true location of plaintiff's land. But, assuming that the proper effort was made to find the corner posts, and witness trees, and that it was fruitless, the most obvious alternative was to trace the township line to its intersection with the line of ordinary high tide on the ocean shore—that being the southwest corner of the township—then measure 1.80 chains east from that point and thence 20 chains north for the southeast corner of plaintiff's land, then 80 chains on the same course for the northeast corner, thence 20 chains west for its northwest corner, thence south to the ocean shore, thence along the shore to a point due west of the southeast corner, and then close upon that.

This, indeed, is precisely what plaintiff's surveyor (Chapman) undertook to do, but did not do. There is a very serious question in the case, whether he ever found the line which bounds the township on the south. He places it in utter disregard of the field notes and plat of the official survey which he had in his hands and pretended to follow. But assuming for the moment that he may have found the true south boundary of the township, his method of tracing it to the ocean and his views as to what constitutes the shore of the ocean are most peculiar. The township plat and the field notes of the official surveyor show that the trend of the ocean shore is from northwest to southeast for many miles north and south of the township line; that east of the ocean shore at a distance of 86.20 chains this line intersects a small creek (Whale Gulch) which flows south and empties into the ocean about one mile south of that point. Between this stream and the ocean is a high ridge rising from the shore at a very steep angle for a distance of 25.80 chains, more gently for about 14 chains further and thence descending somewhat less abruptly than on the ocean side to Whale Gulch. Chapman, in order to find the intersection of the township line with the ocean shore, went over into Whale Gulch, where he discovered an "old settler" who pointed out to him the quarter-section post on the south line of section 32. This corner, which, according to the plat and field notes, ought to have been found 25 chains west of Whale Gulch, was at some distance east of that stream, but the old settler showed him a line indicated by "old blazes" on trees, which led him to what he assumed to be the quarter-section corner, and having by this remarkable process located the quarter-section corner in defiance of the official plat and field notes, he immediately falls back upon the same field notes for the purpose of locating the ocean shore. They tell him that this quarter section is 61.80 chains east of the shore, and, therefore, of course, he has only to go that distance west from the corner to find himself on the beach. He accordingly goes due west to a point exactly on the crest of the ridge which divides the water shed of the ocean from that of Whale Gulch, and, having measured the distance, finds that, by a happy coincidence, he is just 61.84 chains west of the "old settler" corner, and knows, therefore, that he is at the ocean shore, or to be strictly accurate, that he is four links beyond it. Here, again, he forgets his field notes, which tell him that this ridge is at least 25.80 chains east of the shore line on the southern boundary of the township (and its summit, judged by the angle of ascent, about 800 feet above the sea level). He is not, however, daunted by a trifle like this, but plants his post to mark the southwest corner of the township right on the "crest of the ocean" or the "cone of the ocean" according to his own varied and picturesque terminology. Having fixed this point, the rest of his task is easy. He has only to measure 20 chains north and 1.80 chains east, to find the southeast corner of plaintiff's land; thence north 80 chains, west 20 chains, south to the intersection of a meander line somewhere east of the shore line, thence with its meanders to a point due west of the southeast corner and east till he closes on that point. This he proceeds to do and the result is he has located plaintiff's land on the eastern slope of the ridge in Whale Gulch, when the field notes of the official surveyor show that not only those subdivisions of section 31 belonging to plaintiff, but the whole section extending 20 chains further east, is on the western slope of the ridge, looking down upon the ocean. And, of course, no portion of it touches the ocean shore, or comes any nearer the ocean shore than a point 1.80 chains east of the summit of the ridge. Mr. Chapman reconciles this discrepancy by assuming that the shore line of the township is coincident with the meander line by which it was measured, and he gratuitously assumes that the meander line was run along the summit of the ridge. There is not in the whole record any credible evidence to show that the meander line was so run, and in the absence of testimony the presumption is that it was run along the beach if the beach was passable, and if not, by some other method that would enable the surveyor correctly to locate the line of ordinary high tide—that being the line to which the public surveys extend. There is no evidence that the beach northward from the township line is impassable at any point, while it does affirmatively appear that south of the township line as far as the mouth of Whale Gulch it is passable, and that the same government surveyor (Perrin) who measured the west boundary of section 31 north of the line, also measured south as far as Whale Gulch, and that his measurements were made along the beach. Besides, the meander line is not itself the shore line. It is only a means of measuring and correctly locating the shore line. The survey itself extends to the line of ordinary high tide, and all the land included within that line passes to the patentee of the subdivisions shown to be so bounded by the township plat. Mr. Kimball, therefore, owns to the ocean shore on the south half of his claim. Nothing can stop him short of that natural boundary. Not even the government can come between him and the actual shore line. If, therefore, Mr. Chapman's survey is to prevail, he has made the plaintiff a present of a strip of land extending a half mile along the shore and as wide as the distance between the line of ordinary high tide and the summit of the dividing ridge between the ocean and Whale Gulch. And in doing this he has deprived plaintiff's coterminous owner on the east of a strip of equal width and a whole mile in length. I have said that there is no credible evidence to support the claim that the meander line of the seashore was run along the summit of the ridge. There was, on the contrary, conclusive evidence in Mr. Chapman's hands, at the time he chose to make that assumption, that it was not so run. He had the field notes of Perrin, who ran the meander line of the shore to the township line and the township line eastward from the ocean as far as the quarter section corner in section 34. He had also the field notes of Foreman, who made the official subdivisional survey of the township, and whose field notes of the township line correspond exactly with Perrin's—one (Perrin) measuring from the west, the other (Foreman) measuring from the east. Now take Perrin's notes, commencing at the end of his meander line, which was run for the sole purpose of locating the township line at its intersection with the ocean, they read as follows:

> "East, of corner., Tp. 5 s., R. 2 E., H. M. set post 4 ft. long, 4x4 in mound of rock 4 ft. base, 2 ft., high.
> Cor., fractional sec. 31, from which cor. I run East on south boundary sec. 31.
> Varia. 17 degs. 35 min. East.
> Ascending steep rocky sides.
> 21.80 Set post 4 ft. long, 4x4 in mound of rock 8½ ft. base 2 ft. high, cor., Secs. 31 and 32 land rough and broken;
> Soil 3rd. rate, rocky.
> February 14th, 1876.
> East, on south Boundary Sec. 32.
> Vari. 17 degs. 35 mins. East.
> Ascending steep rocky side
> 4.00 Top of slide and enter grassy opening

> 64.40 Stream in deep gulch 10 links wide course South."

It will be observed that to mark the southwest corner of the township he sets his post not at, but east of, the corner, and this, for a reason sufficiently obvious. Set at the line of ordinary high tide it would have been exposed to the wash of every spring tide, and with its mound of stones would have been obliterated by the first storm. Set east of the corner it exactly indicated the point of intersection of the shore and township lines—the true southwest corner of the township. Having thus established this corner he proceeded to lay out the township line to the eastward. If he understood his duty and a public officer is presumed not only to know, but to perform, his duty), he commenced his measurement at the true shore line, which is, indeed, the proper construction of his notes; for that corner of the fractional section 31 coincides with the southwest corner of the township. Wherever one is, the other necessarily is, and the notes clearly show that he ran east from the corner and not from the post which he set on the line east of the corner. But if it were conceded that he commenced at the post and not at the corner it would only be so much the worse for Mr. Chapman's deductions. Instead of bringing the true shore line nearer to the summit of the ridge it would put it farther away, by just the distance between the corner and the post. From whichever point he measured he found that it was 21.80 chains to the common corner of sections 31 and 32 and at least four chains farther, on any construction of his field notes, to the summit of the ridge, where Chapman takes the liberty of locating the ocean shore, and where he found some scattered stones which he concludes are the remains of the mound erected by Perrin to mark the southwest corner of the township. Enough has been said, I think, to demonstrate how absurdly fallacious were the means resorted to by Chapman for locating the shore line of the ocean—a natural monument that locates itself—how gratuitous his assumption that the meander line was traced along the top and sides of a lofty ridge more than a quarter of a mile from the beach, and how inconsequential that fact would have been if it had been a fact.

Having no guide for the location of that part of the township line except the field notes of Perrin and Foreman, which exactly agreed as to such conspicuous natural monuments as Whale Gulch, the summit of a high ridge and the ocean shore, he discards all these in his search for a starting point, in favor of a stake pointed out by an old settler, more than a quarter of a mile from the place indicated by the natural monuments and not otherwise identified, than by a line of "old blazes on trees"—a kind of mark not mentioned in any surveyor's field notes, and not explained or given any significance by his own testimony, or that of any other witness. The genesis of this old settler corner will be shown when we come to consider the York survey, evidence of which was introduced for the purpose of corroborating Chapman, and it will appear to be an extremely frail foundation for the structure that has been reared upon it. At this point it is sufficient to say that Chapman, by adoping it as the basis of his survey, has made a location of plaintiff's land which utterly falsifies every important feature of the official survey which it was his duty to follow. An instance of its discrepancies not before mentioned is the distance on his line, according to his estimate (he did not take the trouble to measure it), between Whale Gulch and the seashore. He testifies that it was not more than 5 chains from his post on the ridge down to the ocean, and only 10 chains in the opposite direction to Whale Gulch, making the total distance only 15 chains. Foreman's field notes and the approved plat show the true distance to be 86.20 chains. If his estimate of the distance is even approximately correct, his line must have been run within a quarter of a mile of the mouth of Whale Gulch—three-quarters of a mile south of the true line as platted on the township map. It is probable, however, that he greatly underestimated the distance from the summit of the ridge to the ocean, for the shorter the distance the less the absurdity of making the summit the ocean shore. And all plaintiff's other witnesses on this point exceeded his estimate, one placing the distance at 1,200 feet or over. If this witness was correct, Chapman's survey locates plaintiff's land a quarter of a mile away from the ocean, which, by the official survey, is its western boundary; if Chapman was correct his township line was located much too far south.

I have thus far discussed Chapman's survey with sole reference to the field notes (Perrin's and Foreman's) by which he professes to have been guided. He had, it is true, the field notes of another surveyor (Glover), but since his survey was altogether east of section 33, they did not touch section 31 or section 32, and could not possibly have aided Chapman at this stage of the proceedings. But after he had completed his survey of plaintiff's land by measuring it off and setting boundary posts at the corners and along the sides, he made a survey for another party to locate the southeast quarter of section 34, and in that connection ran some lines and made some measurements from one of Glover's corners which are supposed to corroborate the survey he made for plaintiff.

For the purpose of considering this part of plaintiff's case, it is necessary to give a brief outline of the proceedings of three official surveyors employed at different times in the survey of township 5 south, range 2 east, Humboldt meridian, and two adjoining townships. The history of these surveys is plainly written upon the face of the township plats and in the field notes from which they were compiled, copies of which were introduced in evidence by the plaintiff. Bearing in mind that in laying off townships to the east of the Humboldt base and meridian, those in range 1 east were naturally marked out before those in range 2, and that the meridian line bounding range 1 on the east became necessarily the western boundary of range 2, it appears that this common boundary was established by the official survey of S. W. Foreman in 1874. By his survey, it was found that the length of the township line from the northeast corner of township 5 south, range 1 east, to the Pacific ocean was 385 chains, or, in other words, 95 chains short of six miles, and the plat shows that the established common cornet of the two townships on the shore line (the southeast corner of 1 and southwest corner of 2) was just 65 chains south of the southeast corner of section 24 of township 5 south, range 1 east, Humboldt meridian.

In 1876, another surveyor (George H. Perrin) was employed to complete the subdivisional survey of township 24 north, range 19 west, Mt. Diablo base and meridian. The north boundary of this tier of townships in the Mt. Diablo system did not quite coincide with the south boundary of township 5 south of the Humboldt system. It seems that there was a space between them, and that Perrin was instructed to locate the south line of township 5 south, range 2 east of the Humboldt system in order to close his survey of township 24 north, range 19 west of the Mt. Diablo system upon that line. The method adopted by him for locating the southern boundary of township 5 south, range 2 east, was to start from the southern extremity of its western boundary at its intersection with the shore line of the ocean, and meander that line to a point 95 chains south of his starting point. This was a perfectly correct method, and, since his measurements seem to have been carefully made, would have yielded a correct result if, unfortunately, he had not mistaken his proper starting point. He commenced his meander line a little more than 20 chains south and a little less than 40 chains east from the right point, and in consequence placed the township line a quarter of a mile too far to the south, and added a half mile to the west border of the township. The subdivisional survey subsequently made shows this. By reference to the map it will be seen that the western tier of sections (18, 19, 30, etc.) are 38 and a fraction chains over a mile in width from east to west, and the common corner of sections 19 and 30 in 2 east, instead of coinciding with the common corner of sections 24 and 25 in 1 east, are 20.60 chains south of it. This mistake of Perrin's seems to have been the occasion of much of the confusion which has since arisen. He, however, unconscious of his error, proceeded to lay off the township line from the southern extremity of his meander line as far east as the quarter-section corner of section 34, and it is the field notes of this survey to which reference has heretofore been made.

About a year after the completion of Perrin's survey of the township line, as far as the quarter-section corner in section 34, another surveyor (J. R. Glover) seems to have been employed to continue that survey and establish the township line as far as the southwest corner of township 5 south, range 5 east. At all events, that is what he assumes to have done, as appears by a copy of his field notes certified by the Surveyor General. But there is no evidence that any subdivisional survey was ever based on his survey of the township line. It was in 1883, six years after Glover's survey, that Foreman was employed to make the subdivisional survey of this township and to resurvey its east and south boundaries. This he did, and his survey was adopted and approved, and the land sold by reference to a plat compiled from his field notes, a circumstance which puts Glover's survey and notes completely out of the case. They either conform to Foreman's notes or they do not. In the former case they are superfluous, in the latter incompetent, and only serve the purpose of further confusing an inquiry which is sufficiently confused without them. It is to Foreman's field notes, and the official plat, that we must look for guidance in relocating the lost corners of the subdivisional survey, and whatever Glover did, not only may, but must, be left out of the consideration, if it conflicts with what Foreman did. His survey was superseded by the resurvey. It could, at most, have the effect of corroborating the latter in some collateral way, but cannot be allowed to contradict it. The question is not where Glover put the township line, but where Foreman finally established it, and the only evidence we have of that is his field notes, and the official plats of township 5 south, range 2 east, Humboldt meridian, and township 24 north, range 19 west, Mt. Diablo meridian, of which that township line is the common boundary. These show a perfect correspondence with Perrin's field notes as to the western portion of the line—noting at the same distances the seashore, Whale Gulch, section and quarter-section corners, and witness trees.

To return now to the survey made by Chapman of the southeast quarter of section 34, and the measurements based upon that by which he claims to have confirmed the correctness of his location of plaintiff's land: His testimony shows that he selected as the starting point of that survey a corner described in Glover's field notes. In other words, he prefers a corner established by a superseded survey to all the conspicuous landmarks noted in the later official survey, and the only conclusion is that, if he surveyed correctly from the point so selected, there is no correspondence between Glover's survey and Foreman's survey—a very probable supposition on other grounds; for Glover's method of locating the east end of Perrin's line, as described in his (Glover's) field notes and the testimony of the witness Riley, was not such as to inspire much confidence in the result of his labors.

The first survey made for the purpose of locating plaintiff's land after the approval of Foreman's official survey, was made in 1894 by Richard York, county surveyor of Mendocino county, for Stewart, the original patentee and plaintiff's grantor. Evidence of York's location of the land was introduced for the purpose of corroborating Chapman's survey. York, himself, was not called as a witness, and his field notes—which should have been on file in the county surveyor's office—were not produced; but Breeden and Howard, who, as chairmen, assisted in making the survey, testified from recollection as to the manner in which it was made, and that the location of plaintiff's land by York was practically identical with Chapman's location. But their testimony also showed that this survey corresponded with Chapman's only because, like Chapman's, it was based exclusively upon an erroneous location of the quarter-section corner of section 32. York's method of locating that corner was to start from the southeast corner of the township at a distance of 4½ miles to the east, and chain that distance on a course which the witnesses are unable to state. As to whether it was due west or only approximating that course, there is no competent evidence; and there is likewise no competent evidence that he started from the southeast corner of the township. Neither Breeden nor Howard pretends to be a surveyor, or to know, of his own knowledge, that the point from which they commenced their chain measurement was the true southeast corner of the township. Howard says: "We started on the east line of 36; they [meaning, I suppose, York] called it the township line; I don't know; we found a post at the corner of 36, from that course we ran west clear to the ocean—the bluff," etc. Breeden's testimony upon this point is the same in effect as Howard's, except that he does not expressly state that he did not know of his own knowledge that the post from which York started was on the township line. Fairly construed, however, all the testimony as to this essential fact was pure hearsay. But, passing this objection, and allowing that the measurement was made from the true southeast corner of the township, the mode of locating the corner at or near the end of the measured course was contrary to law. There is nothing better settled by authority or statute than the rule that courses and distances are controlled, in the fixing of boundaries, by visible monuments, unless there are other sufficient circumstances to corroborate the former. See section 2077, Code Civ. Proc., and Miller v. Grunsky, 141 Cal. 450, 66 Pac. 858, 75 Pac. 48. And this is especially true when the boundaries themselves are permanent and visible, such as the bank of a navigable river or the shore of an ocean. As to the mode of locating this quarter-section corner of section 32, Breeden, who admits that he cannot remember the exact distances they ran except where they set or found corners, says that when they got to section 32 "we found a part of a stake or some object there, I don't know what it was; we found a stake having the appearance of a corner," etc. Howard says: "They found a stub there that they thought would prove to be a stake; the stake had been burned years before. It was so rotten you could not tell—we set a stake there, then we went on west to 31 and 32, and then we located Mr. Stewart's claim." This tells the whole story. Neither Breeden nor Howard knows whether York had any field notes to guide him. If he had any, they were probably Glover's, as may be inferred from the fact that his survey co-ordinates itself with Chapman's survey from a Glover corner. Certainly, if he had Foreman's notes—identical with Perrin's—and the only notes he was at liberty to follow, he entirely disregarded them. They, if they had been consulted, would have told him that the quarter-section corner of section 32 was marked, not by a stake, but by a leaning madrona tree, ten inches in diameter, and by the distance and bearing of two witness trees—a madrona and oak; that instead of being nearly a quarter of a mile east of Whale Gulch, it was more than a quarter of a mile west of it, and that instead of being nearly 100 chains from the ocean shore it was only 61.60 chains from that imposing landmark. Here, then, was a corner located by course and distance alone, and absurdly out of relation to a fixed and unmistakable natural boundary, and to every monument and landmark called for in the field notes of the official survey. A location of lost corners by a survey from a corner so established is utterly worthless; it is a survey made contrary to law. Code Civ. Proc. § 2077. York's survey, therefore, instead of corroborating Chapman's, merely serves to explain Chapman's mistake. It furnishes, as above intimated, the genesis of the "old settler" corner. For Howard testifies that they replaced the rotten fragment of a stake with a new stake; and that no doubt soon acquired among the neighboring settlers the reputation of being what it purported to be—the proper mark of that quarter-section corner. As such it was pointed out to Chapman, who made it the basis of his survey without regard to mountain, stream or ocean.

Plaintiff also called as a witness a Mr. Champagne, who had acted as a chainman for one Sandow in making a survey of plaintiff's land about two years before the trial. His survey assumed to start from the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21, and resulted practically in the same location as Chapman's. If Champagne knew of his own knowledge where the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21 was, his testimony would lend some faint support to plaintiff's case, but he does not say that he knew the corner—he saw a corner marked by a stake and a tree, but does not explain how it was identified as the corner which Sandow took it to be; and Sandow, himself, did not testify, having, as it is stated, left the country. Champagne's testimony, standing by itself, would leave it very uncertain whether Sandow really started from the quarter-section corner between 20 and 21, while the fact that his survey coincides with those of York and Chapman tends strongly to prove that he must have started from another York corner established by him in surveying from a Glover corner, or from his erroneous location of the quarter-section corner of section 32. But whether this surmise is correct, or not, it is certain that the Sandow survey cannot impart vitality to one so fatally at variance with natural boundaries and monuments as Chapman's is.

The southwest corner of section 31 is the southwest corner of the township, and that is marked by the intersection of the township line with the shore of the ocean. To locate subdivisions of that section the survey should start from that corner, and if a survey from that corner locates them in one place, with their west boundary at the shore line, a survey starting from an interior quarter-section corner, nearly two miles distant from the nearest corner of section 31, which locates the same subdivisions in a different place and entirely away from the ocean shore, cannot be said to raise a substantial conflict. For, in the first place, a township corner is a monument of higher grade than any interior corner, and, in the next place, natural monuments—such as the shore of the ocean—which are incapable of being moved or mistaken, are always preferred to artificial monuments, and especially to artificial monuments at remoter distances.

In this review of the evidence, I have not forgotten the witness Burg, and I have not forgotten Perrin. Burg merely acted as axeman for Chapman in making the survey from the Glover corner, which, as explained above, counts for nothing. Perrin was taken on the ground after the completion of Chapman's survey for the purpose of seeing whether he had correctly located the township line. He went on the ground 25 years after this survey, without his field notes, and, looking at Chapman's stake at the summit of the ridge, concluded, from his recollection of the topography, that it was placed at or very near—practically at the same point—where he had set a post to mark the end of his meander line and the southwest corner of the township. This evidence, given on his direct examination, it is needless to say was flatly contradicted by his own field notes, as above quoted, and on his cross-examination he admitted over and over again that where his testimony differed from his field notes his recollection was at fault. So that if, as he testified from recollection, he set his post at the end of his meander line to mark the southwest corner of the township that line must have ended at least 25.80 chains west of the ridge, instead of directly on top of it, where Chapman's post was set, and must have been run, as I have assumed it was run, along or near the beach. The evidence of Perrin, so far from supporting Chapman, is directly against him, for at last he swears by his field notes, and nothing confutes Chapman more completely than they do, corroborated as they are in every particular by Foreman's notes.

An important topographical feature, to which frequent reference has been made, is Whale Gulch. Its distance from the ocean, and its relation to section and quarter-section corners have been extensively commented upon in the foregoing discussion of the evidence, and it would not be proper to omit all reference to the iterated and reiterated assertion of counsel for respondent, based apparently on Mr. Chapman's testimony, that neither Perrin nor Foreman mention or refer to Whale Gulch in their field notes. It is somewhat surprising that counsel should have been so easily misled in so simple a matter, for the only basis of Chapman's claim that the notes do not mention Whale Gulch is that they do not mention it by name. They both mention it—Perrin, as a stream in a deep gulch, 10 links wide, course south; Foreman, as a small creek in a gulch running east. All the evidence in the case, including Chapman's own testimony, shows that this small stream, or creek, was Whale Gulch, and nothing else. The official map of the adjoining township on the south shows it at the same distance from the ocean on the township line that Foreman places it in township 5 south, range 2 east, Humboldt meridian, and also shows its course from that point to its mouth in the ocean. The photographs also put in evidence by plaintiff, and taken from a point near the mouth of Whale Gulch, corroborate the map. They show the relation of the gulch to the ridge, and to Chapman's stake. It was not necessary to give a name to the gulch in the field notes, even if it had acquired a name at the dates of the surveys, which does not appear.

The fact has been mentioned that Perrin located the township line a fraction over 20 chains too far south. It is not to be understood that it can now be correctly relocated. For it appears that Foreman, in his resurvey, adopted Perrin's line and based his subdivisional survey upon it. He must have discovered at an early stage of the subdivisional survey the fact that the township line was too far south, and to satisfy himself as to the source of the error, he carefully retraced the meander line of the ocean, and discovered, as his field notes show, the error of Perrin in starting from the point "a" instead of the point "A," when he undertook to locate a point on the seashore 95 chains south of "A," which marks the southeast corner of township 5 south, range 1 east, Humboldt meridian. He, however, resumed his subdivisional survey on the line upon which he had started—Perrin's line—and completed it by closing on the eastern line of the adjoining township, adding, as the map shows, nearly a half mile to the western boundary of that which he was surveying. His field notes of the survey of section 31—which correspond exactly with the official plat—show that he commenced at the common corner of sections 31 and 32 on the township line 21.80 chains east of the seashore, that he ran north 40 chains, between sections 31 and 32 along a southwest slope, and there set a marked post and stone witnessed by two trees—at 60 chains he entered dense chapparal, at 80 chains he set a post to mark the common corner of sections 29, 30, 31, and 32, properly marked, and witnessed by four trees—giving distances and bearings. He describes the land along this course as mountainous, soil third grade, first half mile in open prairie, balance dense chapparal. Scattering oak and madrona. His notes as to the next course running west to the ocean read as follows:

> "As this line ends in the ocean in less than a mile I run
> W. on true line bet. secs. 30-31
> Var. 17 degs. 42 min. E.
> Steep descent
> 40. Set a post 4 ft. long 4 ins., sq., 24 ins., in the ground with mkd stone for ¼ sec. Cor. in stone mound 4x2 ft. mkd. ¼ S. on N. face.
> No tree in limits.
> 50.35 Intersect the Pacific ocean on station No. 3 of meanders in sec. 30 and set a post 4 ft. long 4 ins, sq., 24 ins, in the ground for cor., to fractional secs., 30, 31 mkd., T. 5 S., R. 2 E. on E. S. 30 on N. and S. 31 on S. faces; raises a mound of stones around post.
> No trees in limits.
> land steep W. slope
> Soil 3rd rate
> partly open grass land and partly dense chapparal."

These notes clearly show that the whole of the section was surveyed on the west slope of the ridge, that on its south boundary the section line was 21.80 chains and on its north boundary 50.35 chains from the ocean. Plaintiff's east line is 20 chains west of the east line of the section, and the south half of his west line is the seashore. In relocating the corners of this section these notes, and their calls for natural monuments, are not to be disregarded in favor of a quarter section post in Whale Gulch, placed as it appears by county surveyor York in utter disregard of every call in the official survey—and upon no better evidence as to its proper location than a chain measurement of a course 4½ miles in length from a point assumed to be the southeast corner of the township by witnesses who do not pretend to be surveyors, and whose testimony upon that point is essentially hearsay.

It is urged by counsel for respondent that even conceding an error in Chapman's survey, and that plaintiff's land is west of his location, the verdict ought not to be disturbed, because there is evidence in the record that defendant peeled the trees on the western slope of the ridge. There is such evidence, but it also appears that while the growth of tan oak east of the ridge is very abundant, there are but few trees scattered along certain ravines on the west slope, and the verdict for $5,000 was based upon proof of a large quantity of bark stripped from the trees in Whale Gulch. The verdict, therefore, is not supported by the evidence as to the comparatively trifling amount cut on the west slope.

The principal errors of the court in ruling upon objections to evidence consisted in admitting the testimony of Breeden, Howard, and Champagne, as to the York and Sandow surveys, without sufficient preliminary evidence that they were made from correctly located starting points. Minor errors need not be noticed in detail. In view of the foregoing discussion they are not likely to be repeated on a retrial of the issues.

The order denying a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; HARRISON, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. I think there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict, under the rules applicable in this court.

NOTE.—McFARLAND, J., being unable to act, HARRISON, J., one of the Justices of the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District, participates herein pro tempore, pursuant to section 4, art. 6, of the Constitution.

NOTE.—The following is the opinion of SHAW, J., in departmemt, referred to:

The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover damages for an alleged trespass upon real estate belonging to the plaintiff. The trespass complained of consisted of stripping tan bark from a large number of oak trees growing upon the premises.

The land described in the complaint consisted of four government subdivisions contiguous to each other, and constituting a tract one mile in length from north to south, and one-fourth of a mile in width except at the southernmost part thereof where the Pacific ocean cut off one corner thereof. The three southernmost tracts lay in section 31, township 5 south, range 2 east, Humboldt meridian, and were described as lots 1, 3, and 4 of said section, being the lots corresponding to the west half of the northeast quarter, and the fractional northwest quarter of the southeast quarter thereof. The northerly tract constituted the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 30. The principal contention upon the trial arose over the location of the land with reference to the government survey, and a large part of the evidence relates to the location of the monuments placed at the corners by the government surveyors and the topography described in the field notes of the official survey. The appeal is from the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. Many objections and exceptions were taken to the rulings of the lower court upon the admission or rejection of evidence, and these are alleged as errors which require a reversal of the order.

The plaintiff derived title under a patent from the United States issued to John L. Stewart. The patent describes the subdivisions above mentioned, and refers to the official plat of the survey of said land returned to the General Land Office by the Surveyor General. A certified copy of this official plat was introduced in evidence. It shows that the official survey of the township in question consisted of separate surveys of different parts of the township, made by different surveyors, at different times. The west boundary was surveyed by S. W. Foreman under contract of June 24, 1874; part of the south boundary was surveyed by G. H. Perrin under contract of January 26, 1876; the remaining part of the south boundary was surveyed by J. R. Glover under contract of November 13, 1876, and the whole of the south boundary was resurveyed and the lines of the sections and minor subdivisions of the township were surveyed by Foreman under contract of January 13, 1883. It appears from the evidence that the survey by Perrin of a part of the south boundary was done under a contract for a survey of the township immediately south, being township 24 north, range 19 west, Mount Diablo meridian, and many of the so-called corners established by Perrin referred to in the evidence are what are called "closing corners" made by him in joining the survey in township 24 to that in township 5. A survey of plaintiff's land was made by Mr. Chapman and the plaintiff's case depends on the accuracy of his location of the southeast corner of section 31 and other corners on the south township line from which the location of the boundaries of plaintiff's land was determined. The defendant claims that Chapman placed the boundaries about one-fourth of a mile from their true location. One of the principal questions in the case was whether or not Foreman's survey of the south township line was identical with Perrin's and whether or not Chapman found the true location according to the intendment of the patent. Chapman, in his survey, attempted to follow the lines as shown by the field notes of the Foreman survey rather than those of the Perrin survey. The time of the issuing of the patent is not given in the record, or, at least, our attention is not called to it, but it is manifest from the evidence that it was issued after the making of all these surveys and the acceptance thereof as shown on the official plat.

The objection to the introduction of the field notes of surveyor Foreman, showing the resurvey of the southern boundary of the township, was properly overruled. These field notes were certified by the Surveyor General as a copy of the field notes of Foreman on file in his office, and the official plats sufficiently identify them as the field notes on which the patent was issued. They therefore became, in legal effect, a part of the patent (if no pre-emption or homestead rights have intervened, and none appear here) which constituted the plaintiff's title, and, were properly admitted in evidence. Chapman v. Polack, 70 Cal. 487, 11 Pac. 764. It was not necessary to show any reason for the making of the resurvey. Prior to the issuing of the patent the government could make any number of surveys, as its officers might direct, and the last-accepted survey is presumed to be the one on which the patent was issued, unless the contrary appears.

The various objections made to the admission in evidence of the field notes of the Glover survey and of the action of the court in allowing references to be made to the field notes of Foreman are disposed of by the remarks already made concerning the authenticity of these surveys. They each constituted a part of the survey of the township in which the land was situated, and, for the purpose of locating the land, it is proper to refer to either or both of them so far as they would aid in fixing the landmarks and boundaries.

Two witnesses, Breeden and Howard, testified that they were present and assisted one Richard York, county surveyor, in making a survey of the land in question, some eight years before the trial. Objection was made to these references to the survey of York upon the ground that there was no competent evidence that any such survey was made, nor that, if made, it was accurate or correct. If these witnesses had been called to prove the survey of York, this perhaps would have been an error, but it is manifest from their whole testimony that this was not the purpose. They were asked to testify with relation to certain landmarks which were found in the course of the survey and which they were as competent to observe and describe as any other person, and the point of this part of their testimony, so far as it was material, consisted in the fact that these landmarks to some extent corresponded with those mentioned in the survey of the plaintiff's land made by Chapman, which last-mentioned survey was introduced in evidence. Their testimony as to the existence of the landmarks some eight years before the trial was some corroboration of the later survey by Chapman. It was also admissible to show that they were familiar with the lines of the land in question according to the theory of the plaintiff, that is, with their location, as fixed by the survey of Chapman. This familiarity was necessary as a foundation for further testimony by Howard concerning the damage done to plaintiff's land by the stripping of the bark from the timber thereon.

The defendant was called as a witness by the plaintiff to testify to the fact that if the south boundary of the township was extended west from the established corner between sections 34 and 35, it would pass near to the stake established by Mr. Chapman, the plaintiff's surveyor, as the southeast corner of section 31, in which the plaintiff's land is situated, and to the additional fact that the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21 in the same township was a well-known corner and marked by well-known, visible monuments. Upon cross-examination by the defendant's counsel he was asked a number of questions which called for facts, or for his opinion concerning facts, affecting the respective merits of the two surveys, that alleged to have been made by Mr. Perrin of the south boundary of the township on the one hand, and claimed by the defendant to be conclusive as to the location of the land, and that made by Mr. Chapman for the plaintiff on the other hand, and which, according to the plaintiff's claim, established the corners so as to cover the land upon which the defendant committed the trespasses. These questions were objected to as not proper cross-examination and were excluded by the court. There was no error in this. While some of the preliminary questions put to the defendant on examination in chief referred to these surveys, it was plainly not the object or purpose of the testimony elicited from him by the plaintiff to prove any facts except the two above mentioned—the location of a line extended west from the corner of section 34 with respect to the Chapman stake, and the well-known character of the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21. The defendant had not the right, upon the cross-examination concerning these facts, to go into an extended cross-examination with reference to the details of the respective surveys. Two of the questions objected to called for a description of the place where the stake of Chapman was set as the southeast corner of section 31 and of the objects which were visible from that point. If there had been any dispute concerning the location of this stake, this evidence might have been properly admitted, but, as matter of fact, there never was any question or doubt concerning it. The dispute was not as to the actual location of this stake on the ground, but as to the place where it should have been located according to the official government survey. The exclusion of this testimony, even if erroneous, could have caused no substantial injury.

Complaint is made of the action of the court in allowing a witness to testify concerning a survey made by one Sandow. The objection was that there was no competent evidence of any such survey, and that it was not proper to prove its accuracy or its existence by the testimony of those who assisted in making it. The testimony, however, was competent for the purpose for which it was introduced. The witness assisted Mr. Sandow in making the survey, and saw and observed the landmarks located by Mr. Sandow. Some of these were mentioned also in the original government survey. He subsequently assisted the plaintiff's surveyor, Mr. Chapman, in making a resurvey and relocation of the land, and upon that occasion saw many of the same landmarks. The corner from which Sandow started in making his survey was the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21, which was the same corner which the plaintiff himself testified was a well-known and well-marked corner. The witness testified to the courses and distances, run from thence, under his own observation, by Sandow, to the land in dispute, and his testimony tended to show that the correct measurement and course from that corner, according to the government survey, would locate the land in substantially the same place as that established by Chapman's survey, and consequently it would tend to corroborate the accuracy of Chapman's survey, and to show that it corresponded with the quarter-section corner which the defendant testified was well established. He testified to what he saw and not to statements made by Sandow. It was therefore competent and relevant testimony.

The testimony of the witness Burg was properly admitted for the purpose of identifying the land subsequently testified to by Pryor. Pryor was called to testify concerning the commission of the trespasses complained of, and he stated in a preliminary way that the particular land concerning which he testified was pointed out to him by Burg as the land belonging to the plaintiff, according to the survey made by Chapman. It was proper, therefore, to prove by Burg that he correctly pointed out the land to the witness Pryor. As the witness Pryor did not pretend to know anything about the accuracy of the surveys, the question put to him concerning the same was correctly excluded. A good deal is said in argument concerning a remark made by the court after questions to Pryor had been repeated several times by defendant's attorney. The defendant's attorney, in answer to some statements by the court, said: "I have a right to cross-examine the witness." To which the court said: "You have no right to impeach him." This is the remark complained of. We do not think the action of the court was so serious as to require a reversal of the case. It is true that counsel was not endeavoring at that time to impeach the witness, and the remark of the court, if it was properly taken down, appears to have been irrelevant. We cannot perceive how it could have done substantial harm to the defendant's cause.

The complaint made concerning the refusal of the court to permit the extended cross-examination of the plaintiff Kimball with respect to the details of a survey made by Chapman which he witnessed is without foundation. In his examination in chief the plaintiff had merely testified that he saw Mr. Chapman set the corners of his land, and that he afterwards pointed out the same corners to one George Howard, who subsequently testified concerning the trespasses complained of. The cross-examination was properly excluded for the reason given in regard to the cross-examination of the witness Burg, namely, that the witness had not, in his testimony in chief, claimed any knowledge of the accuracy of the Chapman survey, and that he was not called for the purpose of proving its accuracy.

There was no error in the instructions given by the court at the request of the plaintiff. The instructions complained of were as follows: "(1) I charge you that the government of the United States can make a new survey and change and correct an older or erroneous survey while the land affected thereby remains government land; and after the acceptance by the land department of the correcting survey, the latter becomes the authorized and official one." "(3) I charge you that any corner or monument established by Perrin in his survey of 1876 was, so far as the land situated in township 5 south, range 2 east, Humboldt meridian, is concerned, superseded by the corresponding corner or monument established or used by Foreman in his survey of 1883, if the latter survey disagrees with the former in relation thereto." "(4) I charge you that while it is true that the United States government can change or correct the surveys of its lands as it may see fit while the same remain government lands, after they are disposed of to settlers or purchasers the last surveys made for, and accepted by, the land department before the disposal or purchase, is final and unchangeable; and any surveyor, who for private parties thereafter undertakes to re-establish or relocate lines or corners, should endeavor as nearly as possible to follow in the footsteps of the surveyor who made the last-accepted government survey and place the corners and lines where they were placed by him." "(5) If you should find from all the evidence in the case, that Foreman, in his survey in 1883, did not use the same line or the same location of corners run and established by Perrin in 1876, yet as to all the lines and corners which were not run or established by Perrin at all, but by Foreman only, the survey of Foreman must govern without regard to the question whether or not he used the same line on the south boundary of the township, which was used by Perrin." "(7) If you find from all the evidence in the case that the township surveyed by Perrin and that surveyed by Foreman were so surveyed by them respectively that the lines thereof overlapped, yet the survey of Foreman must be followed in the township surveyed by him." "(11) I charge you that if you find from the evidence that Chapman, the surveyor, fixed the lines of plaintiff's lands substantially in accordance with the Foreman survey of 1883, it is your duty to bring in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, J. A. Kimball, and fix the amount of damages in accordance with instructions heretofore given."

The official plat which was introduced in evidence was not in any way impeached or contradicted. It established the fact beyond controversy that the original survey of part of the south boundary of township 5 by Perrin was resurveyed by Foreman in 1883, and this being the case, the survey by Foreman would control in all disputes concerning the identity of the land included in the government patent subsequently issued. There was no evidence that any settler or purchaser had acquired any rights in the land in question between the time of the two surveys. It is propable from the evidence that the survey of township 24 made by Perrin in 1876 overlapped to some extent the survey of township 5 made by Foreman in 1883. But this fact cannot avail the defendant in his defense to this action. He does not claim any land in township 24 under the Perrin survey or any other survey. His defense consisted entirely in an attempt to show that the land upon which he stripped the timber of its bark was not the land patented to the plaintiff's predecessor Stewart. From the evidence there can be no controversy over the fact that the subdivisions patented to Stewart were the subdivisions as surveyed and located by Foreman by the survey of 1883. That survey is, therefore, the one which must control the location of the land in question. Wherever that survey conflicts in any respect with the previous survey made by Perrin of the township to the south thereof, the Foreman survey must be considered as having superseded all previous surveys with respect to the land in township 5. The land of the plaintiff did not at any point touch the southern boundary of the township in which it was situated. Its location was controlled entirely by the corners and lines of the interior subdivisions as established by the Foreman survey. The only purpose which the Perrin survey could serve in establishing the location of the land was that of a check to the survey made by Foreman, and to aid in ascertaining the true location of the latter. The true location of the Foreman lines, however, when ascertained, establishes the location of the interior subdivisions of the township, regardless of any discrepancy that may exist between said lines and the south boundary of the township as established by Perrin, even if we should admit that the resurvey of that boundary by Foreman was not controlling. We do not think that the instructions complained of assume the existence of any fact which is not conclusively established by uncontradicted evidence, or by the law regarding official surveys of he United States government. Some complaint is made that the instructions given at the request of the defendant are inconsistent with those given by the plaintiff. Upon examining them, however, we do not think that the inconsistency exists.

Objections were sustained to a number of questions put by the defendant in cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses and in the examination of his own witnesses upon the ground that they were not in proper form. Many of these questions called for the conclusions of the witnesses, who were not experts, concerning the accuracy of the surveys and the situation or location of the land with respect thereto, and were incompetent for those reasons. Others were argumentative in form, and were properly rejected for that reason. It is not necessary to prolong this opinion to discuss errors of this character. The principle that questions of such form are improper is well established.

The last point made by the defendant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. We have examined it and are satisfied that there was abundant evidence in support of the plaintiff's case. The question is squarely presented whether the survey of Chapman, made by the plaintiff, indicated the correct location of the land in controversy. There was evidence sufficient to show that it did, and the contradictory evidence, such as it was, would have scarcely been sufficient, if taken alone, to justify a contrary conclusion.

The order is affirmed.

149 Cal. 464

PEOPLE v. FELD. (Cr. 1270.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1906.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — DENYING MOTION IN ARREST.

An order denying a motion in arrest of judgment in a criminal case is not appealable.

2. SAME—REVIEW ON APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT.

The action of the court in denying a motion in arrest of judgment in a criminal case is reviewable on appeal from the judgment.

3. HOMICIDE — MURDER IN THE FIRST DEGREE — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence on a trial for homicide examined and held to support a conviction of murder in the first degree.

4. CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — VERDICT — CONCLUSIVENESS.

The court on appeal must assume that the evidence in support of the prosecution is true, and the verdict cannot be disturbed on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 3074–3083.]

5. SAME—ERRORS IN ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE —PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Where, on a trial for homicide, the evidence admitted without objection showed the alarm of the inmates of the house where the homicide occurred on learning that accused was outside seeking to gain admission, the error in permitting the son of decedent to testify that when he started from the kitchen to the front door, the son handed decedent a bread knife, and told him to take it and protect himself, was not prejudicial.

6. SAME—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

On the trial of accused for the murder of his father-in-law, the district attorney, to show the intent of accused in going to the home of decedent on the night of the homicide and his feelings toward the inmates of that home, offered to show that accused had mistreated his wife both before and after the killing. Objections to the testimony were sustained. Before closing his case, the district attorney recalled witnesses, and was allowed by the court to state that he desired to show by them that accused prior to the homicide made threats against his wife, and had mistreated her immediately after the killing. The court sustained an objection to the offer. Held, that as the question as to the admissibility of the evidence was a debatable one, the district attorney was not guilty of misconduct constituting reversible error.

7. SAME—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY THOSE GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse instructions requested by accused which are covered by instructions given.

8. HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS — SELF-DEFENSE—REFUSAL.

Where, on the trial of accused for the murder of his father-in-law, the evidence showed that accused and his wife had been living apart prior to the killing, and the court charged that where a husband and wife were living apart, neither had the superior right to the custody of a child, and that if accused called at the house of his father-in-law to see his child, and was attacked by decedent under such circumstances as to make it apparent to him as a reasonable man that it was necessary to shoot decedent to save his own life, and, so in good faith believing, shot decedent, he must be acquitted, the refusal to charge that accused had as much right to the custody of his child and as much right to enjoy his society as had the wife, and that he had a right at all reasonable times to visit the child wherever the child might be, was not erroneous.

9. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court charged that a verdict must be the unbiased verdict of each member of the jury based on his individual judgment and uninfluenced by any considerations except the evidence and the law, and there was no necessity of a special admonition, the refusal to warn the jury against being influenced by public sentiment was not erroneous.

10. SAME—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

To justify the granting of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, the evidence newly discovered must be such as to render a different result probable in the event of a new trial.

[Ed. Note—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2336.]

11. SAME—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and its action will not be disturbed in the absence of an abuse of discretion.

12. HOMICIDE—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

On the trial of accused for the murder of his father-in-law, the son of decedent testified that, at the time accused was heard outside the house of decedent, he put a bread knife, 10 or 12 inches long, into the hand of decedent, and accused testified that at the commencement of the difficulty decedent advanced on him with a knife, and that, after the shot, decedent pursued him with the knife still in his hand. The knife disappeared immediately after the homicide, and though search was made it was not found until discovered under decedent's house where apparently it had been concealed about a month after the trial. Held, that proof of the discovery of the knife did not warrant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

13. SAME.

On the trial of accused for the murder of his father-in-law, the evidence showed that when accused appeared at the front door of the house of decedent he had an iron bar with which he attempted to force open the door, and with which he inflicted a blow on decedent. Accused testified that he did not have any such weapon, and that the wife of decedent had it in her hand, and, in endeavoring to strike him, struck decedent, and that defendant took it away from her and threw it down. A bar was identified as the one used. Deponents in support of a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence stated that over a year prior to the homicide the bar, or one precisely like it, belonged to decedent. Held, that the motion for new trial was properly denied.

14. CRIMINAL LAW — NEW TRIAL — MISCONDUCT OF JURY — PROOF.

One convicted of crime who moves for a new trial on the ground of the misconduct of the jury in reading newspaper articles commenting adversely on accused must show that the articles came to the knowledge of the jurors, for unless they did, prejudice could not result.

15. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

Proof of the publication of articles in newspapers during a criminal trial containing statements adverse to accused raises no presumption that the articles came to the knowledge of the jurors, it being their duty to abstain from reading articles relative to the case.

16. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Affidavits in support of an allegation of misconduct of the jury in a criminal case made solely on information and belief of deponents are valueless as evidence, and no evidence in reply is necessary.

17. SAME—AFFIDAVITS OF JURORS AS EVIDENCE OF MISCONDUCT.

Where the charges of misconduct of the jury in a criminal case were not so supported as to require answer, the affidavits of the jurors presented in reply to the motion for a new trial on the ground of misconduct cannot be deemed proof of misconduct except so far as the averments therein affirmatively show misconduct.

18. SAME.

On a motion for a new trial on the ground of the misconduct of the jury in reading a newspaper article relating to the trial, it appeared that accused was a police officer and the article commented on the fact that one of the jurors had formerly been a police officer, and that the judge had expressed surprise at the fact that neither side had challenged or excused him, etc. Held that, as to the jurors not named in the article, there was nothing therein from which it could be concluded that any juror would be unduly influenced thereby.

19. SAME.

The juror referred to in the article filed an affidavit averring that some one had called his attention to the article and that he merely replied that it did not hurt him. Held, that though the affidavit of the juror be deemed sufficient to show knowledge of the article during the progress of the trial, there was nothing to show that he was influenced thereby.

20. SAME—QUESTION OF FACT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The determination of the trial court on an issue of fact raised on a motion for a new trial on the ground of the misconduct of the jury is conclusive on appeal.

21. HOMICIDE — MOTIVE — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, on the trial of accused for the murder of his father-in-law, the evidence showed that accused and his wife had been living apart prior to the killing, and that accused went to the house of decedent and killed him, evidence of a conversation between accused and his wife in the presence of a witness, subsequent to the homicide, in which accused made a threat against his wife relative to what he would do before he would give her money, was admissible as showing the motive with which he visited the house of decedent at the time of the homicide.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Joseph Feld was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Spinnetti and W. H. Alford (Theo. J. Roche, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, for the killing of one Fritz Dirking, and adjudged to suffer death. He appeals from the judgment and from orders denying his motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment.

1. The law gives no appeal from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment. Any error in the action of the trial court in that regard is reviewable upon appeal from the judgment. It is not claimed, however, that there was any error in denying the motion in this case.

2. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. A brief review of some of the evidence will suffice to show that the record will not support this claim. The defendant who, at the time of the homicide, November 2, 1903, was a police officer of the city and county of San Francisco, was a son-in-law of the deceased, having married his daughter some 3 years before. There was one child by this marriage, a little girl then about 2 years old. The defendant and his wife had been living separate and apart for nearly 2 months immediately preceding the homicide, the wife with the child residing at her father's home during this period. She had commenced divorce proceedings which were then pending. There had been a previous separation some few months before, and previous divorce proceedings. There was some evidence tending to show that defendant entertained feelings of bitterness toward both his wife and her family, and that on one or two occasions he had expressed such feelings when it was suggested that he should contribute to her support, one witness testifying that a few months before the homicide he told his wife he would not give her a cent, and when she suggested he might be compelled to, he said: "No—I will fix you and your whole family first." During the afternoon of the day of the homicide he was served by his wife's attorney, Mr. Hayes, with a copy of an order requiring him to pay his wife counsel fees and alimony. Hayes testified that the defendant then said to him: "I am going out to see that child. I want to see it to-night and if I don't see it there will be a rough-house, and if that ——— ——— mother of hers says a word I will give her a clout in the jaw too." The defendant, that evening, went to the home of deceased, arriving there in the neighborhood of 7 o'clock. Defendant testified that the sole object of his visit was to see his child, whom he had not seen for a month; that he had for several days been endeavoring to obtain, through his own attorney, the consent of his wife that he should so do, and that he had finally, on that day, communicated with her by telephone and told her that he was coming out after supper to see the child, and she had said it was all right. Other evidence was such, however, as to warrant the jury in concluding that no consent to his visit had been given, and that he went to the house not on the peaceable mission of merely seeing his child, but in an ugly frame of mind, inflamed by the service on him of the order for alimony and counsel fees, and bent on making a "rough-house" of it, as suggested in the statement testified to by Hayes. If he did telephone to his wife before going out, as the evidence indicates, it is not believable that the message was of the nature testified to by him, or that she consented to his coming, for his arrival on the premises apparently greatly alarmed the occupants of the house.

The home of deceased was the lower flat of a two-story house. In the kitchen thereof, which opened on the back yard, were the deceased, his wife, defendant's wife and her brother. Defendant came into the back yard along a driveway which ran therefrom to the street, along the north side of the house. Mrs. Feld, crying, "Here he comes," ran to the kitchen door and locked it. The defendant, after trying to open this door, went around to the front door of the house, whither the two women, carrying the child, also ran through the hallway of the house, their object, as testified to, being to go out through that door, and thence to the upper flat. There was evidence tending to show that when that door was opened, the defendant appeared, having come from the rear, and that when it was attempted by those inside to close the door, he prevented them from so doing by means of an iron bar which he had. There was also evidence tending to show that defendant attempted to gain admission to the house by force, and that the deceased, who had also come to the door, and was attempting to prevent his entrance, was, during the attempt of defendant to enter, struck on the head by the bar held by defendant, and that when he told the defendant he had better go away from the house, the defendant stepped back a few feet, drew his revolver and fired the fatal shot, the bullet entering the left breast of deceased, and causing his death the next morning. There was in this sufficient warrant for the conclusion of the jury that the defendant had gone to the home of deceased, harboring feelings of bitterness against his wife and her relatives, and with a deliberate intent to obtain entry by force and violence, if necessary, and that when he found his progress in that direction impeded by deceased, he, for that reason alone, deliberately and premeditatedly, fired the fatal shot, with the intent to kill him. Under such circumstances, he would, undoubtedly, be guilty of murder in the first degree. There was, it is true, evidence at variance with that sustaining the theory above stated, but the utmost effect thereof was to produce a mere conflict of evidence, and it is certainly unnecessar here to cite authorities to sustain the proposition repeatedly enunciated by this court, to the effect that the appellate court is powerless to interfere with the verdict of the jury under such circumstances. Assuming the evidence given in support of the theory of the prosecution to be true, as we must assume in view of the verdict and the order denying a new trial, the verdict cannot be disturbed on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support it.

3. The son of the deceased testified that when his father started from the kitchen to the front door, he handed him a bread knife "and told him to take it to protect himself." Defendant moved that the quoted portion be stricken out, and his motion was denied. The claim is that it was incompetent, being no part of the res gestæ and being a statement not made in the presence of the defendant. If it be admitted that this evidence was incompetent, we cannot see that it added in the slightest degree to the effect of the other evidence of the witness, which had already been received without objection, relative to the apparent alarm of the inmates of the house upon learning that defendant was outside, seeking to gain admission. The error, if any, was therefore, without prejudice.

4. The district attorney, for the purpose of showing the intention of defendant in going to the home of deceased on the night of the homicide, and his then feelings toward the inmates thereof, endeavored to show that he had brutally mistreated his wife both before that time and also immediately after the shooting, when he gained admission to the house. Objections to this line of testimony were sustained, after the district attorney had quite fully stated, in the presence of the jury, the nature of the proposed testimony. Before closing his case, the district attorney recalled certain witnesses and was allowed by the court, over the objection of defendant, to state that he desired to show by them that defendant, prior to the homicide, made threats against his wife, and had mistreated her immediately after the homicide, upon gaining admission to the house. The court sustained an objection to this offer, but it is urged that the conduct of the district attorney in making such offer was misconduct prejudicial to the rights of defendant. It is unnecessary here to discuss the claim made by the Attorney General to the effect that the proposed testimony was admissible. If we assume that it was not admissible, we cannot hold that the mere offer thereof was prejudicial, in view of the fact that it was already practically before the jury so far as an offer to prove certain matters places those matters before a jury. The second offer was the same in effect as the first, and if the jury sworn to try the case on the admitted evidence alone would allow itself to be influenced by statements of attorneys not supported by evidence actually admitted by the court, the prejudice to defendant was fully created by the first offer, and could not have been enhanced by the second. The question as to the admissibility of such evidence was, at least, a debatable one, there being strong ground for holding it admissible, and it cannot reasonably be pretended that there was any misconduct on the part of the district attorney in originally seeking to introduce the proposed evidence. Nor would we be warranted in assuming from the record in this case that the jury, in disregard of their oaths, may have been influenced to the prejudice of defendant by either offer. They were specially instructed by the court to consider only the admitted evidence, and to disregard and discard every impression or idea otherwise suggested, including questions asked by counsel to which objections were sustained, and statements by counsel.

5. The trial court did not err in the matter of instructions to the jury. The instructions requested by defendant upon the subject of accidental homicide were fully covered by another instruction given by the court. The requested instruction to the effect that the defendant had as much right to the custody of his minor child, and as much right to enjoy the society and company of such minor child, as had his wife, and that he had "a perfect right, at all reasonable times, to visit said minor child wherever such minor child may have been," was properly refused. The quoted portion of the instruction might be understood by the jury, under the evidence in this case, as implying that defendant had the right, for the purpose of visiting his child, to use such force as was necessary to effect an entrance to the house of deceased, even to the extent of deliberately taking life, which, of course, is not the law, and hence the instruction might have been misleading. The defendant undoubtedly had the legal right to see his child at all reasonable times, but if he was denied this right by others, his remedy was to be found in an application to the courts, and in no event could he take the law into his own hands, and resort to force and violence, much less to the taking of human life. See People v. Harris, 125 Cal. 96, 57 Pac. 780. There was no question in the case as to the legal right of the father to visit his child. The court instructed the jury that where husband and wife were living apart, neither had a superior right to the custody of the children of the marriage, and also, that if the defendant called at the house for the purpose of seeing his child, and, as he was about to enter, was attacked by deceased under such circumstances as to make it apparent to him as a reasonable man that it was necessary to shoot deceased in order to save his own life or prevent great bodily injury, and so in good faith believing, shot the deceased, he must be acquitted; and also, that if, at such time, the fatal shot was accidentally fired in a scuffle, he must be acquitted. There was no pretense that a visit by defendant to the house where his child was, for the sole purpose of peaceably entering and seeing the child, was not a lawful mission, and the instructions given clearly indicated to the jury that such a visit would have been entirely lawful. There was no error in refusing to give the long and argumentative requested instruction, warning the jury against being influenced by public sentiment. We find no necessity evidenced by the record for any such special admonition, and the jury were elsewhere told that any verdict rendered must be the unbiased and independent verdict of each member of the jury, based solely upon his individual judgment, and uninfluenced by any considerations whatever, except the evidence received, the law declared, and the arguments thereon.

6. The defendant moved for a new trial upon various grounds, including newly discovered evidence, and misconduct of jurors.

It is well settled that, to justify the granting of a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, the evidence newly discovered must be such as to render a different result probable in the event of a new trial. This we understand to be conceded by counsel for appellant. New trials should be granted on this ground only for the purpose of doing substantial justice, and not simply for the purpose of enabling the defendant to introduce evidence which is of such a nature and character, that there is no reason to believe that the verdict would have been different, had such evidence been before the jury. It is also settled that such motions are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and that its action will not be disturbed unless the record shows an abuse of this discretion, the presumption being that the discretion was properly exercised. The question as to whether the evidence produced on the motion is such as to render a different result probable is one peculiarly addressed to the discretion of the trial judge, who, in the light of the knowledge afforded by presiding at the trial, is especially qualified to determine as to the probable effect of such evidence. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 4, 78 Pac. 235; People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 392, 77 Pac. 169. Bearing in mind these well-settled propositions, a brief statement as to the showing made by the affidavits produced, will suffice to indicate that the action of the trial court, so far as this ground is concerned, cannot be disturbed. Certain affidavits presented were to the effect that, nearly a month after the trial, a knife was found under the house of deceased by a man who was there engaged in doing some work. This knife was identified by defendant as a knife which belonged to deceased, and was used by his family, and as a knife which he claimed deceased had in his hand at the time of the homicide. The son of deceased had testified on the trial that, at the time defendant was heard outside the house, he put a bread knife, 10 or 11 inches long and pointed at the end, into the hand of deceased, and defendant had testified that at the commencement of the difficulty, deceased advanced upon him with a knife, and that after the shot, deceased pursued him with the knife still in his hand. The knife disappeared immediately after the homicide, and although search and inquiry had been made regarding the same, was not found until discovered under the Dirking house, where it had apparently been concealed, but by whom does not appear.

We cannot see that the discovery of this knife under the house of deceased warranted a new trial. Certainly a new trial should not be granted merely for the purpose of enabling the knife, claimed to have been in the hand of deceased at the time of the homicide, to be introduced in evidence. It had been sufficiently described at the trial for all the purposes of the defense, and its mere production and identification as the very weapon claimed to have been in the hand of deceased, could not add, in the slightest degree, to the effect of the evidence tending to show that deceased had a knife in his hand. Nor was the mere fact that it was found, apparently concealed, under the Dirking house, at all material to the issues involved in the case. The fact might possibly warrant the inference that some member of the family, for some reason thinking that the production of the weapon would in some degree tend to assist defendant's cause, had concealed it for the purpose of suppressing evidence favorable to defendant, and thus be evidence sufficient to discredit the person who had concealed it, if he or she could be ascertained and was a witness against the defendant, but it could have no other effect. It was not legitimate evidence to show that deceased had the weapon in his hand at the time of the affray. And as long as it could not be shown by whom it was concealed, it could not serve to constitute evidence impeaching any particular witness.

On the trial, there was evidence tending to show that when defendant appeared at the front door of the Dirking house, he had an iron bar, with which he attempted to force open the door, and with which he inflicted a blow on the head of deceased. Defendant testified that he did not have any such weapon when he came to the door, and that Mrs. Dirking had it in her hand, and in deavoring to strike him with it, struck her husband, and he (defendant) took it away from her, and threw it down. A bar was identified as the one used on this occasion. The record does not show that there was anything in the appearance of this bar to distinguish it from any other iron bar about the same size. In support of the motion for a new trial, two affidavits were presented, one deponent stating that as late as January, 1902, a year and 10 months prior to the homicide, he was acquainted with the tools of deceased, kept in the rear of his premises, having occasionally used some of them, and that either this bar, or one precisely like it, was among those tools, and the other testifying to a similar condition existing as late as June, 1902, a year and 5 months prior to the homicide. The contents of these affidavits were such that we cannot say that the judge of the trial court was not fully warranted in concluding that the evidence of the new witnesses would not operate to change the result in the event of a new trial. In this connection, it may also be suggested that even if the iron bar was one of the tools of deceased, kept in the rear of his premises, the defendant, when in the back yard before going to the front door, could have taken it from that place. What has been said in regard to the affidavits relative to the iron bar is also true as to the only other affidavits presented. There is no reason to believe that the verdict would have been different if this evidence had been before the jury. We are of the opinion that it cannot be held that the trial court erred in concluding that the showing as to newly discovered evidence was not such as to warrant the granting of a new trial.

The alleged misconduct of jurors charged was the alleged reading by all the jurors of certain newspapers articles. The newspaper articles were two in number, and were published in the San Francisco Examiner during the progress of the trial, and the day before the case was submitted to the jury. One was an editorial headed: "It is time to stop the wanton slaughter of innocent women," which commented unfavorably upon juries in certain cases, where persons charged with killing or assaulting women had, in the opinion of the writer, been too leniently dealt with. The other was a news article, headed: "Ex-Policeman a Juror for Feld. Sergeant Wright, Retired, is among the 12 accepted to try young patrolman who killed his father-in-law. Counsel indicate that prisoner whose life is in the balance will depend on a plea of self-defense for acquittal." This article, in addition to giving what was apparently a fair account of the previous day's proceedings of the trial, and a statement as to the probability that the defense would be self-defense, in a subdivision headed: "Comment about Juror," stated that there had been some comment on the fact that C. P. Wright, a former member of the police department, had been accepted as one of the jurors to try defendant, who was on the police force at the time of the shooting. It quoted the trial judge as saying in an interview, that he was rather surprised that neither side had challenged or excused him, but that he had found on inquiry that Mr. Wright had served on other juries in other departments and had given excellent satisfaction; that the fact that a man had served on the police force did not disqualify him for jury service, and that police training ought to make a good juror; that if the defendant had been charged with murder for a killing done in the performance of police duty, it might be expected that the sympathies of any juror who had been a member of the police force would naturally be with him, but that there was no sentiment of that kind involved in this case; that the questions asked of Mr. Wright showed that he did not know the defendant and had never had any dealings with him; and that in any event the prosecution accepted the juror, and the court should not interfere. The district attorney was also reported as saying that he regarded Sergeant Wright as an excellent juror.

We have not considered it necessary to state the contents of the editorial, for there is no evidence that any juror read it, or heard of it, until after the rendition of the verdict. It has been declared that newspaper articles may be of such a nature that the reading thereof by jurors during the progress of a trial will require the granting of a new trial. People v. McCoy, 71 Cal. 395, 397, 12 Pac. 272; People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 199, 37 Pac. 207, 42 Am. St. Rep. 102; People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 80 Pac. 681. It, however, devolves upon the party moving for a new trial on this ground to show that such articles have come to the knowledge of the jurors, for, unless they have, prejudice could not possibly have resulted to the defendant by reason of the publication, and the burden is on him to show any substantial cause that may exist for the granting of a new trial. It cannot be held that evidence showing the publication of articles in newspapers during a trial raises any presumption that such articles have come to the knowledge of the jurors. It is their duty to abstain from reading any articles relative to the case they are trying, and from talking to any one or allowing any one to talk to them concerning the case, and to refrain from allowing themselves to receive any information or impression concerning the case from any source other than the evidence, arguments and instructions given in open court, and the presumption is that they have fully performed their duty. See Sheehan v. Hammond (Cal. App.) 84 Pac. 340. The only allegations as to this contained in the affidavits presented by defendant were made solely on the information and belief of the deponents. For this reason they were utterly valueless, and constituted no evidence whatever that any juror had ever read or heard of either article. People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 301, 64 Pac. 472; Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 151, 78 Pac. 540. They were simply charges without proof to sustain them, no denial or evidence in reply was, under the law, required, and a failure to deny them would in no degree tend to establish their truth. It is contended that an affidavit of the 12 jurors, which was presented by the district attorney in reply to defendant's motion, was of such a nature as to establish the fact that the jurors had read the editorial. In this connection, defendant relies on the rule declared in People v. Chin Non, supra, to the effect that the rule against allowing a juror to impeach his own verdict is not applicable where the district attorney introduces the juror's affidavit, and that in such event he, on behalf of the people, waives the benefit of the rule excluding such evidence. In the Chin Non Case, the jurors expressly stated in the affidavits presented by the district attorney that they had read the newspaper articles there involved, and it was sought to show by the further statements in the affidavits, that such articles had not influenced them in arriving at a verdict. In this case, while there was in the joint affidavit of the jurors no express denial of the information and belief allegation that they had read the editorial, there was no express acknowledgment thereof, as in the Chin Non Case, nor was there any statement therein which would warrant the inference that the editorial had come to the knowledge of any of them until after the verdict. Every statement therein contained is entirely consistent with a conclusion that the editorial had not come to their knowledge until after verdict. The conclusion of defendant's counsel to the contrary is based entirely on the fact that while, by this affidavit, certain allegations of defendant's affidavits were denied, nothing was said therein concerning or in reply to the allegation as to the reading of the editorial by the jurors. It is contended that in the presence of this opportunity on the part of the district attorney and the jurors to deny such allegation if the facts were such as to enable a denial to be made, the failure to do so is, in effect, an express admission on the part of the district attorney that the undenied allegation was true.

When it is borne in mind that the charges of misconduct were not so supported as to require answer of any kind, that there was no evidence of misconduct therein, and that the jurors' affidavits alone must be looked to for evidence of misconduct, it must be apparent that the only misconduct shown is such as is shown by the affirmative allegations of such affidavit, or such as must be necessarily inferred from such allegations, and the district attorney, by introducing such affidavit, admitted no more, at most than what is so affirmatively alleged, or necessarily inferable from such allegations. We are of the opinion that the exception declared in the Chin Non Case to the general rule prohibiting the impeachment of his own verdict by a juror, should not be extended so as to allow such impeachment to be accomplished solely by the mere failure of the juror to deny certain information and belief allegations of misconduct, even though such failure be accompanied by an express denial on his part of other information and belief allegations of misconduct. So far, therefore, as the editorial was concerned, there was no showing warranting the granting of a new trial. We have assumed in what we have thus far said that the article was of such a nature that it might have influenced jurymen in this case. The article contained no reference to this case, but was a general article relative to failures of justice in cases of crime against women. Whether, by reason of the special circumstances of this case, the trial court would have been warranted in holding that it was of such a nature that the mere reading thereof may have influenced this jury, is, indeed, very doubtful, but, in view of what has already been said, it is unnecessary to decide this question. The showing as to the knowledge by the jurors, before verdict, of the other newspaper article, the news article, is precisely the same as the showing in regard to the editorial, except in the single case of the juror, Wright, who is discussed therein. As to the other 11 jurors, therefore, the showing did not warrant a new trial, for the reasons already stated. As to this article, it must also be held that, so far as the jurors not named therein are concerned, there is absolutely nothing therein from which it could be reasonably concluded that any juror might have been influenced thereby. The article was in no degree partisan, and was, in addition to the comments on juror Wright, apparently only an exceedingly fair report of the previous day's proceedings. Of course, as already stated, jurors should not read any article concerning the case they are trying, but no prejudice could possibly have been suffered by defendant from a reading by such jurors of this article.

An affidavit of Juror Wright was filed by the district attorney, in which Wright stated that some one had called his attention to the fact that an article had been published about him, and he merely replied: "Oh, that does not hurt me, the judge gave me a good send-off." This is the only legal evidence serving as a basis for the conclusion that he had knowledge of the article or any portion thereof. It may be assumed that this was sufficient to show such knowledge. We, however, are unable to see anything in the comments on Wright contained in the article, or in the remarks attributed by the article to the trial judge and the district attorney concerning him, that would warrant a conclusion that he might have been influenced thereby in the discharge of his duties as a juror. An affidavit as to Juror Wright, made by Clarence Gray, was filed on the part of the defendant. The allegations contained in this affidavit were specifically denied in the affidavit of Wright. The issues of fact thus made were for the trial court to determine, and such determination is conclusive here. It cannot be held that the court erred in concluding that there was no sufficient showing of misconduct of jurors to warrant a new trial.

Upon the motion for a new trial, the affidavit of defendant's attorneys was presented, charging misconduct on the part of the district attorney in making alleged unwarrantable statements in his closing argument. Misconduct of the district attorney is not one of the grounds specified in section 1181 of the Penal Code as a cause for granting a new trial, and that section in terms provides that a new trial may be granted only in the cases therein specified. Such ground, therefore, is available only upon the appeal from the judgment, and, to be available there, the facts upon which the alleged misconduct is based must appear in the bill of exceptions settled by the judge, and not be left to be determined by the appellate court upon affidavits. In this case, the allegations contained in such affidavits are in no way certified by the trial judge as true, without which certification we cannot legally consider them. That the affidavits are contained in a bill of exceptions is, of course, no finding by the trial judge as to the truth of the allegations contained therein. The affidavits presented on this ground had no proper place on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, the action of the trial judge in denying the motion cannot be accepted as a finding upon the matters therein set forth, and the affidavits have no proper place in the record on appeal. We have, however, examined them, and, taking into consideration the reply affidavit filed by the district attorney, cannot say that there is any such showing of misconduct in the closing argument as would warrant a reversal, were the question properly before us.

We have, in a previous portion of this opinion, discussed the efforts of the district attorney to prove mistreatment of his wife by the defendant, both before and immediately after the killing of deceased, and his second offer in regard thereto, and have held that there was no misconduct in the first offer and no prejudical misconduct in the second. Nor can it be held that there was any misconduct in asking Mrs. Quarles in her examination in rebuttal as to a conversation between defendant and his wife in her presence, about two months before the homicide, in which he made a threat against his wife relative to what he would do before he would give her any money. Under the circumstances of the case, we think the evidence was admissible as tending to show the motive with which he visited the house of deceased on the evening of the homicide, and this was apparently the view of the trial court, for an objection to the question was overruled. There is no other specification of misconduct on the part of the district attorney requiring notice. We have now considered all the points made for a reversal, and find no legal ground upon which the judgment of the trial court may be set aside, or a new trial granted.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; HALL, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

NOTE.—Justice McFARLAND being unable to act, Justice HALL, one of the justices of the district court of appeal for the first appellate district, participates herein pro tempore, pursuant to section 4, art. 6, of the Constitution.

Petition for Rehearing.

(Aug. 9, 1906.)

PER CURIAM. What was said in the opinion relative to whether the question of misconduct of the district attorney can, in view of our statute, be considered by the trial court on motion for a new trial, and afford sufficient ground for the granting of such motion, was not necessary to the decision, in view of the fact that the showing of misconduct made was not sufficient to warrant a reversal, even if the question had been properly before us. This particular question was not argued by counsel. It has been brought to our attention since the filing of the opinion that the decisions of this court upon this question are conflicting, and that in several cases the right of a trial court to grant a new trial upon this ground has been recognized. We have concluded that it would be proper to defer final decision of this important question of practice until it has been more fully argued and considered.

The opinion heretofore filed is, therefore, modified by striking out in the part of the opinin numbered "7" that portion thereof commencing with the words "Misconduct of the district attorney is not one of the grounds," and ending with the words, "and the affidavits have no proper place in the record on appeal," and also by striking out of the sentence next following the word "however," and the words, "were the question properly before us."

In re RATTO'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,483.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1906.)

1. WILLS—LEGACIES—PAYMENT—FUNDS.

Testator bequeathed to his four daughters and to his grandson each the sum of $200, and also by a later clause bequeathed to his five sons the remaining one-half of all his real estate acquired after his marriage to his present wife, and all the remainder of his personal property of which he should die possessed, after the payment of legacies provided for in the second clause of the will. Held, that the legacies given in the second clause of the will were general, and were not charged on the personal property alone.

2. SAME—SPECIFIC DEVISES.

A will devising to testator's five sons the remaining one-half of all his real estate acquired after marriage to his present wife, and all the residue of his personal property after payment of legacies, etc., constituted a general and not a specific devise.

3. SAME.

Testator by the second clause of his will bequeathed certain general legacies, and by the fifth clause gave one-half of all the real property acquired after his marriage with his present wife, and all the residue of his personal property after the payment of the legacies provided for in the second clause of his will, to certain devisees. Held, that the words "after payment of the legacies provided for in the second clause of the will," should be construed as qualifying both the preceding clauses, and to entitle the residuary legatees to whatever residue there should be of both the "remaining one-half of the real property acquired" and of the personal property after satisfaction of the legacies.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

Application by Giambatista Ratto as guardian of Antonio Ratto, a minor, for an order for the sale of real estate of Guisseppi Ratto, deceased, to pay a legacy bequeathed to such minor. From an order denying the application, applicant appeals. Reversed.

C. W. Miller, for petitioner. Buck & Middlecoff, for opponents. A. V. Scanlan, for certain minors.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by Giambatista Ratto, guardian of Antonio Ratto, a minor, from an order of the superior court refusing to make an order directing the sale of real property of the estate of said deceased to pay a legacy to said minor.

Guisseppi Ratto died, leaving a will. By the first paragraph of the will the testator directs the payment of his funeral expenses, etc.; by the second paragraph he gives to his four daughters, naming them, and to his grandson, said Antonio Ratto, "each the sum of $200"; by the third paragraph he gives to his five sons, naming them, a certain described piece of land containing about 17 acres, which he owned at the time of his marriage, and was therefore his separate property; by the fourth paragraph he gives to his wife, Angela Ratto, "one-half of all the remaining real property now held by me, which said real property was acquired and possessed by me after my marriage with my present wife, said Angela Ratto, and to which one-half she is legally entitled to under the laws of the state of California." And the fifth paragraph, which is the one mostly discussed by counsel, is as follows:

"Fifthly. I give and bequeath to my five sons, John Batista Ratto, Joseph Ratto, Benedicto Ratto, Antonio Ratto and Peter Ratto, share and share alike, the remaining one-half of all the real property acquired and possessed by me after my marriage to my present wife Angela Ratto, and all the rest, residue and remainder of the personal property of which I may die possessed, after the payment of the legacies provided for in clause above marked 'Secondly' of this will."

It appears that all the personal property of the estate has been exhausted by the payment of expenses of administration, family allowance, etc., and that there is no personal property out of which the said legacy to Antonio Ratto can be satisfied; and respondents contend, and the court below held, that the legacy must fail because, under the will, it was to be a charge on the personal property alone. We see no such provision in the will. Certainly the second clause, in which the legacy is given, does not provide that some particular property or fund must be resorted to for its payment; it is general and unconditioned. Nor does the fifth clause direct that it should be a charge only upon the personal property, and there is no other provision in the will on the subject. Therefore, leaving out of view for the present any intent of the testator as expressed in the will, the general rule on the subject would prevail, which is, as stated in section 1360 of the Civil Code, that the property of a testator must be resorted to for the payment of legacies in the following order: "(1) Property which is expressly appropriated by the will for the payment of legacies; (2) Property not disposed of by the will; (3) Property which is devised or bequeathed to a residuary legatee; (4) Property which is specifically devised or bequeathed." In the Estate of Neistrath, 66 Cal. 330, 5 Pac. 507, the court leaves it somewhat doubtful whether by said section 1360 the Legislature intended to subject specific devises to the payment of general legacies; but we need not consider that question here, for the only specific devise to appellants is of the 17-acre tract mentioned in the third paragraph of the will. The clause in the fifth paragraph in the testator's will "the remaining one-half of all the real property acquired and possessed by me after my marriage" contains no description of the property devised, and is clearly general and not specific. Moreover, taking the whole will together, the clear intent of the testator was that the very first gift which he makes, in the second paragraph, to his daughters and grandson of $200 each, should not be chargeable upon any particular fund or property; and in view of this clear intent the words in paragraph fifth, "after the payment of the legacies provided for in clause marked 'Secondly' of this will" should be construed as qualifying both the preceding clauses, and is easily susceptible of that construction. And therefore appellants are entitled to whatever residue there shall be of both the "remaining one-half of the real property acquired," etc., and of the personal property, after the satisfaction of the legacies.

We do not consider the fact incidentally appearing in the transcript that some of the real property was set apart to the widow and minor children as a homestead; for the transcript contains an express stipulation "that the only question involved in this proceeding is the question as to whether or not, under the terms of the will of decedent, any of the real property in this estate is chargeable with the payment of the legacy herein involved."

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to order sold so much of the real property of the estate devised to appellants, other than the 17-acre tract, as may be necessary to satisfy the legacy of $200 to Antonio Ratto.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

3 Cal. App. 741

KAUFFMAN et al. v. FOSTER.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 20, 1906.)

1. ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS—PRESENTATION—NECESSITY.

Where a court having jurisdiction construed a testamentary trust, and intestate in obedience to the decree segregated the trust fund from his other property in acceptance of the trust, the decree became binding on all the parties then before the court as the law of the estate, so that it was unnecessary that the claim for such trust fund should have been presented by the parties entitled thereto as against intestate's estate to entitle them to maintain an action to recover the fund.

2. TRUSTS—FOLLOWING TRUST FUNDS—IDENTIFICATION OF PROPERTY.

Where, after a trust created by the will of intestate's wife had been sustained, intestate segregated the fund from his other property and invested the same in certain securities, the investment was sufficiently earmarked to entitle the persons entitled to the fund to trace the same.

3. CHARITIES—CHARITABLE ASSOCIATIONS.

Where a Masonic association was formed for certain purposes of charity and held its funds in trust for such purposes, and none other, it was a charitable association capable of taking funds bequeathed to it for charitable purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Charities, § 17.]

4. JUDGMENTS—EFFECT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a court of competent jurisdiction has distributed a trust fund to an association on a use and trust specified in the decree, it would be presumed in support thereof that the society had power to accept the bequest and was a person competent to act as trustee.

5. CHARITIES—BEQUEST TO AN ASSOCIATION—EQUITABLE CONTROL.

Where a trust fund was bequeathed to a masonic association in trust for charitable purposes, the association was so far under the control of a court of equity that it could be compelled to execute the trust and be properly dealt with for breach thereof.

6. TRUSTS—INVESTMENT OF TRUST FUNDS—FOLLOWNG TRUST FUNDS.

A trustee invested the trust funds in proper securities as directed by a decree, and tendered the same to the distributee specified in the will, exacting, however, certain conditions inconsistent with the decree of distribution. Investments of such character were shown on his death to have come into the hands of his administrator. Held that, as such investment once proved to exist would be presumed to continue as long as usual with things of that nature, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, there were sufficient remarks to authorize a finding that the trust securities had come into the hands of the administrator.

7. SAME—DEATH OF TRUSTEE—EFFECT.

Where a trust in personalty devolved on intestate in his life by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, and he accepted the trust, it devolved on his personal representatives on his death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by Parke W. Kauffman and others against E. P. Foster, as administrator of the estate of Jacob K. Gries, deceased. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Barnes & Selby and Edward M. Selby, for appellant. Toland & Andrews, N. Blackstock, and M. J. Rogers, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. A judgment in favor of plaintiffs against defendant, as administrator of the estate of Jacob K. Gries, decreeing that said administrator should invest $1,000 in his hands and transfer the security to San Buena Ventura Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons, under a contract that of the income of such $1,000 so much as necessary should be used in the maintenance of a burial lot in which is interred the remains of Mrs. Mary S. Gries. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals, upon a bill of exceptions.

The case is this: Ventura Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons, is an unincorporated association, found by the court to have been organized for charitable purposes, and since its organization has been collecting and disbursing large sums by way of charity, and no money received by it can be properly expended otherwise than for expenses of the association and for charitable purposes. This association contains about 85 members. Mrs. Gries, by her last will, devised to her husband, Jacob K. Gries, certain real estate and requested him that, out of the rents, issues, and profits thereof, to invest $1,000 in some satisfactory security and transfer the same to the association above named, under a contract that so much of the income or principal as may be necessary shall be used by said association for the care, repair, and maintenance of the burial lot in Springville cemetery, in which the remains of testator should be interred. That after the death of Mrs. Gries, and in due course of the administration of her estate by the decree of distribution regularly entered, after notice, on January 5, 1897, there was distributed by the court to this association $1,000, to be paid out of the rents, issues, and profits of the life estate of said Jacob K. Gries, and to be by him invested in a satisfactory security, to be transferred to said association upon the trusts and uses in said will provided. Thereupon said association appointed plaintiff's trustees to take and receive such transfer of security for said association. That at all times, after the 1st of January, 1898, and until his death, the said Jacob K. Gries kept segregated and in his hands, out of the proper funds, said sum of $1,000. That in 1903 said Jacob K. Gries died, so having such funds separated from his other estate, and after his death said funds in due course came into the hands of Foster, as administrator, and the same has at all times remained in his hands. That a claim was presented, more than 10 months after the publication of notice to creditors, to defendant as administrator of the estate of Jacob K. Gries, by plaintiffs in their own behalf, and in behalf of the other members of the association, which claim was rejected. Plaintiffs bring this action thereon, by way of an amended and supplemental complaint; the original action having been brought against Jacob K. Gries in his lifetime, and in which action not only the amount here involved was sought to be recovered, but certain specified real property.

The first contention of appellant is that the presentation of the claim to defendant within the time required by law was a condition precedent to the right to maintain this action. We are of opinion that, under the facts of this case, the presentation of a claim was unnecessary. Whatever may have been the rights of Jacob K. Gries under the will, the decree of distribution became the law of the estate. The court having jurisdiction construed the trust created by the will, and that judgment and decree is final and conclusive upon all parties then before the court. Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 152, 61 Pac. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100. Gries, in obedience to such decree, segregated the sum ordered to be invested, and held the same in that manner, presumably in obedience to the decree, and presumably with the intent to transfer the funds whenever other questions which he was litigating were eliminated. These acts signified with reasonable certainty Gries' acceptance of the trust which was imposed upon him by the decree to invest and transfer. Civ. Code, § 2222. The fund having been by him segregated, the investment was sufficiently earmarked so as to be identified, and proven to have been turned over with the assets of the estate to the administrator. Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 638, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861. It is only where payment of a claim is sought out of the assets of decedent's estate that such presentation is necessary. Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 642, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861.

The sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the court as to the charitable character of the association is next challenged. Competent evidence appears in the record to show that the association was formed for certain purposes of charity and society and holds its funds in trust for these purposes, and none other; that the lodge funds are sacred to the purposes of charity and shall not be used for any other purpose. This evidence is sufficient to support the finding last referred to.

The competency of the lodge to receive this bequest is next challenged. We have nothing to do upon this appeal with the bequest, its nature or purpose. We are dealing only with the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, which has distributed to the association certain personal property, upon the use and trust in such decree of distribution specified. It will be presumed in support of such judgment that the distributee has power to accept and was a person competent to act as trustee. Were the rule otherwise, bodies such as this association before the court have been held so far under the control of a court of equity that they may be compelled to execute the duties of the trust, and can be dealt with for a breach thereof. Estate of Winchester, 133 Cal. 274, 65 Pac. 475. There being then before the court a distributee, and decree of distribution having become final, we may not now by indirection inquire into the validity of such judgment or decree, or the evidence offered and received in its support. There is evidence in the record to support a finding that Jacob K. Gries had this money in his possession, segregated and ready for payment. There is evidence that at one time before his death, to wit, in the early part of 1898, he had the same invested in proper securities, as by the decree directed, and tendered the same to the association, exacting, however, certain conditions before the transfer not consistent with the decree of distribution. This investment once proven to exist will be presumed to continue as long as usual with things of that nature. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32. The nature of the investment ordered was permanent, and investments of this character are shown to have come into the hands of the administrator after the decease of Gries. All of this tends to establish the findings of the court as to Gries' acceptance of the trust, the partial performance thereof, and the receipt by the administrator of a trust fund earmarked so as to be identified, and proven to have been turned over with the assets of the estate to the defendant, as administrator. A trust having devolved upon Gries in his lifetime by the decree, and his acceptance thereof established by acts performed by him, upon his death the trust devolved upon his personal representatives. Tyler v. Mayre, 95 Cal. 160, 27 Pac. 160, 30 Pac. 196.

We are of opinion that the judgment and decree of the court in this case, directing the transfer of the securities to the association as distributee under the decree of distribution, was warranted.

There being no error apparent in the record, the order is affirmed.

I concur: GRAY, P. J.

SMITH, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment of affirmance. The appeal before us is from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, and the questions to be considered are those only relating to appeals of this kind, which, in the present case, are confined to the alleged insufficiency of the evidence, and the point that the decision is against law. The findings attacked for insufficiency of the evidence to support them are, in effect: (1) That the Ventura Lodge is a charitable institution and its funds devoted exclusively to charity; (2) that the lodge is competent under the laws of the state of California to receive bequests of real and personal property; (3) that a thousand dollars was "segregated" by Gries for the purpose of complying with the provisions of the will out of the rents and profits of the lands devised to him, and that this sum has come into the hands of his administrator; and (4) that the claim of the lodge was presented to the administrator of the estate of Gries in the manner required by the provisions of section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Of these findings, the first is clearly not supported by the evidence; for it appears, without contradiction, that the funds of the lodge are for the exclusive uses of a definite number of members, and that the lodge does not dispense charity to outsiders. The association, therefore, in this regard, differs in no essential respect from an ordinary partnership, or other mutual benefit society; and hence it cannot be regarded as a charitable institution or institution existing for charitable purposes, in the technical sense of the term. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. 1156 et seq.; 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. §§ 1019, 1022; People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 136, 137, 45 Pac. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269; Gorman v. Russell, 14 Cal. 535; 1 Bacon's Benefit Societies, § 44. The second of the findings attacked is a mere conclusion of law, and will be correct or otherwise accordingly as we construe it. If it be construed as meaning that an unincorporated institution, such as the Ventura Lodge, can take property in trust or otherwise, as a corporation or quasi corporation distinct from its membership, or hold it as the representative of its fluctuating membership, the proposition cannot be admitted. Blakeslee v. Hall, 94 Cal. 159, 29 Pac. 623. But if it be construed as meaning no more than that the existing members of the association can take under the common name, it cannot be disputed. Grand Grove v. Garibaldi Grove, 130 Cal. 119, 62 Pac. 486, 80 Am. St. Rep. 80. In the present case, as will be seen, the proposition is asserted in the latter sense, and no objection can be urged to it. As to the finding of the segregation of a thousand dollars by Gries, there is no evidence in the record to support it. But the finding is obviously immaterial, unless in connection with the fourth of the findings objected to, which is in effect that the claim of the Ventura Lodge was duly presented to the administrator of Gries' estate; nor in connection with this do we think it is of any materiality. The specific point of objection to the last finding is that the claim was not presented within the statutory time after the publicaton of notice to creditors required by section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, as this point is not disposed of by the findings, it may be assumed that the court intended to hold that, under the provisions of section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, all that was required was that the claim should be presented before a recovery could be had. But assuming, for the purposes of the decision only, that the court was wrong in this view, the error is in this case quite immaterial, for here the claim of the lodge is to a definite fund created by the terms of the will and the decree of distribution, and charged upon the real estate allotted to the defendant Gries, which must be regarded in a court of equity as an interest in, or lien upon, specific property. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1505, 1686. It is therefore not a claim against the estate in the sense of the term as used in section 1493.

There remains to be considered, therefore, only the objection that the decision of the court is against law, which will require a consideration of the effect of the provisions of the will and of the decree of distribution. With regard to the former, were the subject before us an original question, I would perhaps have no difficulty in allowing the contentions of the appellants, which are (1) That it was the intention of the testatrix that the transfer of the thousand-dollar fund provided for to the Ventura Lodge should be upon the trust that it should be maintained by it as a permanent fund and the income used for the care of the grave of the testatrix, with resulting trust to the successor of the testatrix of so much of the fund as should not be required for this purpose (Civ. Code, § 866; 2 Story's Eq. Jur. 1196, 1196a; 2 Spence's Eq. Jur. 22, 223-4); (2) that it was not intended to confer any interest, beneficial or fiduciary, upon the several members of the lodge, but that the transfer was to be made to the lodge as quasi corporation; and (3) that the trust thus created was void for the double reason: First, that it was in contravention of section 9, art. 20, of the Constitution relating to perpetuities (Estate of Gay, 138 Cal. 553, 71 Pac. 707, 94 Am. St. Rep. 70; 2 Story's Eq. Jur. 1156 et seq.; 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. §§ 1019, 1022; People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 136-7, 45 Pac. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269; 1 Bacon's Benefit Societies, § 44) and of sections 847 and 857, subd. 3, of the Civil Code, relating to uses and trusts; and, secondly, because the lodge was not a person competent to take as trustee (Estate of Winchester, 133 Cal. 275, 65 Pac. 475; Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 95, 59 Pac. 315; Blakeslee v. Hall, 94 Cal. 159, 29 Pac. 623). But here the will has been, as it were, merged in the decree of distribution, which is to be taken as conclusive of the rights of all parties entitled, legally or equitably, to a share of the estate (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1665-6), and the case must therefore turn upon the construction and effect of this decree. As to this, it may be, and in effect is, contended by the appellant that the person or supposed person named in the decree as distributee, i. e., the Ventura Lodge, is not a person competent to take as trustee, or otherwise, and that this is equally fatal to the validity of the decree as to that of the bequest. But this contention is based upon the assumption that it was the intention of the decree to direct the transfer to be made to the Ventura Lodge as a quasi corporation, and that it was not its intention that the individual members of the lodge should take any interest. But we find nothing in the terms of the decree to justify this assumption. All that is said is that the thousand-dollar fund shall be transferred to the lodge upon the execution of the contract specified, and to give effect to the decree we must suppose that the term "lodge" is used simply as the common name of the members; so that, in effect, the order is that the transfer be made under the common name to the members of the lodge jointly. Grand Grove v. Garibaldi Grove, 130 Cal. 119, 62 Pac. 486, 80 Am. St. Rep. 80; Gorman v. Russell, 14 Cal. 535. Upon any other construction, the decree would be defective in failing to designate any person or persons entitled to share in the estate, which it was essential to the jurisdiction of the court and to the validity of the decree should appear. For under the express provisions of the statute, the jurisdiction of the superior court in distributing the estates of deceased persons extends only to the determination of the persons entitled to distribution, and to give effect to any provision of the decree the designation of such person is essential. In the present case, the lands in question was allotted by the decree to Gries, and, upon the hypothesis we are now considering, without the designation of any other person or persons competent to take as entitled to an interest therein, and upon this hypothesis the directions to Gries as to the disposition of the rents and profits of his lands would be clearly nugatory. We have no alternative, therefore, other than to construe the decree as requiring the transfer of the fund to the members of the lodge jointly under the common name.

Whether it was the intention of the decree that the fund when thus transferred was to be held by the donees in trust for the purpose named in the will, either wholly or in part, is not expressly determined by the decree; but the contrary, we think, is to be inferred. For otherwise the effect of the decree would be to create a perpetuity in contravention of the constitutional provision, which it is not to be presumed was the intention of the court. The decree must therefore be construed as directing an absolute transfer of the fund to the lodge, or rather, under its name, to the members of the lodge, thus leaving in Gries, the owner of the land, no right in the fund, or in its disposition, but merely a right of action for any breach of the contract that might occur. The judgment in the case before us conforms precisely to the decree of distribution as thus construed, and must be construed in the same way, i. e., as directing the fund to be transferred absolutely to the San Buena Ventura Lodge, etc., upon the execution of the contract called for. This is to be understood as directing a conveyance under the common name to the associated members as existing at the date of the decree, and it must be assumed in support of the judgment, either that these were the same members as those existing at the date of the death of the testatrix and at the date of the decree of distribution, or that under the constitution and by-laws of the lodge the present had succeeded to the rights of the former members. Grand Grove v. Garibaldi Grove, supra. Thus far, the judgment conforms to the decree of distribution, and the decision is therefore not against law. The judgment, indeed, might have gone further and placed some conditions or restrictions upon the lodge with reference to the use and disposition of the fund. But, as there is no appeal from the judgment, the questions thus suggested cannot be considered.

I am of the opinion, therefore, for the reasons given, that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

Ex parte PAGE. (Court of Appeal, Second District. California. May 15, 1906.) In the matter of the application of Sherman Page for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied. Walter J. Trask, Ansel Smith, and Roger S. Page, for petitioner. Rowan Irwin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Application for writ of habeas corpus. In this case the justices of the court being unable to concur in a judgment, it is ordered that the writ be denied, and the defendant remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

ARROYO DITCH & WATER CO. v. BEQUETTE. L. A. 1,634.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1906. Rehearing Denied Sept. 12, 1906.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION DITCHES—REPAIR—LIABILITY OF OWNERS—STATUTES.

Where land owners constructed an irrigation ditch, and by custom, prior to the formation of a corporation to operate the ditch, contributed to the cost of maintenance above, but not below their point of diversion, a corporation thereafter organized could not compel a co-owner of the ditch, not a member of the corporation, to contribute to the improvement of the ditch below his point of diversion either at common law or under St. 1889, p. 202, c. 168, declaring that where two or more persons construct a common irrigation ditch, each shall be liable to the other for the reasonable expense of maintaining and repairing it, in proportion to his share in the use of the water, etc.

2. SAME—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where plaintiff sought to recover defendant's alleged proportionate share of the cost of all improvements on an irrigation ditch, and introduced no evidence of the amount of defendant's share of the cost of the improvements made above defendant's point of diversion for which alone defendant was liable, the court was justified in giving judgment for defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Arroyo Ditch & Water Company against L. L. Bequette. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kendrick & Knott and J. H. Ardis, for appellant. John S. Chapman, J. L. Fleming, and Goodrich & McCutchen, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover $364.52, alleged to be due plaintiff as the defendant's proportion of the cost of certain improvements and repairs made by plaintiff to a ditch owned in common by plaintiff, defendant and others. About the year 1869 certain persons, each being the owner in severalty of a tract of land susceptible of irrigation by water to be diverted from the stream now known as the "Old Sam Gabriel River," constructed a dam in the stream for the diversion of the necessary water, and made a common ditch leading from the dam to, or adjacent to, their respective tracts of land, by means whereof they thereafter diverted water from the stream and each used a due proportion thereof on his land for its irrigation and for domestic use. From time to time thereafter other owners of land were admitted to share in the water and in the use of the ditch until the water became appurtenant to an aggregate area of 3,950 acres of land, owned in small tracts, in severalty, by a large number of persons. The main ditch, which became known as the "Arroyo Ditch," was several miles in length from the dam on the river to the lowest tract reached thereby. Some tracts did not abut upon the main ditch, and were supplied through branch ditches, each constructed from the main ditch by the particular persons owning the tracts situate along such lateral. By a common custom, or understanding, among the respective persons interested, each contributed to, or assisted in, the maintenance and repair of the main ditch from the dam down to the point where it passed the lower line of his land, if the land abutted thereon, or down to the point of departure of his particular branch ditch, if his land did not abut upon the main ditch, but did not contribute to, or assist in, such maintenance or repair, below his land or ditch, as the case might be; and each landowner along each branch contributed in like manner to maintain and repair his part of the particular branch ditch upon which he was situated, but did not so contribute to the other branch ditches. By many years' use in this manner, and apparently without any specific or express common agreement, oral or written, except such as would be inferred and implied from their conduct, each owner, respectively, acquired a right to the water, and to the common use of the ditch to convey the water to his land, and a corresponding estate in common in the ditch and in the water diverted from the river thereby; the interest of each being such proportion of the whole as the acreage of his irrigated land bore to the entire acreage irrigated, or considered as entitled to irrigation, by the diverted water. In the course of this process common rights of way for the main ditch were acquired, from time to time, by the users of the water, either by conveyances or prescription, and a compromise was effected with other claimants of water from the river, whereby the parties herein concerned acquired the right, as against the others, to divert for their use a specific proportion of the water of the river. The defendant purchased from the original owner one of these tracts of land, containing 40 acres entitled to the water, and thereby became the owner of an interest in the water and ditch; his interest being such proportion of the whole as 40 is to 3,950.

For convenience of management, the owners of all the irrigated lands, except 622 acres, organized the plaintiff corporation, each taking stock therein proportioned to the number of acres of his irrigated land, and each transferring to the corporation his interest in the water and ditch; the corporation undertaking the obligation to distribute and deliver to its stockholders' land the water to which such land was entitled, and to perform the aggregate obligations of all of its stockholders to maintain and repair the ditch and its branches. The cost of the maintenance and repairs thereafter done by the corporation was raised by assessments upon the stock, from time to time, which were levied uniformly upon all the stockholders alike. The respective owners of the 622 acres, usually known as "outsiders," among whom was the defendant, did not become members or stockholders of the corporation, but each thereafter continued to use his respective share of the water from the ditches, and to contribute to the maintenance and repair of the ditches down to but not below, his own land, in the same manner as before. The defendant's land was situated on a branch ditch known as the "Sand Ridge Ditch" near its junction with the main ditch. This was the first branch ditch leading off from the main ditch. The ditches were ordinary open ditches, constructed in the earth, such as were in ordinary use for the distribution of water. The soil was dry and, in some places, light and sandy, in consequence whereof a considerable part of the water was lost by seepage and absorption in transmission to the lands. Defendant's land was near the head of the ditch and his loss from this cause was comparatively small, but the loss to the more remote lands was very great, so much, in fact, that at times, according to the evidence, the entire flow would be lost in that way before it would reach lands situated at the lower end of the ditch. This loss was not due to the bad condition or lack of repair of the ditch and its branches, but to the nature of the soil, and, at the time of the improvements made by the plaintiff, was not greater than it had been usually ever since the ditch was first constructed. To prevent this loss and save the water for the users, particularly those situated toward the lower end of the ditch, the plaintiff corporation built a wooden flume over 5,000 feet long, above the defendant's land, connecting it with the main ditch at each end, and also cemented the sides and bottom of parts of the main ditch and its branches, including a part of the Sand Ridge ditch; the aggregate length of such cement work in all the ditches amounting to several miles. Since this work was done the water has been carried through this flume and through the ditches thus cemented, and has been received by the interested parties in the same proportions as before.

The entire cost of these improvements made by the plaintiff was $35,997.24, and the defendant's proportion thereof, computed according to his interest in the water diverted in common from the river, that is, as 40 to 3,950, would be $364.52. The length of the cement work above and across defendant's land is less than half a mile, while its length below his land is more than three miles. The court does not find the distances more exactly. The defendant derives no benefit from the cement work below. The cost of the entire cement work was $31,880.99. One-seventh of this, or $4,550.14, together with the cost of the flume, $4,146.25, aggregating $8,696.39, comprise all the expense for work on and above the defendant's land. This assumes that the expense of the cement work was uniform throughout the course of the ditches, and nothing appears to the contrary. The defendant's pro rata share of the above sum of $8,696.39 would be only $88.06. The plaintiff sues for $364.52, being, as stated, his share of the whole cost of the work both above and below his land. The water has never been distributed among the respective owners by giving to each a continuous flow of a small stream, proportionate to his undivided interest in the stream diverted from the river. The division has always been effected by the method of delivering to each owner in his turn, beginning with those nearest the dam, a stream of water designated as a "head," for a certain number of hours; the time being regulated in proportion to the amount of his interest, until all were served in turn, and by repeating the process throughout the irrigating season. When the water was low the stream constituted but a single head. If the flow was sufficient, it was divided into from two to three heads, according to the volume of water available, and each head was delivered to a different owner. The defendant was the third person entitled, in order, at the beginning of a turn. Although it is not expressly stated, it is nevertheless plain from the facts found, that this method of division, if it was not originally specially agreed upon, has been continued so long that it has become part of the right of each owner of an interest in the water. Since the cementing of the ditch and the building of the flume, the defendant has received, and claimed the right to receive, his "head" of water for the same number of hours in each "turn" as before, although the effect of the flume and cement has been such that he has thereby received a substantially larger quantity of water than before; the amount of the increase being indeterminable from the evidence. The defendant did not consent to the making of the improvements. He was not asked to assist in the work, but was previously informed by the plaintiff that it proposed to make the improvements, and was asked to pay his share of the expenses. His situation is such that he cannot obtain the water at all except through the improved ditch.

The contention of the plaintiff is that, although plaintiff was under no compulsion, as a common owner, to make the improvements for the preservation of the common property; that is, of the portion previously lost by absorption in dirt ditches, and had no legal right to compel contribution in advance thereto by the defendant, or to force him to increase the amount of his water supply by those means, and although the defendant has the undoubted right to continue to demand and receive his full supply of water through the improved ditches, without contributing at all to the cost of the improvement, he is thus compelled to use for that purpose, nevertheless, if he knowingly claims and receives the additional amount of water which the improved ditch carries to his land; that is to say, that portion of his share of the water diverted at the dam which would have been lost by absorption before reaching his land if the improvements had not been made, he thereby assents to and ratifies the action of the plaintiff in the construction of the improvements and becomes bound to pay his proportionate share of the cost thereof. In support of this proposition the plaintiff cites the case of Stockwell v. Mutual L. I. Co., 140 Cal. 201, 74 Pac. 21, 98 Am. St. Rep. 25, in which case it was held that if one of several beneficiaries in a life insurance policy, who desires to preserve the policy from forfeiture, is compelled to pay the whole of the premium in order to do so, and the policy thereafter becomes due, the other beneficiaries cannot share in the proceeds thereof without paying to him their proper share of the premiums paid to prevent forfeiture.

No exception can be taken to the just and equitable rule laid down in that case. If the plaintiff's conduct and cause of action came within its terms its case would be impregnable. There are, however, vital differences. The court finds that a large proportion of the saving of water occurs in the branch ditches not used by the defendant, and in the main ditches below the defendant's land, and that the defendant had water sufficient for his land without the saving caused by the improvements. The defendant, of course, cannot share in or receive any benefit from the saving made after the stream passes his land, unless he takes it out below and uses it elsewhere. It is not shown that he does so, nor that he desires to do so, nor that he claims any such right. On the contrary, his claim is limited to the flow of the usual "head" for the usual number of hours in regular order, and the court finds that his acceptance of the benefits of the increase in the flow produced by the improvements, "has been because of his inability to obtain any water otherwise" than through this ditch. Thus, although the defendant has participated only in the saving made above his land, the demand of the plaintiff is not limited to a due proportion of the cost of the improvements made upon that portion of the ditch, the improvements which caused the saving in which alone he shares, but extends to and includes his regular pro rata share, according to his relative acreage, of the entire expenses of the whole improvement, at least three-fourths of which expense was for cementing ditches below his land, in which saving he has no interest, and from which he neither receives nor claims any benefit. This demand does not come within the principle invoked by the plaintiff. The principle is founded upon natural justice and equity—the proposition that he who claims a share in a benefit produced by the act of another, should pay a like share of the expense by which the benefit was secured. It would not justify a charge for a proportion of the whole expense of a work in a case where only a small part of the work was of use to the party charged, and where he neither received nor claimed the benefit accruing from the remainder. The same equitable principle which would impose the charge in a proper case, so far as the work was beneficial, would deny the validity of a charge as to that part of the work which was for the exclusive benefit of others. There was no evidence by which to correctly apportion the amount of the charge to the benefit actually claimed and received by the defendant. The estimates above made were based on the assumption that both the saving and the expense were uniform throughout the course of the ditch. Upon this point there was no evidence and the court makes no finding. The case was not tried upon the theory that there might be a partial recovery of the amount claimed, but upon the proposition that, as the defendant was a part owner in the whole, he was, consequently, chargeable with his proportion of the whole expense if he claimed and received the benefit of any part of the work, and regardless of the fact that a large part of the expense was for work which he did not use and was made to save water in which he did not share and the previous loss of which did not injure him. Hence, the proof was not directed to the proposition of a charge to the defendant limited to his proportion of the expense of that specific part of the work which was shown to be of benefit to him. Conceding, therefore, that the facts and law would justify some recovery by the plaintiff, it would be necessary for it, in order to maintain its case, to produce evidence from which the court could ascertain the amount for which the defendant would be liable. Having failed to do this, the court was justified in giving judgment for the defendant.
